30. BATTLE OF FONTENAY.—It was to relieve Tournay, besieged by marshal Saxe, that this battle was fought. The French were superior in numbers to the allies, and strongly posted. The duke of Cumberland began his march to the enemy at two in the morning, and about nine both armies were engaged. By the English and Hanoverian infantry the enemy were driven from their lines, and in danger of a complete defeat; but the Dutch failing in their attempt on the village of Fontenoy, and the allies coming within the destructive fire of the semi-circle of batteries erected by Saxe, were compelled to retreat. The allies left their sick and wounded to the humanity of the victors. Their loss exceeded 10,000, and the enemy lost more officers, if not more men, than the allies. Speaking of this battle, a French historian says, "The English rallied, but gave way; they left the field of battle without tumult, without confusion, and were defeated with honour." Tournay surrendered, after a gallant defence, on the 21st of June. Ghent and Bruges were taken by assault; Ostend, Dendermond, Newport, and Aeth were successively reduced, and the allies retired for safety behind the canal of Antwerp.

21. Early this morning the Highlanders attacked sir John Cope, sword-in-hand, at Preston-pans, and in less than ten minutes entirely routed the king's troops, unaccustomed to their fierce mode of fighting. Each party numbered about 3000. Colonel Gardiner, a distinguished officer of dragoons, and native of Scotland, fell covered with wounds, within sight of his own house. The rencontre was on a heath, seven miles east of Edinburgh, called Gladsmuir, and by it the rebels became masters of Scotland except a few fortresses.

24. The greatest meeting of gentry at York ever known, to form an association; 40,000*l.* subscribed to raise troops for the present emergency.

PUBLIC CREDIT.—The alarm created by the advance of the Highlanders occasioned a run on the Bank of England, which reduced them to the necessity of paying their notes in shillings and sixpences. But a public meeting of the principal merchants and traders, who, to the number of 1140, signed an undertaking to receive and pay in bank paper, arrested the panic. The run was ascribed to the papists and jacobites, promoted to destroy public credit.

The directors of the East India Company declared they would take in their bonds at par, for payment for goods bought at their sale, being 10*l.* discount.

A subscription was opened at Garraway's coffee-house, by a great number of merchants, who subscribed 200*l.* each, in order to raise a fund of 250,000*l.* for raising a re-

Sir Gregory Page mustered a body of 500 men on Blackheath, raised and clothed at his own expense.

Oct. 2. At a meeting of gentry at Chester measures were entered upon to raise and maintain 2500 men. DEATH OF SWIFT.—At the close of this month, in his seventy-eighth year, died Dr. Jonathan Swift, dean of St. Patrick's, the celebrated humorist, satirist, and political writer. The dean survived the loss of his faculties some years, a catastrophe that may be as plausibly ascribed to old age as constitutional infirmity, from which he was wont to anticipate mental alienation. In an age not remarkable for genius, Swift was perhaps the most original, though the most faulty of the queen Anne writers. Many of his works are occupied with the politics and personalities of the day, and, the dean being an intolerant partisan, are void of present interest. His "Tale of a Tub" and "Gulliver's Travels" retain some of their ancient popularity, the last especially exhibiting a singular union of quiet humour, satire, and misanthropy. His style has been praised for ease and simplicity; but it is bald and feeble; and Hume, the historian, contrary to the common opinion, questions its correctness. It was formerly the fashion of literary men to be the dependants of the great, whom they flattered, or, if neglected or cast off, libelled. Swift followed this course. He was greedy of preferment, and sought the favour of Mrs. Howard; but as Walpole remarked in his coarse way, on a similar occasion, he "pinched the wrong sow by the ear;" for it was the queen, not the mistress, who dispensed the royal bounty. The pride, selfishness, factiousness, and want of feeling in Swift, have been depicted with great force, and apparent justice, in a modern publication (Edinburgh Review, xxvii. 42). He abandoned an only sister for marrying a tradesman, and treated with obdurate insensibility two amiable women who loved and admired him. His acrid nature seemed to render the torment of his fellow-creatures a part of his necessary aliment. Still he had virtues. Ireland was benefited by his writings; he was free from hypocrisy, not meanly jealous, and bequeathed the greatest part of his fortune to a hospital for lunatics,—

"To show, by one satiric touch,
No nation needed it so much."

Nov. 11. A person, who saw the rebels about Rowcliff, affirmed that the whole number did not exceed 9000 men. As to arms, every man had a sword, target, musket, and disk: their baggage not very considerable, but they relieved the guard that marched with it every night. For provision, they had live cattle, and kept a drove along with them; oatmeal they took where they could find it, and carried it in a bag at their sides, and ate it morning and evening with water. They marched at a great rate, and expressed a desire of getting into Lancashire. Their officers lodged in villages, but the men always encamped at night. About day-break they began to move, or sooner if the moon shone, and pushed on as hard as possible.

13. The rebels entered Carlisle.

24. They reached Lancaster at noon. On the same day marshal Wade set out from Newcastle, though the ground was covered with snow, in pursuit of them. The duke of Cumberland left St. James's to take the command of the king's troops, which sir John Ligonier had begun to assemble in Staffordshire.

25. The Soliel, a French privateer, with lord Derwentwater and other Jacobites on board, brought into Deal.

27. All the bridges on the Mersey were destroyed. The principal inhabitants of Manchester withdrew with their effects, and next day the insurgents entered the town. The bellman was sent round, requiring all who held any of the excise, land-tax, or other public money, to bring it in. About 200, under colonel Townley, joined the pretender.

28. The duke of Cumberland arrived at Lichfield.

Many subscriptions were promoted this month to buy necessaries for the army. The quakers sent down 15,000 woollen waistcoats to keep them warm, and the king from his privy purse gave them shoes.

Dec. 1. The prince-pretender, with his main body, enters Macclesfield.

4. He enters Derby with about 7000 followers. Next day they held a great council, in which it was determined to retrace their steps, finding that few had joined them in their march, and these only of the lower sort.

The duty on hops amounted to 39,087*l*.

Feb. 7. Several persons committed to Lancaster gaol for collecting money for the pretender.

10. The rebel prisoners taken at Carlisle brought to London. They were rudely treated by the populace who pelted them with dirt.

INTRIGUE IN THE CABINET.—About this time some ministerial changes were attempted. The king was anxious to bring back lord Granville, and the duke of Newcastle to introduce Mr. Pitt into the government. On the 10th inst. the duke and lord Harrington resigned; lord Granville was made secretary of state, and the earl of Bath first lord of the treasury. Next day Mr. Pelham, the duke of Bedford, and Mr. Grenville resigned, and the rest of the administration were expected to follow. The earl of Chesterfield and nine dukes gave up their places. Upon this, the king was given to understand, by lord Winnington, that the projected ministry would only have thirty-one supporters in the lords and eighty in the commons. In consequence, all the former ministers were recalled on the 11th instant, and on the 22nd Mr. Pitt was made vice-treasurer for Ireland, and soon after paymaster-general. From this time Mr. Pelham continued at the head of affairs till his death in 1754. Mr. Pitt (the first earl of Chatham) became the determined advocate of the measures which for ten years of his parliamentary life he had strenuously opposed. Nor did he scruple to avow his apostasy: justifying himself on the common pretext, that as he had grown older he had grown wiser.

Mar. 14. News that the rebels had taken Fort Augustus and blown up Fort George, in doing which they blew up their chief engineer, colonel Grant. Some clans joined them on the hills, headed by ladies Seaforth and Mackintosh; but their husbands were with the king's troops.

28. Ventilators, invented by the rev. Dr. Hales, ordered to be introduced into Newgate.

vat had it translated into Gaelic, and told them the duke was coming to carry it into execution.

Apr. 3. Blair Castle surrenders to the rebels after a brave defence by sir Andrew Agnew.

The seizing of the cattle and demolishing their houses had the effect of inducing many rebels of Lochabar to return to their homes.

12. The king's troops pass the deep and rapid Spey at a difficult ford, within sight of the rebels. Ray, who was with the king's troops as a volunteer, says they might have been here advantageously attacked.

16. VICTORY OF CULLODEN.—The entire defeat of the rebels may be partly ascribed to an unsuccessful effort to surprise the royal army at Nairn. The 15th inst. was the duke of Cumberland's birthday; and thinking the king's troops would have been making merry, the plan of the rebels was, by a night march to surprise them in their camp at day-break. With this design they started in two columns, one commanded by lord Murray, the other by lord Gordon; but the length of the columns embarrassed the march, so that the army was obliged to make many halts: the men had been under arms the whole of the preceding night, were faint with hunger and fatigue, and many of them overpowered with sleep. Some were unable to proceed; others dropped off unperceived in the dark; and the march was retarded in such a manner, that it would have been impossible to reach the duke's quarters before sun-rise. Failing in their enterprise, they retraced their steps to Culloden, where they no sooner arrived than numbers dispersed in quest of provisions; and many, overcome with fatigue, threw themselves down on the heath. Early on the 16th the duke decamped from Nairn, and after a march of eight miles, perceived the rebels drawn up in a line with their left to Culloden-house and their right extended to a park wall. About noon the Highlanders began the attack by throwing away their muskets, and rushing in their wild, furious way, with their broadswords and Lochabar axes, on the royal troops; but being now prepared for this mode of fighting, they received them with fixed bayonets, and kept up a steady firing by platoons, which did prodigious execution. In thirty minutes the battle was converted into a rout; and orders having been issued to give no quarter, vast numbers were slain in the pursuit. The loss of the rebels in the battle and pursuit was 3000 or 4000 men; of the king's troops only fifty were killed. (Culloden Papers, 473.) The duke completed the subjection of the country, advancing as far as Fort Augustus, whence he sent off detachments to hunt down the fugitives and lay waste the High-land. As to the unfortunate prince, Edward, he escaped with difficulty from the battle, and after wandering alone in the mountains for several months, he found means, in September, to embark on board a French privateer for Montaix. His future life was deplorable in the extreme. The courage and fortitude he displayed in England seem to have forsaken him with a reverse of fortune, and the remainder of his days were spent in excess and debauchery. Being forcibly expelled from France, he retired to Florence, where he was seen by sir Nathaniel Wraxall in 1779, overwhelmed with infirmities, the consequence of his irregular courses.

May 14. The commons vote an addition of 25,000*l.* to the income of 15,000*l.* of the duke of Cumberland, now become the idol of the nation, and extolled as equal to the greatest heroes.

22. The corpse of the late duke of Ormond brought from France, and interred in Westminster-abbey.

31. Mr. Pitt made a member of the privy-council.

5. The combined French and Spanish armies lose 14,000 men in a bloody engagement with the Austrians and Piedmontese, at Placentia in Italy.

The court of session resumes its sittings at Edinburgh, after ten months' interruption of business, owing to the rebellion.

17. A great many rebel prisoners brought to London, preparatory to their trial.

Among them, Simon lord Lovat, with sixty of his clan: he was so infirm he could neither walk nor ride, and was brought in a horse litter. When taken, he had with him 6000*l.* in specie. Most of the jails from the capital northwards were filled with captives; and great numbers were crowded together in the holds of ships, where they perished in a deplorable manner for want of necessaries, air, and exercise.

27. Preparations being made for the trials of lord Kilmarnock, Cromartie, and Balmerino in Westminster-hall. As the proceedings were by indictment, and not by impeachment, no scaffolding was ordered for the commons.

July. Philip, king of Spain, dying in the sixty-third year of his age, he was succeeded by his eldest son Ferdinand. Philip was but two days survived by his daughter the dauphiness of France. In the same month died Christian VI., king of Denmark, succeeded by Frederick V., who had married Louisa, youngest daughter of the king of England.

24. The secretaries of state and lord-chancellor interrogated Mr. Murray, the pretender's secretary, in the Tower.

28. Trial of the rebel lords, Maria Kilmarnock and Cromartie pleaded guilty; lord Balmerino did not. All three were sentenced to death, but Cromartie's life was spared.

PUBLIC EXECUTIONS.—Seventeen of the rebels, who had been tried by a special commission in Southwark, were executed on Kennington-common, bearing with constancy the tortures then prescribed by the treason laws: nine were sent to death in the same manner at Carlisle; six at Brampton, seven at Pegrith, eleven at York: of these, a considerable number were gentlemen, and had acted as officers. About fifty were executed, as deserters, in Scotland; eighty-one suffered as traitors. A few obtained pardons, and considerable numbers were transported to the plantations. These trials and executions continued to the end of the year.

Aug. 12. Royal assent given to acts prohibiting the Highland dress to be worn in Scotland, except by persons in the king's service; and requiring schoolmasters to take the oaths of allegiance.

During the last six years, it was said, 700,000*l.* had been collected for the service of the pretender, of which 400,000*l.* since the beginning of the rebellion, and of this 170,000*l.* during the last winter, in and about London; 1500 names of subscribers, several of them persons of note, had been discovered.

18. Lords Kilmarnock and Balmerino beheaded on Tower-hill. The first was aged forty-two, and a nobleman of fine personal accomplishments, but desperate fortunes, who seems to have been drawn into the rebellion more from the influence of his countess and the loss of a government pension than jacobitism. Balmerino was fifty-eight, had been bred to arms, and acted from principle: he was gallant, resolute, and brave.

25. The distemper among horned cattle breaking out again in the neighbourhood of London, the Welsh fair was held at Barnet.

Sept. 14. Madras surrendered to the French, under Labourdonnais. But Dupleix, the governor of Pondicherry, the seat of government of the French in India, violated the capitulation.

30. The French, under count Saxe, defeated the allies, under prince Waldeck, at Roucoux. This battle terminated the campaign in the Netherlands. In Italy, the French and Spaniards were not so successful, the Austrians having expelled them from Lombardy, and reduced Genoa.

Oct. 9. A thanksgiving for the suppression of the rebellion. At night an illumination.

22. Admiral Matthews declared incapable of serving his majesty. The justice of this sentence has been questioned. The admiral was refused a copy of the minutes of the court-martial, and referred to the lords of the Admiralty.

Lima destroyed by an earthquake. It had been visited by a similar convulsion in 1586 and 1687. Callao, the best port in Peru, was in the same month overwhelmed by an influx of the sea.

Nov. 4. Omer Fremont, an officer in the rebel army in Scotland, was apprehended at a rehearsal at the Opera-house, where he was a dancer, and committed to prison.

18. Parliament opened by the king.

21. Charles Ratcliffe, younger brother of the earl of Derwentwater, who was executed in 1715, was arraigned on his sentence of treason in 1716, when he made his escape from Newgate. He pleaded first that he was a subject of France, where he had resided for the last thirty years; and secondly, that he was not Charles Ratcliffe, but the earl of Derwentwater. His pleas were overruled, and an order made for his execution.

At the quarter-sessions of the peace, held at Taunton, Mary Hamilton, otherwise Charles Hamilton, was tried for pretending herself a man, and marrying fourteen wives; the last of which, Mary Price, deposed in court that she was married to the prisoner, and cohabited as man and wife a quarter of a year, during which time she thought the prisoner a man, owing to the prisoner's vile and deceitful practices. After a debate of the nature of the crime, it was agreed that she was an uncommon, notorious cheat, and sentence: to be publicly whipped, and to be imprisoned for six months.

Dec. 4. Mr. Orator Henley taken into custody by order of lord Chesterfield, one of the secretaries of state, to be examined on a charge of seducing the king's subjects from their allegiance, by his Sunday harangues in his Oratory-chapel.

19. His lordship had sentence passed upon him in the usual form: after which, lord-chancellor Hardwicke, who presided as lord-steward, stood up, broke his staff, and dissolved the commission.

Apr. 2. The sheriffs of London received a warrant from the duke of Newcastle for the execution of lord Lovat; intimating, that it was expected they would expose the head at the four corners of the scaffold, as usual. The sheriffs returned answer, that, as it had not been practised lately, they desired it might be inserted in the body of the warrant.

9. Lord Lovat beheaded on Tower-hill. He was in his 80th year, and died a papist; leaving a character notorious for treachery, rapacity, cruelty, and immorality. He behaved with propriety at his execution, repeating from Horace.

"Dulce et decorum pro patria mori."
'So much easier is it,' says sir Dudley Carleton, on a similar occasion, 'for a man to die well than to live well.' Several persons lost their lives by the falling of a scaffold on the occasion.

30. Edward Cave, the editor of the Gentleman's Magazine, and the publisher of another magazine, were brought to the bar of the commons, for publishing the debates of the house; when the former denied that he retained any person in pay to make the speeches; and after expressing his contrition, he was discharged, on payment of fees. It is now well known that the celebrated Dr. Johnson was employed to report the speeches for Cave's periodical.

May 16. M. Buffon, the celebrated naturalist, communicated to the Academy of Sciences the results of his experiments on the power of burning-glasses. He set objects on fire at the distance of one hundred and twenty yards, and wrote a dissertation to prove that the account is neither false nor absurd of Archimedes burning the Roman ships at the siege of Syracuse.

21. The custom discontinued of putting up at the Common-hall the gentlemen nominated by the lord mayor for sheriffs.

25. Prince Charles, the pretender's eldest son, accompanied by several companions in his late desperate enterprise, arrived at Rome.

17. Parliament prorogued, and next day dissolved.

HERETABLE JURISDICTIONS.—An act received the royal assent, on the last day of the session, very conducive to the peace and improvement of Scotland. It was for the abolition of the heretable jurisdictions of the landowners, and making them a pecuniary compensation. By this act the most prominent distinction of the feudal system was abolished: the rivalries of clanship merged in the common weal, and the course of justice made more uniform and effective, by the substitution of the king's courts and judges in place of malcontent, rapacious, and capricious chieftains. The number of proprietors who claimed compensation was 148, and the amount of their claims for loss of regalities, justiciars, sheriffships, coronerships, and other territorial immunities, was valued by the court of session at 164,232*l*.

25. The pretender's second son made cardinal duke of York, and benefices given him by the pope worth 20,000 crowns.

An old lady, whose family had made an immense fortune in the East Indies, sent the garrison 1000*l*. in provision and money, and promised to repeat the present every week they held out. But it fell into the hands of the French the 16th of September following.

29. Beheaded at Stockholm, Dr. Blackwell, the physician. He confessed some secrets to Dr. Folstadius, a protestant clergyman, which the torture could not extort. He was a Scotchman, and had been corrector of the press to Mr. Wilkins in London.

Sept. 1. It is discovered that the sixth pier of the new Westminster-bridge had settled sixteen inches.

4,200 lbs. of tea, lately seized by the Swift privateer. They said they were only come for their own.

Nov. 10. NEW PARLIAMENT.—Ministers derived popularity from the suppression of the rebellion, and their naval successes. Smollett says, Newcastle and his brother Pelham had conducted the elections 'so as to fully answer their purposes.' The orators and leaders of opposition were silenced by absorption into the government, and the session was uninteresting. Arthur Onslow was again chosen speaker. Preparations for a congress at Aix-la-Chapelle, preliminary to a general peace, were announced in the royal speech; but, as the result was uncertain, the lavish grants and subsidies of former years were readily voted without inquiry.

Dec. 29. The king's annual dole of 1000*l*. to poor housekeepers of Westminster was distributed.

Oct. 7. TREATY OF AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.—The chief parties to this treaty were Britain, Holland, and Austria on one side, and France and Spain on the other. By it all the great treaties from that of Westphalia in 1648, to that of Vienna in 1736, were renewed and confirmed. Prussia was guaranteed in the possession of Silesia, and the empress-queen, of her hereditary dominions, according to the pragmatic sanction. France surrendered her conquests in Flanders, and the English in the East and West Indies. But the right of English subjects to navigate the American seas without being subject to search was never mentioned, though it had been the first cause of the war and the basis of the attacks made on Walpole's ministry. The nation was eager for the commencement of hostilities, but soon grew tired of the burdens they entailed. For all their sacrifices of blood and treasure, in a contest of eight years' duration, they only reaped the barren glory of supporting the German sovereignty of Maria Theresa.

Nov. 23. The king arrives from Germany.

The treaty of peace was celebrated by a grand display of fire-works in the Green Park.

29. Parliament opened. In the interval of the prorogation the opposition had arranged their measures, and appeared disposed to give ministers some trouble. They cavilled at the terms of the peace, and sharply canvassed the demands of the chancellor of the exchequer. It was under the auspices of the prince and guided by the counsels of Bolingbroke, that the opposition acted. The latter resided at Battersea, "where he was visited," Smollett says, "like a sainted shrine, by all the distinguished votaries of wit, eloquence and political ambition."

Dec. 10. The Prince-Pretender arrested at the Opera-house, and forcibly carried out of France.

The total number of French, Spanish and neutral vessels captured, from the declaration of war against France in 1744, was 2804. Of this 1191 were taken by privateers.

The total quantity of corn of every sort, exported in the five years ending in 1748, was 3,768,444 quarters, valued at 15,073,776*l*. The bounty paid on this exportation of corn amounted to 678,907*l*.

April 25. A general thanksgiving for the peace.

June 13. Royal assent given to an act for making a free market for the sale of fish in Westminster.

Aug. 7. An edict published at Paris, requiring from the clergy a return of their revenues, preparatory to the levy from them of the twentieth penny in common with the rest of the nation; and prohibiting the publication of the debates of the king's council. But the debates of their parliaments were allowed to be published. It was also proposed to levy a license duty on those who wore a sword, unless they could prove their nobility, or were in the royal service. To preserve the peace of the church it was prohibited to the bishops to issue their mandates on controverted points of religion without the king's permission.

England and other parts of Europe were much infested with locusts. Bavaria in particular shared in the desolation; a great swarm passed over in three columns, each of which was 300 paces in breadth, and occupied three hours in their transit.

Oct. 6. A factor near the Exchange apprehended by a king's messenger, for sending clandestinely out of the kingdom artificers and utensils employed in the woollen manufacture.

Nov. 14. A company of French comedians, lately arrived, occasioned a good deal of noise, and were strenuously attacked in the newspapers; notwithstanding which they began this night to act at the little Theatre in the Hay-market, where a fray ensued, swords were drawn, and some persons wounded: however, they persevered, and the French players and Westminster election almost entirely engrossed the attention of the town for the greatest part of this month.

16. On the opening of parliament the king congratulated them on the beneficial influence of the peace on commerce and public credit. Ministers still commanded a powerful majority, and carried all their measures triumphantly, by the mute eloquence of numbers.

Dec. 8. WESTMINSTER ELECTION.—The election was closed on this day; when the numbers appeared to be, for lord Trentham 4811; for sir George Vandeput 4654. But a scrutiny was demanded by the popular party. Trentham was the son of earl Gower, and the ministerial candidate. He had been strenuously opposed by those who styled themselves the "independent electors of Westminster," because his family had deserted the ranks of the opposition. Vandeput was the popular candidate, and his expenses were defrayed by the electors, to which they were encouraged by the countenance and assistance of the prince of Wales and his adherents. Mobs were hired and processions made on both sides, and the contest was carried on with a great deal of tumult and animosity.

The distemper among horned cattle continuing in different parts of the kingdom, orders in council were issued prohibiting the removal of cattle, except for slaughter.

Mar. 8. A smart shock of an earthquake felt in the metropolis. A shock had been felt about a month previously.

April 4. The Scotch claims for heretable jurisdictions began paying at the Exchequer.

5. Incredible numbers of people, being under strong apprehensions that the metropolis would be visited with a third and more fatal earthquake, on this night, according to the prediction of a fanatic life-guardsmen, and because it would be just four weeks from the last shock, as that was from the first, left their houses and walked into the fields, or lay in boats all night; many people of fashion in the neighbouring villages sat in their coaches till day-break; others went to a greater distance, so that the roads were never more thronged, and lodgings were hardly to be procured at Windsor.

12. Parliament prorogued.

REDUCTION OF THE FOUR PER CENTS.—The peaceable and prosperous state of the country caused the public funds to rise above par, and enabled the minister this session to accomplish an important financial measure. This was the reduction of the four per cent. stock to three and a half per cent. for seven years, and afterwards to remain at three per cent.; leaving to the public creditor the option of accepting these terms or being paid the principal, that is, thirty per cent. below the actual transfer price. It had all the effect of a tax of 25 per cent. on the funds, and was severely felt by many classes in the middle ranks, whose property was invested in the public securities. Yet there was no violation of national faith: since, agreeably with the original terms of the contract, the perpetual annuities were always redeemable at par. Some objection was at first made by the Bank, South Sea, and East India Companies, but finally the minister's plan was successfully carried through.

16. The king set out for Hanover.

May 21. The first buss launched, built on the model of the Dutch, for the British white herring fishery.

22. STATE OF NEWGATE.—A gentleman attended the court of aldermen with a message from lord-chief-justice Lee, to acquaint them of the necessity of some new regulation to be made concerning the gaol of Newgate; or that it would be dangerous for persons to attend the business of the sessions at the Old Bailey. To the message was annexed a list of upwards of twenty persons who were at the last sessions, and had since died, as it was thought, by some infection from the stench of the prisoners, among whom were sir Samuel Pennant, sir Daniel Lambert, baron Clarke, sir Thomas Abney, Mr. Cox, the under-sheriff, Mr. Sharpless, the clerk of the papers, counsellor Baird, counsellor Otway, deputy Hunt, and several others, who died of malignant fevers caught at the last sessions. All the jails of England at the time were filled with the refuse of the army and navy, disbanded at the peace, and either averse to labour or excluded from employment, naturally preyed upon the community. Great numbers were punished as examples, and the rest perished miserably amidst the stench and horrors of noisome dungeons.

June 17. A plot of ground hired at Chelsea for the reception of 300 Moravian families of the Lutheran church, to carry on a manufacture there.

30. Hannah Snell, who had long been in the army without her sex being discovered, and been present in several battles and sieges, received a pension of 30*l.* a year from the duke of Cumberland.

The congregation de propaganda fide, at Rome, had advice from China that the emperor, who had manifested a tolerating spirit, having suddenly lost his wife and son, fell into a deep melancholy, which soon degenerated into a kind of inquietude and languor, and at last turned to rage and cruelty. His ministers, fearing the effects on themselves, diverted the storm on the Christians, charging them with holding correspondence prejudicial to his interest. On this accusation the old bishop of Monicastro, who had thirty years governed the mission of the empire, was beheaded; four dominicans and two jesuits were strangled, and the most rigorous edicts ever made against the Christians were revived; but the missionaries in Pekin were spared, on the supplication of some jesuits acceptable to the emperor, for their useful skill in astronomy, painting, architecture, fortification and gunnery.

July 2. Mr. Sewell agreed with the committee of the city-lands to farm Newgate-market on paying a fine of 700*l.* and 700*l.* rent. Mr. Papworth farmed Leadenhall-market for 1000*l.* a year, and 1000*l.* fine.

13. The excessive heat of this and some preceding days so affected the fish in the Thames, that they gathered in shoals to the bank side, and buried themselves in the sedge and mud, and were easily taken in great quantities. Loads of fish perished in the fens of Cambridgeshire, and one person lost 300*l.* by the death of jacks and pike.

Aug. 29. Was decided at Newmarket a wager for 1000 guineas, laid by Theobald Taaff, esq. against the earl of March and lord Eglington, who were to provide a four-wheel carriage with a man in it, to be drawn by four horses nineteen miles in an hour; which was performed in fifty-three minutes and twenty-seven seconds.

Sept. This month the pretender was imprudent enough secretly to visit London, which he left again in five days, on finding himself deceived by some sanguine friends. He was shunned by the more respectable of the Jacobites for his libertinism; and Dr. King (Anecdotes of his Own Time, 201) describes him as a prince without "noble or benevolent sentiments," and wholly ignorant of our "history and constitution."

22. The ratifications of a treaty of subsidy concluded with the elector of Bavaria were exchanged at Hanover. The substance of this treaty, which was to last six years, was that the maritime powers pay the elector an annual subsidy of 40,000*l.* for which the elector was to keep in readiness a body of 6000 foot for the service of the maritime powers whenever demanded, provided they are not employed against the empire.

Oct. 24. Spain agrees to pay the South-sea company 100,000*l.* for the non-execution of the Assiento treaty.

Nov. 10. Died Mr. Edward Bright at Malden in Essex, aged thirty. He was supposed to be the largest man living. He weighed forty-two stone and a half, jockey weight; and not being very tall, his body was of an astonishing bulk, and his legs were as big as a middling man's body. He was an active man till a year or two before his death, when his corpulence so overpowered his strength, that his life was a burthen, and his death a deliverance. He left a widow pregnant of their sixth child.

17. The new bridge at Westminster opened, with a grand procession, at midnight.

30. The nunneries of begging friars in Ireland having been detected in many vile and dissolute practices, were suppressed by an order of the pope, on the petition of the principal catholics, both lay and clerical, of that kingdom.

A distemper among the horses prevailed through the whole of this month. That among the horned cattle was unabated.

The duke of Marlborough purchased the earl of Clarendon's estate in Oxfordshire for 70,000*l.*

Dec. 22. A proclamation for the better prevention of the numerous street robberies and assaults in London.

The christenings in Paris for 1750 amounted to 19,035; marriages, 4619; burials, 18,084; foundlings, 3785.

17. Was exhibited before the Royal Society a method of making artificial magnets much stronger than the best load-stones, with the assistance only of a common poker and tongs, by John Canton, M. A.

Parliament was opened by the king, who recommended the encouragement of commerce, and measures for the suppression of such outrages and violences as are inconsistent with the security of the community. The government address was carried by 203 to 74.

Feb. Justice Fielding having received information of a rendezvous of gamblers in the Strand, procured a strong party of guards, who seized forty-five at the tables, which they broke to pieces, and carried the gamblers before the justice, who committed thirty-nine of them to the Gate-house, and admitted the other six to bail. Three tables were broken, which cost near 60*l.* a piece. Under each of them were observed two iron rollers, and two private springs, which those who were in the secret could touch, and stop the turning whenever they had any flats to deal with.

5. A proclamation issued, pursuant to addresses from both houses of parliament, concerning a seditious paper, intitled, Constitutional Queries, &c., promising 1000*l.* for the discovery of the author, 200*l.* for the discovery of each of the printers, and 50*l.* for discovery of each publisher.

19. A committee of the common-council appointed to devise means for clearing the streets of beggars, vagrants, and disagreeable spectacles.

Was closed the subscription to the Free British fishery, the sum of which amounted to about 200,000*l*. Six busses for the ensuing season were ordered to be immediately built.

It was affirmed that upwards of 4000 persons who sold spirituous liquors without license, had been convicted of the penalty of 10*l*. each, from Jan., 1749, to Jan., 1750; and according to a list of private gin-shops, on the best calculation, they amounted to upwards of 17,000 in the bills of mortality. That the bill for preventing the consumption of cheap compound liquors proposed an additional duty of 8*d*. per ton on all malt spirits, to commence from Lady-day, 1751; that no compounder should make or sell any spirituous liquors, unless he has a still of 100 gallons in his dwelling-house, and served a legal apprenticeship; and that no distiller should have more than one apprentice at a time.

Mar. 4. Theodore, the abdicated king of Corsica, cast, in an action for a debt of 100*l*. in the court of King's-bench, Guild-hall.

20. DEATH OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.—

Frederick prince of Wales was in his forty-fifth year, and father of George III. He expired suddenly, in the arms of Desnoyers, the celebrated dancing-master, who was near his bed-side, engaged in playing on the violin for his amusement. Smollett says his death was in consequence of a cold caught in his garden at Kew; but this is incorrect. His end was caused by an abscess, that formed from the blow of a cricket-ball, which he received while playing at that game on the lawn at Cliefden, a collection of matter having been produced that burst in his throat and suffocated him. It will have been observed from the occurrences of this reign that an estrangement had subsisted between him and his father. During the last illness of the prince he was never visited by his majesty. On the evening of his decease, George II. had repaired, according to his usual custom, to the apartments of lady Yarmouth, situated on the ground-floor at St. James's, where a party of distinction generally assembled. The king had just sat down to play, and was engaged at cards, when a page arrived from Leicester-house, bringing information that his son was no more. He received the intelligence without testifying either emotion or surprise; then rising, he crossed the room to lady Yarmouth's table, who was likewise occupied at play, and leaning over her chair, said to her in German, in a low tone of voice, "Fritz is dead," Freddy is dead (Wrayall's Memoirs, 418). Long before his death, the prince made a declaration to the chiefs of the opposition of the leading principles which should guide his conduct on his accession to the throne. Among other things promised by him, were, first, to abolish all distinction of parties, and admit indiscriminately to place and emolument individuals recommended by their virtues and attachment to the constitution. Secondly, he proposed to support a bill to exclude from the house of commons all military officers under the rank of colonel, all naval officers under the degree of rear-admiral. Thirdly, he promised to introduce a rigorous inquiry into the abuses of public offices. Fourthly, a standing army was to be replaced by a numerous and effective militia. Lastly, the prince promised that no administration should have his confidence without obtaining these points in behalf of the people. Whether the prince was sincere or not, his promises rendered him very popular with the nation, and historians have been lavish in his praise. But contemporary writers are seldom well acquainted with the real character of princes. The truth is, Frederick was a man of weak intellect, who, having been thwarted in his inclinations by his father, devoted himself, in conjunction with others, whose motives were as little honourable as his own, to a factious opposition to his measures. Even his admirers allow that he was deficient in energy, steadiness, and penetration of character. Nor was economy a virtue he displayed, for at his death he had contracted enormous debts which were never discharged. The details given by Dodington in his "Diary" of the intrigues and amusements at Leicester-house are not creditable to his principles or understanding. The party there were occupied in forming schemes of future administrations, fixing the civil list, and dividing in imagination the leaves and fishes of the state on the king's death. It is related by this writer that the prince went three times in thirteen months to have his fortune told. He used to go disguised to Hockley-in-the-Hole to witness bull-baiting. In these rambles he was generally accompanied by lord Middlesex, whom his father had disowned for extravagance, or lord John Sackville. His favourite mistress was lady Archibald Hamilton. The prince was married in 1736 to the princess Augusta, only surviving daughter of Frederick II., duke of Saxe Gotha, by whom he left issue five sons and three daughters. His eldest son, now prince of Wales, being only in his eleventh year, a regency was appointed; but the king surviving till prince George attained his majority, it never acted.

POOR LAWS.—Orders were issued by the commons to oblige the overseers of all parishes to give an account to the clerks of the peace, &c. of the monies paid annually to the poor, from 1747 to 1750, inclusive, in order to be by them transmitted to the house immediately. The poor-rates, which at the end of Charles II.'s reign amounted only to 665,362*l.*, had increased to upwards of three millions. Notwithstanding this, a bill was under the consideration of the commons, for granting certain privileges to encourage the poor to marry, for the increase of his majesty's subjects.

Mar. 23. Order for a general mourning.

31. Robert Walpole, earl of ~~Orford~~, master of the buck-hounds, died, aged 51, of an abscess in the back.

The number of patients under the care of St. Bartholomew's and St. Thomas's hospitals amounted last year to 19,590.

Apr. 3. Captain Coram was interred with great solemnity in the vault under the chapel of the Foundling-hospital.

The late prince of Wales interred in Westminster-abbey.

22. POPULAR IGNORANCE.—At Tring in Hertfordshire a publican giving out that he was bewitched by one Osborne and his wife, harmless people above 70, had it cried at several market-towns that they were to be tried by ducking this day, which occasioned a vast concourse. The parish officers having removed the old couple from the workhouse into the church for security, the mob missing them, broke the workhouse windows, and seizing the governor, threatened to drown him and fire the town, having straw in their hands for that purpose. The poor creatures were at length delivered up, stripped naked, their thumbs tied to their toes, then dragged two miles and thrown into a muddy stream. After much ducking and ill usage, both expired. The coroner's inquest brought in their verdict wilful murder.

ROYAL CHANGES.—Frederick, king of Sweden and landgrave of Hesse Cassel, dying, he was succeeded, agreeably to previous arrangements, by Adolphus Frederick, duke of Holstein. Such was the rage for subsidizing the petty states of Germany, that it was found, on computation, that the late king of Sweden, in his capacity of landgrave only, had received from England 1,249,699*l.* Soon after the king of Sweden's death, prince Frederick of Hesse Cassel, who had espoused Mary, the third daughter of George II., thought fit to renounce his protestantism, and declare himself a Roman catholic.

May 5. Above 10,000 people came to Glastonbury from Bristol, Bath, and other parts, to drink the waters there for asthmatic complaints.

13. The coming of age of the marquis of Rockingham celebrated at Wentworth-house, Yorkshire. Above 10,000 guests, 3000 of whom were entertained in the house, and the beer was brewed in 1730.

THE WEATHER.—The season was cold and wet for most part of this month, the corn in the ground being much damaged in many places by the rain, and above 600,000 acres were computed to remain unsowed. Cattle also, especially the woolly kind, suffered greatly by the inclemency of the weather. One farmer in Sussex lost 400 lambs by cold dews. The rains made land-carriage so dear, that the poor people were greatly distressed by the high price of coals, which, in the wet season, at Derby rose from 4*d.* to 8*d.* per hundred; at Rugby, from 8*d.* to 14*d.*; at Northampton, from 10*d.* to 18*d.*, and in proportion at other inland places. The infection among cattle still continued, and now raged in the midland and northern counties. In Cheshire they lost 30,000 cows since last October.

JUNE 17. MINISTERIAL CHANGES.—John earl of Granville made lord-president of the council in the room of the earl of Dorset. In the same month the earl of Holderness became secretary of state on the resignation of the duke of Bedford; and lord Anson succeeded the earl of Sandwich as first lord of the admiralty. The withdrawal of the Bedford section of the ministry gave still greater ascendancy to the Pelhams. Mr. Pitt was an active partizan of the Pelhams, and Mr. Henry Fox, the first lord Holland, of the Bedfords. These conspicuous politicians, like their descendants of the next generation, represented the rival factions of the aristocracy in the house of commons. Both Pitt and Fox continued to hold their places.

24. Parliament prorogued, after the royal assent had been given to an act for augmenting the duties on spirits, and prohibiting the sale thereof except by victuallers, innkeepers, and vintners who rent a house of 10*l.* a year.

REFORM OF THE CALENDAR.—One of the most remarkable acts passed in the course of this session was that for regulating the commencement of the year, and correcting the calendar according to the Gregorian computation, which had been adopted by most nations on the Continent. The New Style, as it was termed, was introduced by pope Gregory XIII. in the sixteenth century; but the authority of the pontiff extending over catholic countries only, the ancient computation continued in use in England and the northern states. But by the new act it was provided that the year should begin on the 1st day of January, instead of, as heretofore, on the 25th day of March, and that eleven intermediate nominal days between the 2nd and 14th of September, 1752, should be omitted; so that the day succeeding the 2nd should be denominated the 14th of that month. By this change the dates of all private and public transactions, mercantile correspondence, treaties, battles, and other events and occurrences in England, were assimilated to those of France, Italy, and other continental nations. Secondly, the civil was made more nearly to correspond with the astronomical year. The Julian computation, either from ignorance or negligence, supposing a complete solar revolution to be effected in the precise period of 365 days and 6 hours, made no provision for the deficiency of eleven minutes, which, however, in the lapse of 18 centuries amounted to a difference of eleven days. By throwing out these supernumerary days, the equinoxes and solstices were made to fall on nearly the same nominal days that they fell in 325 at the council of Nice.

July 11. Mrs. Pitt made privy purse.

Sept. 18. By a list published of the ships employed in the whale fishery for 1751, it appeared that 167 went out; 32 from Britain, 13 from Hamburg, 3 from Altena, 2 from Bremen, 1 from Embden, and the rest from Holland.

At Weyhill-fair best Farnham hops sold from 8*l.* to 8*l.* 8*s.* per hunk^{ed}, the second from 4*l.* 15*s.* to 6*l.*, the Kent and Sussex best from 5*l.* 10*s.* to 6*l.* 10*s.*, and ordinary from 3*l.* to 4*l.*

In a circular epistle from the yearly meeting at London to the quarterly meetings of the Quakers in Great Britain, Ireland, and elsewhere, the account of sufferings this year (chiefly for tithes and church-rates) amounted in England and Wales to upwards of 3025*l.*, and in Ireland to upwards of 1760*l.*

Nov. 14. Parliament opened, when the king informed them of the death of the prince of Orange, and of the new treaties concluded with the electors of Bavaria and Saxony. These subsidy-treaties in a time of peace were in addition to those already subsisting with the electors of Mentz and Cologne, and which were followed by one with the elector-palatine.

20. Mr. Murray again committed to Newgate, by an order of the house of commons. He was committed last session for refusing to ask pardon on his knees, for obstructing the high bailiff of Westminster, in the course of his scrutiny, but discharged at the end of the session. His recomittal seemed an unusual stretch of parliamentary privilege. A pamphlet, setting forth the case of the gentleman, was ordered to be publicly burnt by the hangman.

21. Died, John Chambers, a fisherman, aged 99.

Dec. 8. Died, Louisa queen of Denmark, and youngest daughter of George II.

DEATH OF BOLINGBROKE.—On the 15th instant died, in the seventy-fourth year, Henry St. John, viscount Bolingbroke: a nobleman usually engaged in the politics, literature, and philosophy of the preceding half century. He began his career under Harley, earl of Oxford, whom he supplanted by an intrigue, and was himself driven into exile by the malignity of the first whig ministers of George I. Rashly entering the service of the pretender, he soon withdrew in disgust, either from jealousy of the superior influence of the duke of Ormond, in the white court, or from his better sense and education making him ashamed of the mean qualities of his new master, and the folly of his adherents. He had the singular fortune of having been secretary to, and attainted by, both governments: he recovered, however, the family inheritance in England; but Walpole, not caring to be troubled with him in parliament, kept him from his seat in the house of lords; and in retaliation, Bolingbroke commenced a long and bitter persecution of the minister, in the Craftsman. His life had been chiefly spent in retirement, and though not highly exemplary of practical wisdom, he was looked up to with oracular veneration by contemporary wits and politicians. He was a fine speaker, and highly accomplished man: of great energy and decision of character; but unscrupulous, and lacked the integrity of principle and singleness of pursuit that inspires confidence, and leads to unquestioned excellence. He was ambitious, envious of superiority, resentful; lax in morals, a partizan in politics, and an infidel in religion. As a candidate for popularity and public employment, he necessarily concealed his unbelief, but in old age more openly avowed himself. "In the agonies of death," says Mr. Cooke, "he was awfully consistent with himself. He rejected without hesitation the proffered assistance of a clergyman, and died as he had always lived, but only latterly avowed, a deist; affording in his last moments a melancholy proof of his sincerity." (Memoirs of lord Bolingbroke, ii. 244.) His death was caused by cancer in the face, an incurable malady, which he bore with heroic fortitude, calmly waiting its inevitable issue. In politics Bolingbroke was a liberal tory, repudiating the extravagances of legitimacy and high-church; and it is to be regretted his public life did not more assuredly win for him the merit he claimed in the epitaph he wrote for himself; namely, that he was "the enemy of no national party, the friend of no faction." He bequeathed voluminous MSS. to his secretary, Mallet, which were published; but such has been the progress of science, that it is the facts, not the moral and political philosophy of the last age, that are chiefly sought after.

16. Opened, a new road from Westminster-bridge to Kennington, cut through gardens, eighty feet wide.

BILLS OF MORTALITY.—Christened 14,691; buried 21,023. Decreased in the burials this year 2699. Died under two years of age 7483; lived to one hundred and upwards 18.

1752. Jan. 1. A great court at St. James's; but, on account of the mourning, the king did not go to the royal chapel to offer the byzant, or wedge of gold to the poor: neither was the ode for the new year performed according to annual custom.

2. The bank agrees to lend government 1,400,000*l.* at three per cent.

Feb. 2. The Spitalfield weavers petition the king, that the mourning may be shortened; which is granted.

Mar. 3. Miss Blandy tried at Oxford for poisoning her father, and convicted.

5. Was held the anniversary meeting of the governors of the small-pox hospital, at St. Andrew's, Holborn, where a sermon was preached by the bishop of Worcester, in which he answered the objections to inoculation, and said, he was informed by three eminent physicians who had long practised that operation, that only three out of 1500 of the inoculated patients had died.

11. Elizabeth Jeffreys tried at Chelmsford for the murder of her uncle, and convicted.

26. IMPORTANT STATUTES.—Royal assent given to an act for licensing pawnbrokers, and preventing their receiving stolen goods. An act for suppressing places of amusement in the metropolis, unless licensed by the magistrates. An act for vesting forfeited estates in Scotland inalienably in the crown, and applying their rents and profits to the improvement of the Highlands. An act for opening the ports of Yarmouth and Lancaster, for the importation of wool and woollen yarn from Ireland. An act for the execution of murderers one day after their sentence, and delivering their bodies for dissection. Murders had been shockingly frequent of late, and according to Smollett, this expedient was productive of salutary effects.

Parliament prorogued.

31. The king set out for Hanover.

Apr. 16. The collection for the sons of the clergy 1090*l.*

June 5. The estate of the late Mr. Pugh, North Wales, was purchased by the executors of the late sir Waikein Williams Wynn, a master of chancery, for 33,400*l.*

20. The new fish-market, Broadway, Westminster, opened.

FRENCH PROTESTANTS.—Notwithstanding the rigorous order lately given by the French king, to hinder his protestant subjects from going out of his kingdom, great numbers retired to Switzerland; many have also fled to Ireland, Jersey, the British colonies in America, and no inconsiderable number to Prussia. It is true, they run infinite risks before they can reach the frontiers, and the guards, very lately, stopped near thirty of these conscientious people on the road, who were committed to prison. A young gentleman was condemned at Montpelier to be hanged, for frequenting religious assemblies, and executed the same day. When sentence was pronounced he shed some tears, but soon recovered himself, and said to the judge, "God forgive the weakness of human nature."

29. IMPROVEMENTS IN SCOTLAND.—The town-council of Edinburgh deliberated on a plan for introducing improvements in that city on a very extensive scale, and which they thought they were warranted in entering upon, from the rapid increase of late years of their commerce, manufactures, and shipping. The produce of their linen manufacture for the five years ending Nov. 1. 1751, was 1,607,680*l.* In the seven years ending in 1752, there were distilled in Edinburgh 723,150 English gallons of brandy; and the tonnage of ships belonging to Leith had increased from 2,285 tons in 1744, to 5,703 tons in 1752.

1753. Jan. 11. Died sir Hans Sloane, first physician to the king, and many years president of the royal society. By his will his library of 50,000 volumes, antiquities and rarities culled from the animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms, in the collection of which he had expended an immense sum, were to be offered to parliament for 20,000*l*. The proposal was promptly acceded to, and together with the Harleian MSS. and Cottonian library, became the foundation of the British Museum in Montagu-house. The money for this purchase was raised by a lottery.

Parliament opened by the king.

Feb. 7. Was published a copy of the treaty concluded at Cape Coast Castle between England and the Fantee nation.

8. Virtue Hall, a servant to one Mrs. Wells, who kept a house of ill-fame near Enfield-wash, was taken into custody, by virtue of a warrant from justice Fielding: after a very strict examination, she acknowledged that Elizabeth Canning, a young woman who had been robbed by two fellows in Moorfields, about ten in the evening, last new year's day, was afterwards brought to Mrs. Wells's house and confined there near a month, and that several menaces were made use of to induce her to become a common prostitute; but that she would not comply. After so long confinement, Canning took an opportunity of pulling down some boards, which were nailed before a window, and made her escape, and came in a very miserable condition, and almost deprived of her senses, to her mother, a poor widow, who lived in Aldermanbury. Squires, an old gipsy-woman in Mrs. Wells's house, stripped her of her stays, and during her confinement she had no other sustenance than about a quarter loaf and a gallon of water. This occurrence caused a great sensation, and is cited by Smollett as an instance of the proneness of the English people, in the absence of important events, to adopt some trifle as a subject of interest and contention. The metropolis and a great part of the kingdom were divided into rancorous parties as to the credibility of the relation of Canning and her accomplice Hall. But the result proved it to be, in great part, an invention of two artful and worthless women.

Hall retracted her evidence, and Canning was convicted of perjury and transported.

Apr. 16. Dr. Cameron, who was seized in Scotland two or three days after his return from France, to settle some indispensable private business, was this evening brought to the Tower in a coach, under a strong guard of dragoons.

May 1. The Messiah was performed at the chapel of the Foundling-hospital, under the direction of Mr. Handel, the composer, for the benefit of that charity; there were about 800 coaches and chairs, and the tickets produced 925 guineas.

17. Dr. Cameron arraigned at the King's-bench court, under the act of attainder passed against him and others concerned in the late rebellion. The prisoner admitting his identity, he was sentenced to suffer death as a traitor.

JEW BILL.—A great ferment was excited this month, by the introduction of a bill for the naturalization of Jews born abroad, and admitting them to the privileges of Jews born in this country. Ministers were in favour of the measure, as offering an inducement to opulent Israelites to remove their effects to Great Britain. It was strenuously opposed by the corporation of London, the mercantile classes generally, and some heated enthusiasts. It was contended, that the incorporation of 'vagrant Jews' into the community would introduce a rivalry of interest and industry—would endanger the constitution in church and state—and be an impious attempt to invalidate the scriptural prophecies, which declare that the Jews shall be wanderers, without settled habitation, until their conversion to Christianity. Such reasoning did not prevent the Jew bill passing into a law, though it was in the next session repealed, in obedience to an unconquerable popular prejudice.

June 7. Dr. Cameron executed. A strong sympathy was excited in behalf of this unfortunate gentleman, whose death was a needless act of ministerial severity, unjustified by any considerations of public policy or danger.

MARRIAGE ACT.—Parliament prorogued after the royal assent had been given to a bill for the prevention of clandestine marriages. Prior to this act marriages might be solemnized in England with the same facility as at Gretna-green. No notice or publication of bans was requisite: any clergyman, in any place, might unite a couple in wedlock without license, consent of parents, or other preliminary condition. In consequence, the ceremony was often performed in cellars, garrets, or alehouses, by the refuse of the clergy, without any other consideration than that of pocketing a half-crown or two shillings fee. Clerical debtors imprisoned in the Fleet were notorious for pursuing this disreputable traffic, and used to hover about this prison for custom like porters for employment. A remarkable case of conjugal abuse, originating in the existing state of the law, coming before the house of lords, the marriage act was introduced by lord-chancellor Hardwicke.

REGISTRATION ACT.—In this session Mr. Potter, son of the archbishop of Canterbury, brought in a bill for taking a census of the people, distinguishing the marriages, births, and deaths, and also the total number of persons receiving alms, in every parish. This bill was violently opposed by Mr. Thornton, as subversive of the last remains of English liberty, and merely intended to facilitate the inquiries of the political arithmetician, and the exactions of the tax-gatherer. It passed the commons, but was thrown out of the lords on the second reading, as being of dangerous tendency.

JUNE. TURNPIKE RIOTS.—A great number of persons assembled in the west riding of Yorkshire, and cut down and destroyed several turnpikes, and burnt the toll-houses. The mob grew to such a height that the magistracy was obliged to call in the aid of the military. On the 30th instant, in the evening, a body of 500 men assembled in Briggate, Leeds, to rescue three prisoners, apprehended for destroying turnpikes. The riot act was read, but the multitude not dispersing and beginning to tear up the pavement to demolish the windows of the King's Arms inn, and to throw at the soldiers, the justices gave orders to fire, which was first done with powder only. This producing no effect, the soldiers fired with ball. According to the return made by the constables on Sunday morning, eight were killed and about fifty wounded.

There were also riots this year at Manchester, Bristol, and other places, occasioned by the high price of provisions, especially bread, the rate of which was enhanced by the absurd policy that had long prevailed of granting a bounty on the exportation of corn.

AUG. The thirty-six British vessels sent this season to Greenland caught 144 whales.

Nov. 8. His majesty, with the whole court, came from Kensington palace to St. James's, for the winter season.

15. Parliament opened, when the king, among other matters said, that 'it is with the utmost regret I observe that the horrid crimes of robbery and murder are, of late, rather increased than diminished.' This is remarkable evidence of the state of the country, considering it was in a period of peace and great internal prosperity.

M. Deslandes, at Stockholm, a learned Frenchman, being excited by the dispute between some English writers, concerning the number of people in the world in ancient and modern times, applied himself to consider the subject; and from the calculations of Hales, Vossius, Riccioli, Maitland, Boulanvilliers, and others, he concludes, that in all ages the number of people is much the same in the whole, though it may be sometimes more, sometimes less, in particular nations; and that in Europe there are actually 109 millions of inhabitants; in Asia 400 millions; in Africa 100 millions; and in America about 120 millions; which for the whole globe makes 729 millions. As for the inhabitants of Europe, Deslandes divided them as follows:

	Millions.
In Spain and Portugal	6
France	20
Germany and Hungary	20
The seven provinces of the Netherlands .	5
Sweden, Denmark, Norway and Muscovy	16

A council was held at St. James's, when the king directed the judges, who were going their circuits for the approaching assizes, to attend him in council; and the lord-chancellor signified to them his majesty's great concern at the present increase of robberies and murders, particularly murders by poisoning, perjuries, and forgeries; exhorted them to be vigilant and to admonish the country magistracy to do their duty.

Mar. 6. DEATH OF THE PREMIER.—Mr. Pelham the premier died unexpectedly in the meridian of his life and reputation. Rectitude of understanding and disposition were his leading characteristics. He is represented to have disliked the miserable policy of subsidising the petty states of Germany, but it demanded more enterprising energy than he possessed to extricate the kingdom, in the face of a hostile court, from its continental alliances. After a short interval Mr. Legge became the new chancellor of the exchequer; and the deceased minister's brother, the duke of Newcastle, first lord of the treasury and head of the government.

Apr. 6. Parliament prorogued, and on the 8th instant dissolved.

July 3. The French commander, Villiers, on the Ohio, obliged major Washington, (the future American president) to capitulate in fort Necessity.

Nov. 14. Parliament opened by the king. The address was unanimously carried, but there soon appeared symptoms of a reviving opposition. Both Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox considered themselves ill used by the new minister; the first in not obtaining a secretaryship of state, and the last in losing the leadership of the house of commons. They forgot their old rivalry in their common resentment, and early in the session were formally united in political friendship.

Dec. Accounts from France were full of the disputes between the king and his parliaments, the pope and the Jansenists, the persecution of protestants, and of skirmishes between smugglers and the troops sent in pursuit of them.

These wretches had received 1720*l*. from the treasury for persons taken by, and condemned on their evidence at the Old Bailey only, and they had ensnared, there and elsewhere, at different times, upwards of seventy men.

The press for seamen was carried on with great vigour in all parts of the kingdom, and in Ireland; but great numbers entered voluntarily. Almost all the considerable towns gave large rewards, in addition to his majesty's bounty, to such able-bodied seamen and landsmen as would enter the service. These warlike preparations were owing to the dispute subsisting with France respecting boundaries in America.

Aug. 22. Twenty-four ships and twelve colliers were taken into the service of the government, and fitted out as vessels of war, to carry twenty guns, six-pounders, and 120 men, each ship. They were taken up at 6*s.* 6*d.* per ton a month.

At the amethyst mines, in the county of Kerry, in Ireland, were found large quantities of the finest amethysts, not inferior in hardness or colour to the best orientals. The collection at the triennial music meeting at Worcester, on the 10th instant, amounted to 192*l.*

Oct. 7. IRISH PARLIAMENT.—This assembly was opened by a judicious and conciliatory speech from the lord-lieutenant, the marquis of Harrington. Ever since 1749 the Irish parliament had been contending with the English ministry for the right of appropriating the surplus in the exchequer to national purposes without the consent of the crown. The point at issue was pertinaciously revived every session. In the opening speech the viceroy carefully expressed his majesty's consent to the application of the surplus; and the commons in their address as carefully passed over the obnoxious word, acknowledging only his majesty's gracious recommendation.

During the last years of Mr. Pelham's cautious administration the contest was suspended; but the duke of Newcastle, who was inferior to his predecessor in political capacity, thought fit to revive the quarrel by giving positive instructions to the duke of Dorset, on opening the session, to repeat the expression of his majesty's consent in mentioning the surplus. This the commons promptly resented; the appropriation bill was transmitted to England divested of its complimentary preamble, which the English ministers supplied. On the return of the bill the whole nation was in a flame, and in spite of the utmost efforts of the Castle, the bill, thus amended, was thrown out by a majority of five voices. The victory of the Opposition was celebrated by universal rejoicings, and five-guinea medals were struck in honor of the glorious defenders of the public liberty on the 16th of December, 1753. By the rejection of the bill the government was placed in a very awkward dilemma, from which it only escaped by an humiliating concession to apply the surplus in virtue of a royal letter.

Nov. 1. EARTHQUAKE AT LISBON.—About nine in the morning this great city was visited by the most tremendous earthquake of modern times. The shock did not last more than seven minutes, but it was so violent that the king's palace, nearly all the public buildings, and 6000 dwelling-houses were overturned. The loss of lives was computed at more than 30,000: nor did the destruction end there; a conflagration, kindled by the tapers in the churches, and the fires in private dwellings, coming in contact with curtains, timber, and other combustible materials, spread over the city, and destroyed a still greater number of houses than the earthquake. It happened on the festival of All Saints, and most of the English having retired, as usual on that day, to their country-houses to avoid the insults of the populace, only ten of them lost their lives in this great calamity.

11. Parliament opened by the king.

22. Packet-boats were established at Falmouth, by the postmaster-general, for carrying on a regular monthly correspondence to the West Indies and North America.

20. Indecisive engagement between admirals Byng and Galissonière; after which, considering his squadron inadequate and ill-provided, Byng withdrew to Gibraltar. The English admiral in this rencontre seems to have been influenced by an over-anxiety to avoid an error of admiral Matthews in a former engagement with the French and Toulon fleet. Immediately on the receipt of his dispatches he was superseded by admiral Hawke; but that officer arrived too late for the relief of fort St. Philip, and Minorca fell into the enemy's hands, to the great joy of the French and the chagrin of the English nation.

28. The court-martial at Portsmouth came to the following resolution:—"The court-martial were of opinion that admiral Byng did not do his utmost to engage the enemy, and therefore were of opinion that he had fallen under part of the 12th article of war, and adjudged and sentenced him to be shot to death; but as it did not appear to the court that it was through cowardice or disaffection, they unanimously recommended him to mercy."

EXECUTION OF ADMIRAL BYNG.—This unfortunate and severely used officer was shot on board the Monarque. He met his hard fate with great courage and fortitude. He was dressed in a light grey coat, white waistcoat, white stockings, a large white wig, and had in each hand a white handkerchief. He threw his hat on the deck, knelt on a cushion, tied one handkerchief over his eyes, and dropped the other as a signal to his executioners, who fired a volley so decisive, that instantly five balls passed through his body, and he dropped dead in an instant. The time in which this tragedy was acted, from his walking out of the cabin to his being deposited in his coffin, did not exceed three minutes. He left a paper with the marshal, expressing the satisfaction he felt at the consciousness of having discharged his duty to the best of his ability; and with reason styled himself "a victim destined to divert the indignation and resentment of an injured and deluded people."

General Amherst had formed the design of achieving the entire conquest of Canada in a single campaign, by directing one expedition on Montreal and another on Quebec. The last, which was the most difficult part of the enterprise, was entrusted to general Wolfe. On the last day of July Wolfe was repulsed near the falls of Montmorenci. Undismayed, he saw in this reverse only the necessity of greater efforts, and he conceived the bold design of drawing the French from their unassailable position by scaling the heights of Abraham. The plan succeeded, and M. de Montcalm was compelled to abandon his camp and risk a battle for the protection of Quebec. While bravely animating his troops in front Wolfe received a wound in the wrist, and another in the breast, which rendered it necessary to bear him off to a small distance in the rear. There, roused from fainting, in the agonies of death, by the cry of "They run! they run!" he eagerly asked, "Who run?" and being told, the French, and that they were defeated, he exclaimed "Then I thank God, and die contented;" and almost instantly expired. He was in the thirty-fourth year of his age. Generals Monckton and Townsend, after the loss of their commander, completed the victory. At this part of the sentence his lordship cried out, "God forbid!" but soon recollecting himself, added, "God's will be done!" Afterwards, the lord high steward took notice, that by the act of parliament the lords, his judges, had a power of respiting; and therefore, that he might have more time to prepare himself, they respited his sentence to May 5. Earl Ferrers read a paper, in which he expressed his concern for the trouble he had given, but that he was advised to make the plea of lunacy, and begged their lordships to recommend him to the king for mercy.

Just before being turned off, he, with audible voice, very devoutly repeated the Lord's prayer, and afterwards, with great energy, the following ejaculation:—"O God! forgive me all my errors, pardon all my sins." His lordship then called for the executioner, who asked him forgiveness; upon which his lordship said: "I freely forgive you, as I do all mankind, and hope myself to be forgiven." He then intended to give the executioner five guineas, but, by mistake, giving it into the hands of the executioner's assistant, an unseasonable dispute arose between them. This being settled by the interference of the sheriff, his lordship placed himself under the fatal beam, saying to the executioner, "Am I right?" Then the cap was drawn over his face, and, upon a signal given by the sheriff, that part upon which he stood instantly sunk and left him suspended.

But, as Smollett observes, "it would have been less objectionable to divert the people from the abuse of spirits, by lowering the excise on ale and beer, and enabled them to buy a pot of good ale for a penny, as in the reign of James I."

14. At a court of aldermen and common council, it was agreed to petition the parliament for leave to take down Gresham college.

25. DEATH OF THE KING.—George II. died, without any previous disorder, of a rupture of the heart, at Kensington palace. He had risen at his usual hour, drank his chocolate, and inquired about the weather, when he fell on the floor, and almost instantly expired. He was in the 77th year of his age, and the 34th of his reign. In person he was rather below the middle size, well-shaped, erect, with eyes remarkably prominent, a high nose, and fair complexion. In disposition he was irritable, but soon appeased; mild, moderate, and humane. He was temperate in diet, regular, and extremely methodical. He was fond of military parade, and personally brave; but not eminent in the art of war. His understanding, naturally indifferent, he took no pains to cultivate; nor was he a patron or promoter of genius and learning. Like his predecessor, George II. had several mistresses; but he always preferred queen Caroline to any other woman; and when discoursing on personal beauty, he referred to her majesty as the most perfect model. Among the king's chief favourites is reckoned Mrs. Howard, afterwards married of Suffolk. This lady, with her husband, being in narrow circumstances, had gone over to Germany, with a view of making their court to George I. while elector of Hanover. She succeeded in insinuating herself into the good graces of George II., and became his mistress. While under royal protection, lord Orford says, (Reminiscences, p. 302) Mr. Howard went to St. James's palace, publicly to demand his wife in the presence of the guards. Being thrust out, he sent a letter to her by the archbishop of Canterbury, who conveyed the summons to the queen, who delivered the epistle to her rival. During the summer a negotiation commenced, and this indulgent husband agreed to surrender his frail partner for a pension of 1200*l.* a year.

MEN OF LETTERS.

The powers of the human mind were freely and fully exercised in this reign. Though the age was not remarkable for any extraordinary originality, there were many ingenious and clever writers. Berkeley, Hartley, and Hutcheson, excited astonishment by the novelty and ingenuity of their metaphysical researches. In natural philosophy, the phenomena of electricity and magnetism had begun to attract attention. Mathematics and astronomy were successfully cultivated by Halley, Bradley, Maclaurin, Sanderson, and the two Simpsons. The medical art was elucidated by the writings and discoveries of Hunter, Mead, Pringle, Monro, and Huxham. In theology were many distinguished names; the establishment being justly proud of its Potter, Herring, Hoadly, Sherlock, and Gonybears; and the dissenters of Lardner, Doddridge, Watts, Leland, Chandler, and James Foster—both fearlessly entering the lists, without seeking the aid of the civil power, in defence of their common faith, perseveringly assailed by the deistical writings of Collins, Toland, Woolston, Morgen, and Tindal. History and biography were cultivated by the copious Guthrie, the circumstantial Ralph, the labours of Carte, and the classic Middleton. Hume was slowly rising into popularity, as the most elegant and philosophic, if not the most faithful of historians, and Robertson and Gibbon trod in his steps. The genius of Cervantes and Le Sage was transfused into the novels of Fielding and Smollett, who painted the characters and ridiculed the follies of life with equal force, humour, and spirit. Richardson, in his Pamela and Grandison, had the merit of originating a new species of writing, in which works of imagination were sought to be made the vehicle of moral precepts and examples. In poetry there were the lugubrious Young and Blair; Thomson, the author of the Seasons; Akenside and Armstrong excelled in didactic verse; Mallet and Gray in the elegiac; Glover, in his Leonidas, aspired to the dignity of the epic. Zanga and Douglas were the chief standard dramas produced; the comedies of Congreve and Cibber, though rich in wit, and the former in elegance, being proscribed by the decay of a later period. Music became a fashionable study; the Italian opera was encouraged, and concerts formed in every corner of the metropolis. Handel, Boyce, Greene, and Arne were the chief professors. Painting, which had been hitherto little cultivated, now produced some artists of extraordinary merit. Hogarth was unrivalled in exhibiting the scenes of ordinary life in humour and character. Reynolds and Ramsay were pre-eminent in portrait painting; Rouilliac in sculpture; Strange in engraving; and Burlington in architecture.

In philology and criticism, Warburton, Bentley, and Boyle were the dazzling meteors. The fame of Johnson and his host of literary satellites belongs to a later age; while the celebrity of Pope, Swift, and Bolingbroke was, in great part, anterior to the present. Some of the names that have been mentioned had only just risen above the horizon, and their chief glory belongs to the reign of George III.

The sciences that bear on commerce and manufactures, finance, and the subsistence and government of nations, were little known or cultivated (except by Hume) in the reign of George II. Political economy, chemistry, mechanics, geography, geology, jurisprudence, and civil liberty, formed the grand fields of inquiry and triumph for a succeeding age.

Subjoined is the list of the illustrious deceased of the reign of George II.

COMMERCE.—AGRICULTURE.—EXPORT OF CORN.

The commerce of Great Britain continued to increase during the greater part of this reign; but this increase was not the effect of extraordinary encouragement. On the contrary, the necessities of the government, the growing expenses of the nation, and the continual augmentation of the public debt, obliged the legislature to hamper trade with grievous imposts: its increase therefore must be ascribed to the natural progress of industry, skill, and adventure. War, which generally impedes the traffic of nations, had opened new sources to the merchants of Great Britain, and only slightly affected the amount of her shipping and exports. The superiority of her naval power had crushed the navigation of France, her great rival in commerce, so that she now supplied, on her own terms, all those foreign markets, at which, in a time of peace, she was undersold by her competitor.

With the exception of the year 1756, the value of the cargoes exported continued to increase during the seven years' war, but the tonnage that cleared outwards never attained the amount of the pacific and prosperous years 1749—51. This will appear from the subjoined statement from Chalmers (Estimate 131):—

	Tons.	Value of Cargoes.
1749—51	661,184	£ 12,599,112
1755—57	524,711	11,708,515
1760	578,978	14,693,270
1761	626,055	14,873,194
1762	600,570	13,546,171

It appears from this that only the value, not the quantity of our exports increased during hostilities.

Scotland largely participated in the general prosperity. The value of the commodities exported from that kingdom were (Chalmers' Estimate 138) in

1764	1,243,927

The yards of linen made for sale in Scotland were, in 1758	10,624,435

The linen manufacture of England was prosperous. According to an average of seven years of peace, from 1749 to 1755, there were exported 676,373 yards. According to an average of seven years of subsequent war, the exports were 1,355,226 yards.

The value of woollen goods exported had increased from £3,575,297 in 1755, to £5,453,172, in 1760.

AGRICULTURE was much indebted to this reign to the inventions and writings of Jethro Tull, an experimental farmer. He introduced the drill-husbandry, and recommended the substitution of labour and arrangement in the place of manure and fallowing in the culture of land. A rotation of crops, and the cultivation of turnips, clover and potatoes in the field became more general. That agriculture was rapidly improving is shown by the course of legislation. In the warlike reign of king William not a single act was passed for the dividing of commons, the inclosure of wastes, or the draining of marshes. In the equally warlike reign of Anne there were only two inclosure acts; but in that of George I. the number was 26; and in the thirty-three years of George II.'s reign, 226.

In no branch of commerce has there been so much absurd legislation as in the CORN TRADE. At an early period the exportation of corn was entirely prohibited, from the mistaken notion that this was the best means by which plenty could be maintained at home. This policy continued, with little relaxation, till the accession of the Stuarts, when exportation began to be allowed on the payment of a duty. But at the revolution of 1688, the legislature rushed to the opposite extreme; restrictions were imposed on importation, and a parliamentary bounty granted on the exportation of corn. According to Dr. Smith (Wealth of Nations, B. I., Ch. xi.) the country gentlemen, who then formed a larger proportion of the legislature than at present, adopted this expedient to keep up the price of corn, which was falling. This policy was persisted in till about the peace of Paris in 1763; and during the whole of this time, either from the temptation of the bounty or the produce of the country outgrowing the home consumption, large quantities of corn were annually exported.

In the five years from 1744 to 1748, the quantity of corn exported from England was 68,444 quarters, worth at the current price, £8,007,948. And this result, obtained by the double error in commercial economy of a bounty on exports and a restriction on imports, was considered an undeniable proof of national prosperity!

PRICES AND WAGES.

From 1729 to 1760 there was no material variation either in the prices of provisions or the rate of wages. During the whole of that period wheat kept steadily at from 32s. to 35s. per quarter. Wages in husbandry rose a little towards the end of the reign of George II., but not those of artificers. It follows that the subjoined statements of wages and prices on the accession of George III. will show their relation during the long reign of his predecessor.

The contract rate of wages for artificers had undergone no variation from 1729, and continued without variation till about 1795, when they suddenly rose from 2s. 6d. to 5s. per day.

According to Mr. Barton's tables, wages in husbandry were in 1725, per week, 5s. 4d.; in 1751, 6s.; in 1770, 7s. 4d.

The following statement will help to show the mode of living, and expenses of an agricultural family, about the time of the accession of George III:—

REVENUE, DEBT, AND TAXES.

Governments seem to be naturally spend-thrifts. The temptations to expenditure, either from love of patronage or desire ostentatiously to signalize their administration, so far outweigh motives to economy, that the most patriotic ministers seldom aspire to more than to govern within the public income, rarely to lessen the encumbrances transmitted by their predecessors. Sir Robert Walpole had favourable opportunities for reducing the national debt, but he was too epicurean in his notions of the enjoyment of power to make sacrifices for the future. Though a skilful financier, he was reckless enough to apply the sinking-fund to the current expenses of the year, and, with a view of keeping on good terms with the landed interest, reduced the land-tax to one shilling in the pound.

In the long periods of peace that had occurred since the death of queen Anne, the surpluses of the national income were seldom applied to the liquidation of the capital of the debt. Unexampled commercial prosperity causing abundance of money, and the rise of the stocks above par, ministers availed themselves of these circumstances to offer the public creditor either his principal or a lower rate of interest. In this way a saving of near half a million of annual interest was effected in the reign of George I. The same expedient was employed by his successors in 1749, by which the annuities payable to the creditors of the state were reduced 303,000*l*. But these reductions were more than counterbalanced by the increase, in consequence of the expense of the Spanish war, and the seven years' war that began in 1755; so that George II. left both principal and interest considerably augmented.

The subjoined statement, extracted from sir John Sinclair, exhibits the total public expenditure of this reign, and the income and peace establishment of the country on the accession of George III:—

GEORGE III. A.D. 1760 to 1775.

THE commencement of the new reign was signalized by an effort to rescue the executive from the thralldom of the aristocracy. William III. was a king of conditions, and the statesmen who negotiated his accession to the English throne assumed, through the instrumentality of parliament, a co-parcenary in the regal office. From the revolution the crown had ceased to exercise independent authority: not only was the king's income, but the choice of his responsible servants, prescribed by the majorities of the House of Commons. In consequence, the government became parliamentary, and the monarchy lost not only its preponderance but co-ordinate authority in the constitution.

Various reasons may be assigned for this devolution of political power. The first and most important was, doubtless, that already alluded to, namely, the elective tenure, under which the prince of Orange received the crown, and which he transmitted to his successors. The next was the foreign interests and character of the sovereigns, from the revolution to the accession of George III. The policy of king William was almost wholly continental; he was unquestionably interested, in common with his English ministers, in the maintenance of the Protestant settlement; but England was chiefly valuable to him from the resources, in men and money, it afforded for the defence of the United Provinces against the ambitious encroachments of France. With less motives, queen Anne followed the course of her predecessor, but the policy of her reign was determined by court intrigues. On the accession of the family of Brunswick, the scene of continental interest was transferred from Holland to Hanover. A want of acquaintance with the English language and constitution disqualified the two first princes of this family from taking an active share in the government: provided the interests of the hereditary states were not compromised, they seem to have been indifferent to the course of public policy; and it was by ministering to German connexions that the whigs, for half a century, enjoyed uninterruptedly all the chief offices of state.

But the abandonment of the government entirely to this party did not obviate every difficulty in the way of the executive. The whigs had no sooner swept the field of their opponents, than, after the manner of conquerors, they quarrelled among themselves. It was not upon any great question of national policy they were divided: with the Jacobites they differed on the regal succession, and with the tories on religious toleration; but, with each other, they had no constitutional or administrative disagreements. Upon all points they were united, except as to the division of public employments. The PREMIERSHIP being the capital prize, the chief point of contention was, whether Walpole, Pelham, Pitt, Rockingham, Bedford, Grenville, or Grafton should be head of the Treasury. Every ministerial change gave rise to new disputes, intrigues, and confederacies, and the country suffered, in the choice of its ministry, from the conflictive cabals of the aristocracy, the evils of an elective monarchy, with this aggravation, that they were of more frequent occurrence than when dependent on the life of the sovereign.

The accession of George III. presented many circumstances favourable to an attempt to rescue the government from these aristocratic feuds. The title of the Brunswick family had ceased to be disputed by a rival house, and was no longer compelled to lean on the support of a party. The king himself came before the public under promising auspices. He had the advantage of his predecessors in not being an alien monarch. His character was without reproach; all that was known of him was creditable; his manners were free and popular, and he was too young to have formed binding ties with any section of politicians. Moreover, the events of the last fifty years had lessened the confidence of the people in the men who had engrossed the government. Their principles were progressive, their practices stationary or retrograde: for many breaches had been made in the constitution, but no repairs. The public debt and expenditure had increased; exhausting continental wars had been waged under every imaginable pretext; and a standing army become a constant part of the peace establishments. In struggles for power they professed popular maxims, which were openly belied immediately they had served their temporary purpose. To gratify selfishness and ambition, not serve their prince or country, seemed the main object; and this was not the course of subalterns only, but chiefs of party—Walpole, Pulteney, Sandys, and Carteret, down to Pitt and Camden—all pursuing the same vacillating round, first of patriotism, and, when that had served its turn, graduating from the political arena as courtly placemen or pensioned peers.

A change, therefore, might be an improvement. The arbitrary will of the monarch might be a less evil than the venal distractions of faction. But the experiment entirely failed. The earl of Bute, who is supposed to have been the author, and who undertook the initiation, of the new system, was totally unqualified for the undertaking. He was without political influence or connexion; unacquainted with official life; had no parliamentary abilities or interest: his principles were arbitrary; his manners cold, haughty, reserved and pedantic; and he was only known to the public as the favourite, or confidential adviser, of the princess dowager of Wales, the king's mother. That the English nobility could be driven from their usurpation by such impotent agency, it augured great want of capacity in the projectors to expect. The bare effort seems to have excited as much contempt as indignation, and the heads of the political clans united as promptly against the intrusion of the Scottish parvenu as the barons against the Spencers in the reign of Edward II.

The time, too, chosen for this coup d'état was unsuitable. At the period of the accession there was a vigorous, united, and talented administration. The country had long been in a state of unexampled prosperity. Mr. Pitt was the minister of the people, and, after brilliant triumphs, had brought the war to the point of successful termination. Abruptly to supplant him and his colleagues intimated a design, either to reap the laurels which others had won, or an impatient desire to test the force of the royal will under the new system. The result will be seen in the Events and Occurrences, and also the rapid scenes of official mutations which followed, till the government settled, for a long term, in the hands of lord North.

Upon the short-lived ministry of the earl of Bute one remark may be offered. So far as his scheme of government was developed it seemed an attempt to revive the leading principles of sir Robert Walpole's administration. The precipitancy with which the Peace of Paris was concluded showed that his lordship inclined to a non-interfering and pacific foreign policy. At home, public opinion was to be moulded by a hired press, and the legislature by corruption. The king was to choose his ministers as the royal pleasure or court favouritism dictated, independent of popular or parliamentary control. No support seems to have been sought from party combinations; and, in this, the course of Bute differed from that of Walpole, who was always ready to buy off or attach to himself political leaders. In short, Bute contemplated the introduction of a narrow scheme of arbitrary power. It held out no invitation to popular support, afforded no wider guarantee against the abuse of the executive or legislative authority. For the despotism of the aristocracy he sought to introduce the despotism of the sovereign; for the intrigues and scrambles of faction, the intrigues and scrambles of courtiers.

The failure of lord Bute's plan of close government had the usual consequence of failures—it made matters worse than before. After his retirement the king was left entirely at the mercy of the factions. He sent for Mr. Pitt, who told him that public affairs could not be carried on without “the great families who had supported the revolution government, and other great persons, of whose integrity and abilities the nation had had experience.” This was said when Mr. Pitt was co-operating with the “great families;” but subsequently, when this aspiring statesman had become minister and fallen out with the “great families,” we find him exclaiming to lord Edgecumbe, “I despise your parliamentary interest! I do not want your assistance!” Adding, that he “trusted to the uprightness of his measures for the support and confidence of the King, and the favour and attachment of the people; and that, acting upon these principles, he dared look in the face of the proudest connexions in the country.” The difficulties of the king in forming a ministry resulted from the limited number of employments in his gift; having only one premiership and a definite number of secretaryships, &c., to dispose of, they were often insufficient to satisfy the several leaders and their adherents. In consequence, they quarrelled about the division of them; the discontented refused to co-operate with their more fortunate rivals—withheld their parliamentary support, cavilled at their measures, exaggerated to the people their defects, and never ceased to thwart and oppose till the obnoxious administration, and even Mr. Burke in this manner Mr. Pitt opened a way for his own elevation, by casting aspersions on the Rockingham ministry, and the adherents of this aspersions destroyed the second ministry of Pitt by retaliation upon him, his own political tactics.

Just before the formation of the Rockingham ministry the king appears to have been in extreme perplexity to find a body of men to carry on the government of the country. His majesty's private wish was to keep some of his "own friends" about him; the earl of Northumberland, in particular, he had fixed upon as the head of the Treasury. To this, neither Pitt, Bedford, nor Grenville would accede: lord Bute's son-in-law was to be fixed in a subordinate office, his brother Mackenzie to be removed from the privy-seal of Scotland, the marquis of Granby to be placed at the head of the army, and the favourite not be allowed to interfere openly or covertly in state affairs. Against these terms the king stood out some time, but his taskmasters were too closely confederated to allow him to escape, and he was ultimately obliged to submit. Horace Walpole, writing to lord Hertford on the close of this ministerial crisis, says, "You have more than once seen your old master (George II.) reduced to surrender up his closet to a cabal, but never with such circumstances of insult, indignity, and humiliation."

It is a remarkable feature of the factious squabbles which embarrassed the executive, that they were kept up by men of the same political creed. The Tories had only held power for short intervals since the revolution, and never once since the accession of the Hanoverian family. The Whigs had the government exclusively to themselves, and the several sections into which they were divided were agreed upon all great constitutional questions—upon all questions of foreign policy—upon the support of the established church, and the toleration of the dissenters—in short, upon all fundamental points,—they differed only as to the allocation of office and profit. Their quarrels from this cause produced constant official movements; in the six years from the dismissal of Mr. Legge there were 523 changes of places, outs and ins*, and in the first ten years of this reign there were seven distinct administrations. First, the ministry of Mr. Pitt, with which the reign began. Secondly, the ministry of lord Bute, which abruptly terminated after concluding the Peace of Paris. Next followed the ministry of Mr. George Grenville, who, with the earls of Egremont and Halifax, and Mr. Fox (afterwards lord Holland), were supposed to represent the Bute interest. Under this ministry originated the perplexing questions of the legality of general warrants—whether privilege of parliament extended to libel—the regency bill—and the right of the mother country to tax the American colonies. It was followed by the ministry of the marquis of Rockingham. Soon after the formation of the Rockingham ministry it sustained a great loss in the death of the duke of Cumberland, who had been principally instrumental in bringing them into power, and who formed one of their chief supports, both with the king and the nation. Their next embarrassment was the perpetual one of colonial affairs. They brought forward a bill to repeal the STAMP-DUTY imposed by their predecessors, but accompanied by the uncalled-for aggravation of another, declaratory of the entire legislative supremacy of the British parliament. After vainly endeavouring to strengthen themselves by the co-operation of Mr. Pitt, they were supplanted by that haughty and untractable statesman, who succeeded in forming what Mr. Burke termed his "Mosaic administration."

* Annual Register for 1766.

The lustre of the service of the late earl of Chatham was very inferior to the lustre of his ministry with the people by the acceptance of a peerage, and his powerful enemies were disgusted by his ambitious manœuvres to raise him to the peerage. Lord Chesterfield described the blunder of his elevation as "climbing up stairs," and prophesied that in a year he would "enjoy perfect domestic dignity." During a great part of this ministry lord Chatham was disabled, by illness, from taking an active part in public affairs, which devolved on his colleagues. The two main subjects agitated were, the embargo on the export of corn, imposed by an order of council, and the fatal resolutions introduced by Mr. Townshend (June 2nd, 1767), imposing duties upon glass, tea, and other articles, imported into America, which rekindled the flame of insurrection in the colonies, and eventually led to their severance from the parent state. The scheme of raising a revenue in America is said to have been resolved on by ministers without consulting lord Chatham, the nominal head of the cabinet. His continued indisposition having rendered some changes in the cabinet unavoidable, the king wrote to him in July, for his advice; to which his lordship returned a verbal answer,—“That such was his ill state of health that his majesty must not expect from him any advice or assistance in any arrangements whatsoever.” After the usual preliminary negotiations, bargainings, offers, and rejections, the sixth or GRAFTON MINISTRY was completed, which continued till the beginning of the year 1770. American affairs, the Middlesex election, and the arbitrary votes of the Commons, declaring the election of Mr. Wilkes void, and that gentleman ineligible to a seat in parliament, formed the perplexing subjects of the duke's government. The last, in particular, created very general dissatisfaction, as a most unconstitutional stretch of parliamentary privilege. In his two years' exile from office, the health of Chatham had been unexpectedly restored, and, though Grafton was his avowed disciple, he did not hesitate to place himself in the foremost rank of opposition, seizing every popular topic of excitement, and flaming away in the full freshness of juvenile patriotism. Public discontents were further augmented by the powerful pen of JUNIUS, who at this time made his appearance, and assailed, with unscrupulous bitterness, malignity, and force, the Grafton ministry. The duke's embarrassments were finally consummated by the conduct of lord-chancellor Camden, who voted against him on the ministerial address, and appears to have been the immediate cause of his grace's resignation. It was followed by the ministry of lord North, which subsisted twelve years, and terminated the struggles of the “great families” for the premiership.

The establishment of lord North's ministry, in 1770, forms an epoch in the history of party. By it the whigs lost the monopoly of power, which they did not recover till sixty years after. The aristocratic pressure, which the king had vainly tried to remove at the beginning of his reign, was quietly removed by the course of events. Popular excitement subsided, and an entire change at once came over the public mind. The reasons for this issue are not difficult to discover. By the appointment of a new man to the head of the Treasury the apple of discord was abstracted, and Grenville, Rockingham, Chatham, and Bedford appear to have been less mortified at the award of this prize to a stranger to their divisions than to one of themselves. The second reason was the new tone assumed at the royal court. Attempts were made to keep up national discontents by procuring addresses and remonstrances to the throne, especially from the city of London: these were received, either with dignified silence or met with a gentle rebuke, by which happy union of temper, firmness, and moderation, the public mind was tranquillized and even conciliated.

But the third and most influential cause of political quietude was the absolute paucity of questions of real national interest. Upon reflection, the turmoil of the preceding ten years must have appeared little better than an illusion, or at least without adequate occasion. The protracted affair of Mr. Wilkes had apparently originated in the struggles of a clever but profligate man for notoriety or better circumstances. Upon the great question of taxing the American colonies there was a general coincidence of opinion, both in the nation and legislature. The populace expressed no sympathy with the claim of the Bostonians to be exempt from the fiscal jurisdiction of parliament; neither does it appear there were many addresses in their favour from the county freeholders, nor the great commercial and municipal bodies of the kingdom: Among the chief political leaders there were shades of difference, which may be ascribed to their position, as they happened to be members or not of the government, but there hardly seems to have been a substantive disagreement. When Mr. Grenville first introduced his proposition for a stamp-duty, general Conway (the brother of lord Hertford) was the only member of the Commons who explicitly denied the right of parliament to tax the colonies: but subsequently, when general Conway was secretary of state, he himself introduced a resolution, declaring "the British parliament to have full power and authority to make laws and statutes of sufficient force and validity to bind the colonies in all cases whatsoever." Lord Chatham, in terms equally general and conclusive, concurred in the legislative supremacy of parliament, but in the debate on the address (Jan. 14th, 1766) drew the metaphysical distinction, that "Taxation is no part of the governing or legislative power,"—a doctrine which seems to have had no higher constitutional authority than the parliamentary privilege of an exclusive right in the Commons to originate money-bills. Lord Lyttleton was in favour of the right of taxation; and the duke of Grafton affirmed the Americans were as liable to be taxed as any man in Britain. The party to which lord Shelburne and colonel Barré belonged withheld any decided opinion; they were understood to admit the right, but deprecated unnecessarily agitating constitutional questions. The opinion of George III., it is generally known, was no exception to that of his successive ministries, the parliament, and the nation.

It may be concluded, then, that neither religion, the affair of Wilkes, nor differences on the course of American policy, had any share in the party dissensions which marked the commencement of the present reign. Their source must be sought in personal considerations only. Upon the great American question there could hardly be then, any more than now, any ground for divisions. The right of taxation was as indisputable as the right of resistance. Unrepresented Boston or Baltimore had no greater claim to exemption from parliamentary government than unrepresented Birmingham or Manchester. They participated in the advantages of the general government of the mother country, and were equally bound to contribute to its general expence. But it does not follow that they were always to remain in a state of minority and dependence. If they had the power and were competent to the task of self-government, they had an unquestionable right to its benefits, and to make the experiment.

The movements of party excepted, the other events and occurrences of the first period of the reign of George III. do not call for preliminary elucidation. These are of importance, not only from the light they cast on the motives of public characters, but from the fact that the two state factions, at the time of North's ministry, assumed those relations which they almost uninterruptedly maintained till the great reform of the representation, under William IV. From the era of the Orange revolution the Tories and the Church had been thrown into what may be termed an unnatural position; owing to their attachment to the Stuarts they were driven from Court, and the Whigs and dissenters were looked upon as the steadfast supporters and faithful advisers of the crown. All prospect, however, of restoring the exiled family having vanished, the Jacobites became gradually reconciled to the house of Brunswick, and assumed that place and preponderancy in the councils of the monarch for which, from their principles of passive loyalty, unchangeableness, and courtly subservency, they seem more appropriately suited than their opponents.

EVENTS AND OCCURRENCES.

1760. Oct. 26. GEORGE III. proclaimed king. Being born June 4th, 1738, he had completed his twenty-second year, and was grandson of the late king, and son of Frederick prince of Wales, and of Augusta princess of Saxe-Gotha. Having lived in privacy, little was known of the person and character of the new sovereign. On the death of his father in 1751, his education had been intrusted to the earl of Harcourt and the bishop of Norwich, but the formation of his character was materially influenced by the maternal ascendancy of the princess dowager, who in her turn was influenced by the councils of the earl of Bute. His first entrance into public life made a favourable impression, as appears from the testimony of contemporary observers. He had a great advantage over his predecessors, in greater affability of manner, and in being acquainted with the language, habits, and institutions of the English. Mr. Walpole gives the following description of the first appearance of George III.:—"For the king himself, he seems all good-nature, wishing to satisfy every body; all his speeches are obliging. I saw him again yesterday, and was surprised to find the levee-room had lost so entirely the air of the lion's den. This sovereign don't stand in one spot, with his eyes fixed royally on the ground, and dropping bits of German news; he walks about and speaks to every body. I saw him afterwards on the throne, where he is graceful and genteel, sits with dignity, and reads his answers to addresses well."—(Lord Orford's Works, vi. 222.) According to lord Waldegrave, as quoted by Mr. Cooke, the king possessed "abilities which, though not excellent, wanted only a proper cultivation to be tolerable: he was honest, but not generous; religious, but not charitable; willing to act justly, but not active to discover what was just; indifferent to pleasure, but averse to business; not violent in his resentments, but moody, sullen, and unforgiving towards those who provoked or incurred his displeasure."—(History of Party, ii. 398.) On his majesty's accession the nominal head of the administration was the duke of Newcastle. He was considered the leader of the Whig party, and during a period of forty years had filled a high situation at the court and the cabinet. Neither in temper nor ability was he first-rate. The presiding genius of the cabinet was Mr. Pitt, principal secretary of state. His connexion with Frederick prince of Wales, his vehement opposition to Walpole and German measures, long made him an object of dislike to George II., but his superior talents at length opened a way into the royal councils. According to the current expression of the day, he took the cabinet by storm, and from that moment a new aspect was given to public affairs. Mr. Fox, paymaster of the forces, was an able man of business and much respected, but wanted the commanding eloquence of Pitt.—(Adolphus's History of the Reign of George III., i. 9.) The chief remaining members of the administration were lord-keeper, afterwards lord chancellor, Northington; lord Carteret, president of the council; the duke of Devonshire, lord chamberlain; Mr. Legge, chancellor of the Exchequer; lord Anson, first lord of the Admiralty; and lord Holderness, secretary of state.

The person that waited on the king with the news of the birth of a prince received a present of a 500*l*. bank note.

14. Havannah taken by lord Albemarle and admiral Pococke.

21. Died, aged 72, the celebrated Lady MARY WORTLEY MONTAGU, the daughter of Evelyn duke of Kingston, by his wife Mary Fielding, the daughter of the earl of Denbigh. Lady Mary had only arrived in England in 1761, on a visit to her daughter, the countess of Bute, after an absence on the Continent of 22 years. She was a woman of an uncommon order, independent in thought and action, and of excellent sense. Her "Letters" are generally known; but some of her portraits seem drawn with a freedom more german to her own character than that of her contemporaries.

Spain. Our conquests in the East Indies were restored to the French, but we retained Senegal in Africa, and several West India Islands.

22. Parliament met. Upon the articles of peace being laid before it, Mr. Fox, the parliamentary leader of the commons, defended the ministry against the attacks of Mr. Pitt, who had not recovered the popularity he had lost by the acceptance of a pension. A vote of approval of the peace was carried by 319 to 65. Unexampled parliamentary corruption is alleged to have been employed on this occasion. Places in the royal household were needlessly multiplied, pensions lavishly granted, and 25,000*l.*, in bank-notes of 100*l.* each, distributed to the members in one day; the only stipulation of ministers being, "Give us your vote!" (Almon's Anecdotes of the Life of the Earl of Chatham, i. 347.—Wrexall's Memoirs of his Own Time.) According to the same authorities, the press also was bribed. Smollett, Mallet, Francis Home, and Murphy, were the chief instruments employed.

29. Peter Annett sentenced to stand twice in the pillory, and to be kept to hard labour in Bridewell for one year, for writing "The Free Enquirer." 8. RETIREMENT OF LORD BUTE.—The earl of Bute suddenly resigned his office of first lord of the treasury, and withdrew into private life. Mr. George Grenville succeeded him, but no change of measures attended his resignation. Almost the only supporter of the earl was the king. In the cabinet, in parliament, and in the country, he stood almost alone. In a letter to a friend, explaining the reasons of his retirement, he says, "Single in a cabinet of my own forming—no aid in the house of lords to support me except two peers (lords Denbigh and Pomfret), both the secretaries of state silent, and the lord-chief-justice, whom I brought myself into office, voting for me, but speaking against me,—the ground I tread upon is so hollow, that I am afraid, not only of falling myself, but of involving my royal master in my ruin. It is time for me to retire."—(Adolphus's Hist. of the Reign of George III.) Before this, the several sections of the opposition had coalesced, and commenced giving weekly dinners at each other's houses. The notion that the influence of the earl continued long after his retirement—that he formed that "influence behind the throne greater than the throne itself"—seems to have been a popular delusion, encouraged for factious purposes. It was only suspected, never supported by any proof; and general Conway, while secretary of state, denied that he had ever "seen, felt, or discovered" any such influence. The facts seem correctly stated in a letter written October, 1778, by lord Mount-stuart, the earl of Bute's son; and which has the following explicit declaration:—"He (lord Bute) does therefore authorize me to say, that he declares upon his solemn word of honour that he has not had the honour of waiting on his majesty but at his levee or drawing-room; nor has he presumed to offer an advice or opinion concerning the disposition of offices, or the conduct of measures, either directly or indirectly, by himself or any other, from the time when the late duke of Cumberland was consulted in the arrangement of a ministry in 1765, to the present hour." CONFERENCES WITH MR. PITT.—With a view of strengthening the ministry, lord Bute undertook to open a negotiation with Mr. Pitt. They met on the 25th instant, at Mr. Pitt's house in Jermyn-street; and the result was an appointment with the king on the 27th at the queen's palace. The conference lasted three hours; in the course of which Mr. Pitt very freely delivered his sentiments, representing that the great whig families had been driven from his majesty's councils and service, and that it would be equally the interest of the king and the nation to restore them. On the renewal of the conference on the 29th, Mr. Pitt enforced these topics, saying that "affairs could not be carried on without the great families who have supported the Revolution government, and others of whose abilities and integrity the public has had experience." The king suggested, first, lord Northumberland, and next, lord Temple, for the treasury; to which Pitt objected, and the conference abruptly terminated, the king saying, "Well, Mr. Pitt, I see this won't do; my honour is concerned, and I must support it." (Lord Hardwicke's Letter to his Son Lord Rgyulton.) On the 9th of September the government was completed, by making lord Sandwich secretary of state, the earl of Egmont succeeding him as first lord of the Admiralty. Same day the duke of Bedford was made lord-president of the council; and the ministry came to be considered as the duke of Bedford's ministry.

COMMERCIAL CRISIS.—In the course of the summer there was a surprising number of bankruptcies on the Continent. They began at Amsterdam on the 29th of July, by the failure of two brothers named Neufville, for 330,000 guineas, and a Jew, who a few days before, failed for between 30,000 and 40,000. These two bankruptcies occasioned, or at least hastened, a stoppage of payment by no less than eighteen houses in that city. They were followed by a still greater number of failures at Hamburg and other places, which gave such a blow to private credit, as almost wholly to interrupt commercial transactions. But the Lombard-houses at Hamburg and Amsterdam stood forward on the occasion; and, by advancing large sums of money to such as could give proper security, helped to restore mercantile confidence. (Macpherson's Annals of Commerce, iv. 8.) England being exempt from this calamity, rendered considerable assistance to the foreign merchants.

Many lives were lost, and special commissions issued for the trial of the rioters. Government at the same time took measures for remedying the scarcity, by abating the restrictions on the corn trade; the ports were opened for the importation of wheat, and an embargo (Sept. 26), by royal authority, laid on its export, parliament at the time being in a state of prorogation.

Nov. 11. Parliament opened by the king. Four amendments moved on the address were negatived.

18. A bill of indemnity introduced for the embargo imposed by an order of council. It was warmly debated in both houses. Alderman Beckford made the strange blunder of arguing for a suspensive power in the crown. It was justified by Chatham on the plea of necessity only. Lord Camden excited astonishment by taking the high ground of prerogative, while Lord Mansfield took the contrary ground of the law and constitution.

Dec. 16. Parliament adjourned, after the royal assent had been given to the bill of indemnity for the advisers of the embargo.

1767. Jan. 6. Peter, the wild man, who was taken in the Hartz Forest when a youth and sent as a present to George II., was brought from Cheshunt to be seen by the royal family. He could, like Shakspeare's Caliban, fetch wood and water, but not articulate any language.

The winter unusually severe throughout Europe; even in Italy the cold was so intense as to drive the poor from their habitations in the country to seek shelter in the cities, many perishing on the roads.

Mar. 2. In the commons Mr. Grenville moved that the land-tax be reduced from 4*s.* to 3*s.* in the pound. This motion was carried against ministers by a majority of 206 to 188. It was the first money-bill in which any minister had been defeated since the revolution.

31. The jesuits forcibly expelled from Spain; 970 of them were conveyed to Italy. In May the parliament of Paris published an arrêt, declaring them foes to sovereigns and the tranquillity of states. At Naples the storm fell upon them in November, and from that city and every port of the kingdom they were conveyed to the pope's territories.

May 6. The general court of India proprietors voted a dividend of 12*½* per cent., which was rescinded (June 24) by an act of parliament, directing that future dividends shall be fixed by ballot in a court called for the purpose.

June 2. The chancellor of the exchequer introduces his resolutions for imposing duties upon glass, paper, tea, and other articles imported into America. They had the effect of reviving the differences between the mother country and her colonies.

The practice of crimping for the East India service was now common. Several were tried for illegally confining persons in lock-up houses in the metropolis; especially a noted one in Chancery-lane.

July 2. Parliament prorogued.

During the summer divisions in the ministry became apparent. Lord Chatham, who, though nominally at the head of the administration had, together with his popularity, lost much of his consequence, was reduced by ill health to a state which rendered him entirely incapable of business. Proposals were made to the marquis of Rockingham and the duke of Bedford; but these noblemen could not agree, the former requiring that general Conway, and the latter Mr. Rigby, should be leader of the commons. These negotiations continued to the end of the year.

In the course of the last session 94 public and 114 private bills received the royal assent.

15. Lord Clive arrived from India.

Nov. 14. The colliers at Stourbridge forced the farmers to sell their wheat at 5*s.* a bushel.

24. Parliament opened by the king.

Dec. 1. Lord North appointed chancellor of the exchequer. Mr. Thomas Townshend, afterwards viscount Sydney, succeeded his lordship, as joint paymaster of the forces, and Mr. Townshend's place; as one of the lords of the treasury, was given to Mr. Charles Jenkinson, afterwards lord Hawkesbury and earl of Liverpool. These arrangements were made without communication with lord Chatham, whose composite ministry had silently fallen to pieces.

19. Earl Gower made lord president of the council.

20. Prayers were publicly read in all the popish chapels in Ireland for George III. and family; being the first time the royal family have been publicly prayed for by the catholics since the revolution of 1688.

MORTALITY IN WORKHOUSES.—The great mortality of children in the London workhouses had for some time fixed the attention of philanthropists. By an act of this year, amending a former statute, it is provided, that all parish poor within the bills of mortality, under six years of age, shall be registered; that all such children within a fortnight after birth, or received into the workhouse, shall be sent to a distance of at least three miles from London and Westminster to be nursed; that premiums shall be given to good nurses; and that 2s. 6d. a week shall be allowed for the maintenance of each child till it is six years of age; and not less than 2s. from that time to the period the child is taken away. Dr. Price remarks, that prior to this statute almost all parish children in the metropolis died in the first six years.

1768. Jan. 5. The military called in to quell the tumults of the Spitalfields weavers.

14. The severe frost, which had continued from the 21st ult. broke up.

20. GRAFTON MINISTRY.—Lord Weymouth appointed secretary of state in the room of general Conway, who, on retiring from the cabinet, succeeded viscount Townshend in the office of lieutenant-general of the ordnance. On the same day the earl of Hillsborough was appointed secretary of state for the colonies, a new office, which the increased importance of colonial affairs was thought to render expedient. These appointments completed the Grafton ministry, and temporarily satisfied the different sections of politicians, though not fundamentally differing from the preceding administration.

29. The republic of Venice issued a decree forbidding the religious orders to receive any new noviciate for twenty years.

Feb. 2. Royal assent given to an act for limiting the duration of the parliaments of Ireland, which had hitherto been only terminated with a demise of the crown. They were limited to eight years, and as their sittings were only every second winter, four sessions only were allotted them for the transaction of business.

12. Six students of Edmund-hall, Oxford, were expelled the university, for methodism, taking upon them to pray, expound the Scriptures, and sing hymns, in a private house.

19. DEATH OF STERNE.—Died in his 55th year, of pulmonary consumption, the author of "Tristram Shandy" and the "Sentimental Journey." Mr. Sterne, like most distinguished writers, freely availed himself of the productions of others, but his general claims to originality are indisputable. His works must continue to be popular with humourists, and with that large class of readers, who test the morality of human actions, not by their consequences, but the fluctuating standard of impulsive feeling. There may be mischief in the exclusive dominion of either reason or sentime—one tending to excessive selfishness, the other to folly and caprice.

ARRAIGNING WILKES.—Mr. Wilkes, who had been almost forgotten, was brought into notice by the general election. His outlawry had obliged him to reside on the continent, whence he had written to the duke of Grafton, entreating him to mediate his pardon with the king. His application being disregarded, he ventured, on the dissolution of parliament to come over and offer himself a candidate for the city of London. A large show of hands declared in his favour, but he was the last on the poll (23rd inst.); upon which he offered himself for Middlesex, and was returned by a large majority on the 28th inst. Immediately after his election he made his appearance in the court of King's-bench, when the question of his committal on his sentence of outlawry was discussed. He was eventually ordered into custody, but it was not till he had been first rescued by the mob, and had made his escape from them and surrendered himself, that he was at length safely lodged in the King's-bench prison, where he was at the meeting of parliament. On that day (May 10th) the populace assembled in great force, with the determination of conveying him in triumph to the house of commons. Being disappointed, a dreadful tumult ensued; the riot act was read, or rather attempted to be read; and the soldiers having been ordered to fire, five or six persons were killed and about fifteen wounded. The conduct of the soldiers received public thanks from the highest authority, whilst the title of the Massacre of St. George's Fields was popularly given to the action.

During the last month and up to the present, the metropolis had been disturbed by unceasing riots and tumultuous processions, originating in the proceedings of Wilkes, and in disputes respecting wages. Individuals were assaulted in the streets, and attempts made to demolish their houses. The sailors and coal-heavers used to meet, armed with deadly weapons, in Stepney-fields, where dreadful fights ensued, in which some were killed and many wounded.

Oct. 18. The first stone of the Leeds infirmary laid by Edwin Hascelles, esq., one of the county members.

15. Lord Chatham resigned the privy seal; an office which he had long only nominally filled. His retirement passed without notice, being expected by the ministry, little regarded by the people, and almost unknown to the continent; forming a remarkable contrast with the sensation produced by his dismissal in 1757, and his resignation in 1761. He was succeeded by Harvey, earl of Bristol.

21. The earl of Shelburne resigned, and was succeeded by lord Weymouth, to whom the earl of Rochford was appointed successor.

Nov. 8. Parliament opened by the king. The debates on the address have not been preserved.

17. Died, Thomas Pelham Holles, duke of Newcastle, in the 76th year of his age. His grace had played a bustling if not a brilliant part in the political transactions of the last half century.

Dec. 18. The Academy of Arts founded by the king, for the encouragement of painting and sculpture. Joshua Reynolds the first president.

21. The king of Sweden, after a severe struggle with an oligarchical senate, which had equally usurped the prerogatives of the monarch and the franchises of the people, convoked the states of the kingdom, as a prelude to future changes.

The republic of Genoa, finding its efforts for the recovery of Corsica baffled by general Paoli and other patriots, concluded a treaty in this summer with the French court, by which that island was conditionally ceded to France.

The American colonies continued in a very perturbed state. Attempts were made to form a convention of the colonies; serious tumults broke out in Boston; and general Gage arrived in September with two regiments from Ireland, to preserve tranquillity.

Feb. 2. Mr. Wilkes expelled the house of commons by a majority of 219 to 137.

11. A subscription opened at Cambridge, for a poor clergyman at Brandon in Suffolk, who, by two wives, has had 28 children, and whose income is 65*l.* a year for the service of two churches, nine miles apart, and the teaching of a free school besides.

13. Both houses addressed the king on the critical state of affairs in America; approving, however, the coercive course of ministers.

16. Mr. Wilkes re-elected for Middlesex.

17. Declared incapable of sitting in the house of commons by a majority of 235 to 89.

Mar. 2. Provision made for the payment of the arrears of the civil list, amounting to 400,000*l.* It was the first of those exceedings in the royal expenditure which frequently occurred in the present reign.

16. Mr. Wilkes re-elected a third time for Middlesex.

17. The house of commons declare the election void, and order a new writ to be issued. This unremitting warfare of authority against an individual had the natural effect of inflaming the popular zeal in his favour; subscriptions were raised for his support, and a meeting of the freeholders of Middlesex was called, at which some members of parliament attended, when it was resolved to re-elect him free of expense.

April. Sieur Bougainville, the French circumnavigator, returned from his voyage of discovery in the South Sea. Though absent nearly three years he lost only seven of his men by sickness, which he ascribed to the use of distilled water, lemonade, and the ventilation of his ship.

4. Hyder Ali, the adventurous Indian chief, marched to Madras, and forced the English to conclude a treaty with him, stipulating for a restitution of conquests.

An act of parliament passed this month, allowing the East India company to hold the territorial revenues for five years, paying 400,000*l.* per ann. to government. Col. Ford and Messrs. Vansittart and Scrafton were appointed supervisors to proceed to India with full powers. They sailed from England, but were never more heard of; ship supposed to be lost.

13. A fresh election for Middlesex. On this occasion ministers had procured a military candidate, colonel Luttrell, who was not to be intimidated by popular tumult from appearing on the hustings. The election proceeded quietly, and terminated in 1143 votes for Mr. Wilkes, and 296 for colonel Luttrell.

14. The house of commons again declared the election of John Wilkes, esq., null and void.

16. After long debates, which lasted till three o'clock in the morning, colonel Luttrell was declared duly elected. This decision produced more general discontent than any measure since the commencement of this reign, the popular party regarding it as a flagrant violation of the freedom of election, to seat a candidate by an arbitrary vote of the house, who had only an inconsiderable minority in his favour. The ferment spread from the metropolis throughout the kingdom, and numerous petitions were carried at public meetings of counties and towns requesting the king to dissolve parliament. On the other hand, addresses were procured the Parliamentary petition, exposing the dangerousness of factious proceedings, and approving the measures of government.

17. The king visited farmer Kennet of Petts-hall, in Surrey, to see his new invented ploughs and other improvements in husbandry.

27. The Society of Arts adjudged a gold medal to Arthur Young, esq., for his mode of rearing and fattening hogs.

Hay-hill (now Hill-street, Berkeley-square) sold for 20,000*l*. Queen Anne granted it to the speaker of the house of commons, which causing a clamour, as being a bribe, the speaker sold it for 200*l*., and gave the proceeds to the poor.

In the Swedish diet, which opened this month at Norkiopting, a secret committee brought twenty-four articles of accusation against the senate, the consequence of which was the degradation of all its members except two.

May 8. The commons, after hearing counsel in support of the Middlesex petition against the return of colonel Luttrell, reiterated their former resolution, that he was duly elected. Next day parliament was prorogued.

19. Cardinal Ganganelli proclaimed pope under the title of Clement XIV.

24. The Middlesex petition presented to the king. It was signed by 1565 freeholders, who were supposed to be possessed of above two-thirds of the property in the county.

The number of negro slaves bartered for in one year (1768) on the coast of Africa, from Cape Blanco to Rio Congo, by the different European nations, were as follows:—Britain 53,000; British America 6300; France 23,520; Holland 11,300; Portugal 1700; Denmark 1200: in all 104,100, bought at an average of about 15*l*. each.

Aug. 29. The electors of Westminster assembled in Westminster-hall to petition the king for a dissolution of parliament. Meetings of freeholders, in most counties, were held for a similar purpose.

A woman was lately arrested at Vienna, charged with having killed above 100 children. Her employment was to nurse at her own house, the children of women who themselves were nurses in great families, and also the infants of such as did not choose to own them. It was her custom to get some months' board paid her in advance, and in a short time after she came to tell the mother of the death of her child,

23. M. Barretti, a foreigner and literary character, was tried for murder at the Old-bailey, and acquitted. It arose from an affray occasioned by a girl of the town, in which Barretti in his own defence mortally stabbed a man. Sir Joshua Reynolds, Dr. Johnson, Messrs. Beauclerc, Goldsmith, Burke, and Garrick, appeared in favour of the character of the accused.

It appears, that from 1748 to 1769, 10,471 prisoners have been tried at the Old-bailey.

24. Mungo Campbell, an excise officer, shot Lord Eglington, who had attempted to disarm him when shooting on his lordship's grounds.

Nov. A patient in the London-hospital had his arm amputated at the shoulder-joint; an operation which had not been performed in England these twenty years.

10. The long-agitated cause between lord Halifax and Mr. Wilkes, respecting the seizure of the person and papers of the latter, was decided in the Common-pleas, before chief-justice Wilmot. After a full hearing, the jury brought in a verdict for the plaintiff, with 4000*l*. damages; and it was thought the jury would have given a larger sum, had it not transpired that Halifax had, before his resignation in 1765, obtained a privy-seal warrant, guaranteeing to him all the expenses attending this prosecution.

The king of Portugal issued an edict by which widows above 50 years of age were forbidden to marry: "Because," says the edict, "experience has shown that women of that age commonly marry young men of no property, who dissipate the fortunes which such marriages put them in possession of, to the prejudice of the children and other near relations of their wives."

Dec. During the autumn, violent disturbances had taken place among the weavers of Spitalfields, on account of wages, in the course of which the manufacture was often cut from the loom, and other outrages committed. Some of the cutters being apprehended, two of them were convicted, and ordered to be executed at Bethnal-green. But some doubt relative to the legality of altering the place of execution having arisen, the judges were consulted, who gave it as their opinion that the king had a right to fix the place of execution. Accordingly the sentence was executed, in the midst of a riotous assembly, by the civil power only, the sheriffs having declined the assistance of the military.

3. A list of pensions laid before the Irish parliament; from which it appears that those on the civil-list only amounted to 81,036*l*.

26. Lord Townshend, the viceroy of Ireland, suddenly prorogued the parliament to a distant day, leaving affairs in great confusion. This was done in resentment of the conduct of the Irish house of commons, in rejecting a money-bill sent over in October by the English privy-council, in assertion of a right claimed under Poyning's law, by which no bills are to pass in Ireland that have not been previously ratified by the English privy-council.

The contest of the Corsicans for their independence was in this year terminated by their total subjugation. The sovereign-council of the island was suppressed, and Corsica in all respects considered a part of the French dominions.

The French East India Company was declared bankrupt, and the trade thrown open.

1770. Jan. 9. MEETING OF PARLIAMENT. --The king opened parliament with a speech, calling their attention to the distemper that had broken out among the horned cattle, and the disorders in the colonies, but made no allusion to the Middlesex election. An amendment to the address was moved, to inquire "into the causes of the present unhappy discontents," which was negatived by 254 to 138. The original address was defended, in a maiden speech, by Charles James Fox, afterwards the celebrated leader of the opposition. In the lords the original address was carried by 203 to 36. Lord Chatham and lord-chancellor Camden voted in the minority. The health of the former had been in an unexpected degree restored, after an almost total secession from business for nearly two years.

16. Lord Camden requested to deliver up the seals to the king. Next day they were delivered to Charles Yorke, who had been attorney-general in the Bute and Rockingham ministries. Several resignations followed these changes.

17. Sir John Cust resigned the speakership of the commons, and died on the 22nd instant. He was succeeded by sir Fletcher Norton, who a short time before had been appointed to the sinecure place of one of the chief justices-in-Eyre.

20. Died by his own hands, in the 48th year of his age, Lord Chancellor Yorke. Mr. Yorke was to have been executed by the guillotine at Fotheringhay, but his death took place before his patent of peerage was completed. He was the second son of the late lord-chancellor Hardwicke; and his suicide is ascribed to remorse in not observing a promise he made to his elder brother, to refuse any offers of the court. The great seal, after being refused by the two chief-justices, was put in commission.

22. On a motion for an inquiry into the state of the nation, the earl of Chatham expressed himself in favour of a reform of the county representation. But national confidence was lost, and none of the patriotic ebullitions of his lordship ever recovered for him the splendid position he once held in public estimation.

28. The duke of Grafton unexpectedly resigned his post of first lord of the treasury. His grace was educated a whig, and commenced his career under the auspices of Chatham. His public character appears to have been unfairly depreciated by the malignant invectives of Junius.

LORD NORTH'S MINISTRY. --The resignation of the duke of Grafton made a reconstruction of the ministry necessary. Lord North was now placed at the head of the government, with the office of first lord of the treasury, in addition to that he had for two years held, of chancellor of the exchequer. His premiership lasted 12 years, and brought to a close the long series of rapid changes that had occurred in the present reign. With the exception of the Pelham ministry, it was the first stable government the country had had since the overthrow of sir Robert Walpole, twenty-eight years before. For the most part, however, the new ministry was a continuation of that of the duke of Grafton. The earl of Halifax, as lord privy-seal, was the only new name introduced into the cabinet, and in the subordinate places of government the changes were few. The subjoined exhibits the state of the ministry, as completed in the following month of May:-- Premier, Lord North.

President of the Council, Earl Gower.

Lord Privy-Seal, Earl of Halifax.

First Lord of the Admiralty, Sir Edward Hawke.

Secretaries of State, Lords Weymouth and Rochford.

Colonial Secretary, Earl of Hillsborough.

Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Lord Stanley.

Secretary-at-War, Viscount Barrington.

Paymaster-General of the Forces, Richard Rigby, Esq.

Treasurer of the Navy, Sir Gilbert Elliot.

Postmasters-General, Lords Le Despencer and Sandwich.

*Attorney-General, William De Grey, Esq.
Solicitor-General, Edward Thurlow, Esq.
Lieutenant-General of the Ordnance, General Conway.*

Peer of Ireland, Viscount Townshend.

Charles James Fox, the second son of lord Holland, was a junior lord of the admiralty; and Charles Jenkinson, afterwards the earl of Liverpool, a junior lord of the treasury, in the North ministry.

Feb. 2. Forty-eight peers make a public declaration, that they will not cease their efforts until they have obtained full justice to the electors of Britain, injured by the disqualifying resolution of the house of commons on the Middlesex election. Among the names signing this declaration, were those of Richmond, Devonshire, Rockingham, Chatham, Thanet, Radnor, Temple, Fitzwilliam, Grosvenor, King, and Tankerville. Notwithstanding this, the political excitement which had prevailed in the two preceding years, began to subside under the new ministry, whose strength consisted in unity of sentiment. Ostensibly the several sections of the opposition, under Chatham, Rockingham, and George Grenville, had been reconciled, but little of the union, which held together the ministerial forces, reigned in their camp. From the first, the new ministry was supported by large majorities in both houses, while the opposition every session became less numerous and united.

3. A riot at Chirk to oppose the militia-act.

9. A splendid entertainment at the Mansion-house. The dukes of Devonshire and Bolton, sir George Saville, and Edmund Burke, esq. among the guests.

11. A motion made in the commons to disqualify certain revenue-officers from voting at elections, was negatived by the efforts of the minister. Also a motion for the production of accounts of the civil-list expenditure.

12. A very full house of commons—451 members present. By a list in the "Court Calendar," 192 held places under the government.

18. During divine service at St. Kevern, in Cornwall, the lightning shivered the steeple and threw it upon the body of the church. Many of the congregation had their clothes singed, and some their watches melted.

26. Mungo Campbell convicted of the murder of lord Eglington. He afterwards committed suicide by hanging himself in the Tolbooth.

Mar. 5. Lord North moved that the obnoxious port-duties, imposed in 1767 on the Americans, be repealed, excepting the duty on tea. The tea-duty, which was only 3d. in the pound, and produced only 16,000*l.* per annum, was agowedly maintained on the principle of asserting the legislative supremacy of Britain. An amendment to repeal the tea-duty was negatived by 204 to 142.

News soon after arrived of an attack on the king's troops by the people of Boston on the 5th instant, the day the minister brought forward his conciliatory proposition.

7. Mr. Grenville introduced his bill for regulating the proceedings of the house in controverted elections. It passed into a law; and provided that instead of deciding contested elections at the bar of the house, committees should be nominated by ballot to determine upon each case, and the members be sworn to strict impartiality.

Some gentlemen, encouraged by the Society of Arts, made experiments near Kew, to hatch eggs in heated dung, after the Egyptian fashion. Their first attempts did not succeed, owing, it was supposed, to damp: they succeeded in small quantities.

11. About three in the morning, the Chester mail was robbed between London and Islington by a single highwayman, who was soon after detected negotiating a bill, the payment of which had been stopped. He was a young man, had just taken a grocer's shop, and was about to be married.

14. The corporation of London present a remonstrance to the king. Remonstrances were also presented from Westminster and other places. They were received, and given to the lord in waiting, and no answer returned.

23. A joint address from the lords and commons, deprecatory of the city remonstrance.

Apr. 7. The synagogue of the Jews advertised a reward for the detection of all such of their brethren as receive stolen goods.

23. CITY ADDRESS TO THE KING.—Another address was presented to the king from the corporation of London, in which they lamented the royal displeasure they had incurred in consequence of their former remonstrance, to the sentiments of which they, nevertheless, expressed their adherence; and again prayed for a dissolution of parliament. His majesty, in answer, said that he "should have been wanting to the public, as well as to himself, had he made such an use of the prerogative as was inconsistent with the interest, and dangerous to the constitution of the kingdom." The lord-mayor Beckford, a man of fearless spirit, and much democratic pride, demanded leave to answer the king. In the momentary confusion which this demand occasioned, permission was granted: and, with great presence of mind and fluency of language, he delivered an extempore address to his majesty, concluding in the following words:—"Permit me, Sire, further to observe, that whoever has already dared, or shall hereafter endeavour, by false insinuations and suggestions, to alienate your majesty's affections from your loyal subjects in general, and from the city of London in particular, and to withdraw your confidence from, and regard for, your people, is an enemy to your majesty's person and family, a violator of the public peace, and a betrayer of our happy constitution as it was established at the glorious and necessary revolution." The lord-mayor waited near a minute for a reply, but none was given. "The king," says Mr. Belsham, "who was accused of the indecorum of laughing at the former address, now reddened with anger and astonishment." But when the lord-mayor went up to St. James's a few days after (30th instant), with the customary congratulations on the birth of a princess, the lord-chamberlain came into the ante-chamber with a paper in his hand, and read to the following effect:—"As your lordship thought fit to speak to his majesty after his answer to the late remonstrance, I am to acquaint your lordship, as it was unusual, his majesty desires that nothing of the kind may happen for the future."

31. DREADFUL ACCIDENT.—On a grand exhibition of fireworks at Paris, to commemorate the marriage of the dauphin with the archduchess Maria Antoinette, of Austria, 3000 persons were killed or wounded (Annual Register, xiii., 113). This dreadful catastrophe arose from some of the fire falling among the spectators, which occasioned an alarm and pressure in the assembled multitude. The number of dead amounted to 712.

June 13. TRIAL OF WOODFALL.—A political writer, under the signature of JUNIUS, had, since January, 1769, excited attention by letters in the newspapers, distinguished as well by the force and elegance of their style, as the virulence of their attacks on individuals. Of these compositions, the most celebrated is an address to the king, in a letter first printed in the "Public Advertiser" of December 19th, exhibiting a striking picture of his administration. Its appearance drew upon Woodfall, the publisher, an ex-officio prosecution; and the author himself remaining, as he has ever since done, concealed. On the trial, lord Mansfield informed the jury that they had nothing to do with the intention of the writer, their province was limited to the fact of publishing, and whether a proper construction was put on the blanks in the paper of the information; the truth or falsehood of the alleged libel was wholly immaterial. The jury, however, after being out nine hours, found a verdict of guilty of printing and publishing only, which was, in effect, an acquittal. Some of the printers and venders of the letter were brought in guilty, and punished with fine and imprisonment, but others were acquitted.

27. Died, in his 72nd year, Dr. John Jortin, an eminent divine of the church of England, and author of the "Remarks on Ecclesiastical History."

Sept. The city of Dantzic, hitherto deemed under the protection of Poland, was surprised by a body of Prussians and the garrison made prisoners. The pretence of this was, that the Dantzickers had refused to pass, without examination, some casks of silver sent to the Prussian resident. The city was compelled to pay 75,000 ducats, and make some humiliating concessions to purchase forgiveness of the rapacious monarch of Prussia.

30. Died, at Newbury-park in America, in the 56th year of his age, George Whitefield, the founder of the Calvinistic methodists. He possessed extraordinary natural eloquence, but was inferior to Mr. Wesley in grasp of intellect and even scholarship.

Dec. 3. Lord-mayor Crosby refuses to back the press-warrants, alleging that the city bounty was intended to prevent such violence.

The net expense of building Blackfriars bridge ascertained to be 152,840*l*.

DISPUTES ON THE FALKLAND ISLANDS.—The seizure of the Falkland Islands by the Spaniards caused an augmentation of the army and navy. After some negotiation the affair was settled by the restoration of the islands to the English, but with a secret arrangement, as is understood, that they should be eventually given up to Spain. In point of fact they were evacuated by England three years after. The affair was the subject of much parliamentary debate, and some ministerial changes, but not such as to alter the political cast of the administration.

FRANCE.—The differences between the court and the parliaments increased. The duke d'Aiguillon having made himself obnoxious by his government of Brittany, he was complained of to the crown. The duke was brought to trial before the peers and the parliament of Paris. The trial seemed to go against d'Aiguillon, when the king suddenly interfered and put a stop to the proceedings. The princes of the blood expressed their disapprobation, and the parliament forbade the duke from appearing among them. The king annulled this arrest. The parliaments of other provinces remonstrated, but the king was inexorable, and took violent measures against them. Officers of the army were sent to compel the registering of the royal edicts, or to tear in pieces the arrêts of the parliament, and to banish or imprison some of the members.

A terrible famine this year desolated Bengal, in which one-third of the population perished.

1771. Jan. MINISTERIAL CHANGES.—The earl of Halifax succeeded lord Weymouth in his secretaryship, and the earl of Suffolk became lord privy-seal. Lord Sandwich was placed at the head of the Admiralty, vice vi, Edward Hawke. Judge Bathurst was promoted to the chancellorship, with the title of baron Apsley. Mr. de Grey being made chief-justice of the common-pleas was succeeded in the attorney-generalship by Mr. Thurlow, the solicitor-general, who was succeeded by Mr. Alexander Wedderburne, afterwards baron Loughborough and earl of Roslyn.

2. The death of the duke of Argyle having caused a vacancy in the representative peerage of Scotland, the earl of Stair, the court candidate, was chosen. The earl of Selkirk and thirteen other noblemen signed a protest against the return, on the ground of the interference of ministers in the election, by circular letters, which, though couched in terms of simple good wishes for the candidate approved, were meant to be compulsory on all who expected favours from the administration.

Feb. NEWSPAPER REPORTING.—About the commencement of this year the newspapers began to report the parliamentary debates. Before this time they had only been given in monthly magazines and other periodicals published at considerable intervals. The idea of daily reporting them was an innovation on the former practice and in direct violation of the standing orders of the house. A complaint on this ground having been made on the 8th inst. by a member against two of the printers, an order was issued for their attendance, with which they refused to comply; and on one of them being arrested in the city, under the authority of the speaker's warrant, he was carried before alderman Wilkes, who, regarding the caption as illegal, discharged him. Two more printers being apprehended and carried before lord-mayor Crosby and aldermen Oliver and Wilkes, they also were discharged, and the messenger of the commons held to bail for false imprisonment. The house of commons, enraged at this during contempt of their authority, committed their two members, Crosby and Oliver, to the Tower. A committee was appointed by ballot, to consider the most advisable mode of further proceeding; after sitting till April 30th, it made a report, that one of the printers should be taken into the custody of the serjeant-at-arms. Nothing further being suggested, the house burst into a roar of laughter as such an impotent conclusion. Eventually the matter was suffered to drop; aldermen Crosby and Oliver walked out of the Tower at the end of the session, and ever since the printers have reported parliamentary proceedings.

12. Died suddenly, Adolphus Frederick, king of Sweden. He was succeeded by Gustavus III., who was then at Paris. A general election taking place soon after, for members of the duct, the majority returned were of the country party or cups, who were in opposition to the court party or hats, who were favourable to an arbitrary monarchy.

April 9. The Society of the Bill of Rights held a large meeting, at which was a violent altercation, chiefly on money matters, between alderman John Wilkes and the rev. John Horne, which ended in a motion to dissolve the society.

May 1. With reference to the committal of the messengers of the house of commons by the city magistrates, a committee of the house reported, first, that there is no instance of any court or magistrate having presumed to commit, during the sitting of parliament, an officer of the house for executing the orders of the house. Secondly, that there is no instance of the house having suffered any person committed by the order of the house, to be discharged during the same session by any authority whatsoever, without again committing such person. The city magistrates had, on the 22nd and 30th ult., applied to the superior courts to be discharged, but were remanded.

The property of suitors in the court of Chancery declared to amount to 5,300,000*l*.

21. Died in his 51st year, in the neighbourhood of Leighorn, Tobias SMOLLETT, M.D., a writer of great industry and varied powers, as novelist, historian, and poet. Smollett's Complete History of England, published in 1758, in four volumes, 4to, affords an extraordinary instance of literary facility, being completed in fourteen months. It was afterwards printed in weekly numbers, and continued by Guthrie to 1765, under the auspices of the author. (Gorton's Biographical Dictionary.) Smollett was a man of independent mind and generous dispositions, but of acrimonious temperament. He is said to have had no patron but the booksellers, which means, he depended for subsistence on the sale of his writings, a circumstance that may account for the number as well as want of polish of some of his productions.

22. Mr. Stephen, who had published a book on the impolicy of imprisonment for debt, was expelled by the benchers from the Temple.

In this month the incessant rains occasioned unusual floods in various parts of England, especially in the northern counties, where great damage was sustained. One of the most remarkable was the bursting of Solway Moss in Cumberland, ten miles north of Carlisle; the contents of which rushed like a torrent over the adjacent low tracts, sweeping away houses, trees, and cattle, and converting many acres of arable land into a black bog. In Germany too, there were extraordinary inundations, which, added to an inclement season, and consequent scarcity of the necessaries of life, caused great distress to the inhabitants.

FRANCE.—This year the disputes between the king and the parliaments were brought to a crisis. The parliament of Paris refusing to comply with the arbitrary mandates of the court, the members were all banished to villages near to or distant from Paris. The parliaments of Besançon, Bordeaux, Toulouse, and Brittany, were totally suppressed, most of the members sent into banishment, and new courts erected in their stead.

RUSSIA.—The plague committed great ravages at Moscow. It appears to have existed there for some months, concealed under the disguise of a malignant fever; but in the autumn it showed itself under its true colours, and made a most dreadful havoc. Fanaticism augmented the mischief by inspiring a faith in the power of the effigy of a certain saint to dispel the disease; and the vast crowds brought together through that persuasion served to propagate the infection beyond the possibility of restraint. The archbishop Ambrosius having ordered the removal of the picture, an infuriated mob pursued him to a monastery, in which he had taken refuge, dragged him from the altar, and murdered him in a most barbarous manner. To quell the savage tumult, a body of troops fired into the midst of the crowd and killed a great number.—Aikin's Annals of George III. p. 109.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—Thomas Gray, 55, author of the "Elegy written in a Country Churchyard." Gray might have accomplished much more than the poem by which he is commonly known. He was a scholar of varied attainments and fruitful in literary projects, but wanted energy and perseverance.

Claude Adrian Helvetius, 56, known by his metaphysical treatise, "De l'Esprit," in which he endeavoured to show that the diversities in character in men well-organized, are the result of external circumstances.

8. Died, aged 53, the princess Dowager of Wales, mother of the king. She had five sons and four daughters by her late husband, Frederick prince of Wales. The influence of the princess, in concert with her favourite, lord Bute, is supposed to have determined the commencing policy of the present reign, the object of which was to render the crown more independent of the nobility. With this view, according to the testimony of sir Nathaniel Wraxall, the constant exhortation of the princess to her son was, "George, be King."

11. A motion made in the commons to bring in a bill to quiet the dormant claims of the church, the revival of which, in several instances, had proved a heavy

18. A vote of thanks to Dr. Nowell for his sermon on the 30th of January, it containing despotical sentiments, expunged from the journals.

20. ROYAL MARRIAGE ACT.—A message from the king to both houses of parliament, claiming the right of approving all marriages of the royal family, and which, it alleged, always vested in the crown. In consequence, a bill was introduced into the lords, for rendering all the descendants of the late king incapable of contracting marriage without the previous consent of his majesty or his successors; but such descendants being above 25 years of age, on giving the privy council 12 months' previous notice, may, after the expiration of that term, marry without the royal assent, unless both houses of parliament should, within that time, declare their disapprobation of it: this bill, which was opposed with great vigour in both houses, was ultimately passed. It originated in the recent marriages of the king's brothers, the duke of Cumberland with Mrs. Horton, and the duke of Gloucester with lady Waldegrave, neither of which had been recognised at court.

On the 22nd instant a meeting of the principal merchants was held in London, with the view of supporting private credit and arresting the panic. The following year the evil extended to the continent, and the number of failures was unprecedented.

Aug. 1. REVOLUTION IN SWEDEN.—Sweden was this month the scene of an extraordinary revolution, effected by means of the army, and with great address and dissimulation on the part of the king. By the new form of government, dictated by Gustavus, the whole executive power, the nomination of the senate, the appointment and removal of judges, the imposition of taxes, and the disposal of the public money, is vested in the crown. These changes were announced by the king at an assembly of the estates in a long speech, at the end of which he took a psalter out of his pocket and began to sing a Te Deum, in which the whole audience joined. On their dismissal he told them he hoped to meet them again at the end of six years!

Sir Jeffrey Amherst was substituted, as lieutenant-general of the ordnance, for general Conway, who was promoted to the government of Jersey. Charles James Fox was promoted to a seat at the treasury-board. These alterations did not impair the strength of the ministry, and were all completed by the end of the year.

PEACE AND WAR.—It is remarkable that during the two years of the late war (1759-60), the number of criminals condemned at the Old Bailey amounted to 29 only, and the days of the judges' attendance to 46; but that during the two years of peace (1770-1), the number of criminals condemned have amounted to 151, and the

The company determined to send out a commission of supervision, but the house of commons interfered to restrain them, having themselves entered upon an inquiry into their administration.

DISMEMBERMENT OF POLAND.—The first treaty for the partition of Poland, by her three despotic neighbours, was this year concluded. By this unprincipled compact, one-third of the Polish territory was ceded to Austria, Russia, and Prussia. 16. Irish working-school incorporated.

16. Died, aged 58, Dr. JOHN HAWKSWORTH, an ingenious miſcellaneous writer, and author of "The Adventurer." He ſucceeded Dr. Johnson in compiling the parliamentary ſpeeches for the "Gentleman's Magazine." He was alſo the editor of the diſcovery voyages of Wallis, Byron, Carteret, and Cook; and allowed by government to appropriate to his own uſe the whole proceeds of the ſale, amounting to 6000*l.*

30. The Royal Society preſented Dr. Priestley with the Copley medal for his excellent paper on different kinds of air.

Dec. 1. It was decided in the Commons that a landlord cannot ſtop goods for rent not due.

18. OUTRAGE AT BOSTON.—Several armed perſons in the diſguiſe of Mohawk Indians boarded three ſhips, laden with tea, in the port of Boſton, and threw the entire of the cargoes overboard without doing further injury. Theſe ſhips belonged to the Eaſt India Company. Similar outrages on ſmaller cargoes of tea were committed in the ſame place, and in South Carolina; and a cargo landed at New York, under the protection of a man-of-war, was obliged to be locked up. The hoſtility to the importation of tea reſulted from the retention of a trifling duty on that article, to aſſert the right of the British parliament to tax the colonies.

The manufacture of plate-glaſs firſt began in Lancaſhire.

Some ſpecimens of native lead found at Percefield in Monmouthſhire, the firſt ever found in England.

Commercial credit continued depressed by the late bankruptcies, and by the depreciation of the value of the gold coin, from wear and fraudulent practices.

During this year, the emperor Joſeph evinced extraordinary activity in the government of his dominions. He claimed from the pope the right of nominating to the bishoprics in his hereditary states, and actually filled up some vacant sees in Hungary and Bohemia. In the summer he travelled 4500 miles on horseback, introducing many salutary reforms.

EAST INDIA COMPANY.—The magnitude of the Indian empire, and the incompetence of the company for its government, had for some time fixed the attention of the legislature. In the month of June two acts of parliament were passed, entirely altering the constitution of the company, and vesting in the crown that superintendence which it has ever since exercised. By these acts the dividend is restricted to 6 per cent., and a loan of 1,400,000*l.* advanced to the company at 4 per cent. Heretofore every proprietor of stock had the right of voting in general courts; all below 500*l.* are disqualified; an additional vote given to proprietors from 1000*l.* to 3000*l.*; two additional, from 3000*l.* to 6000*l.*; and three, from 6000*l.* to 10,000*l.* Instead of re-electing the whole number of directors every year, six only went out, by rotation, in lieu of whom, others were chosen. A governor-general was appointed to reside in Bengal, and the other presidencies were made subordinate to Bengal. The governor-general to be nominated by the directors, but subject to the approval of the crown. All territorial correspondence to be laid before ministers. A supreme court of judicature established at Calcutta, with judges appointed by the crown.

The number of proprietors of East India stock, on the 4th of March last, was as follows:—

English proprietors, possessing 500*l.* stock and upwards, but not amounting to 1000*l.*, 1246; foreign ditto, 95; total proprietors of 500*l.* stock, 1341: total value of stock, 634,720*l.*

So that by raising the elective qualification, nearly two-thirds of the proprietors were excluded from voting.

1774. Jan. 13. Parliament opened by the king.

21. Died, the Turkish emperor Mustafa III., and was succeeded by his brother Abdul Hamet.

29. In the privy-council was discussed the merits of a petition presented by Dr. Franklin, agent for Massachusetts, setting forth that the people of that province had no confidence in their governor, and praying his removal. The result was the dismissal of the petition, and the removal of Dr. Franklin from the office of deputy postmaster-general for the colonies. The governor and deputy-governor (Oliver and Hutchinson) had recommended, in confidential letters, the adoption of coercive measures towards the colonists. Copies of these letters were privately obtained by Franklin, through the agency of a Dr. Williamson, who stole them from a government office, and transmitted them to America, where they excited great indignation.

11. A letter to the speaker of the commons in the "Public Advertiser" voted a libel. The printer ordered to attend, when he gave up the rev Mr. Horne as the author. Mr. Horne was ordered to attend, which he did; but there not being any evidence against him except the printer, who was in custody, he was discharged.

Feb. 8. Died at Paris, M. de Condamine, celebrated for his voyage to discover the figure of the earth.

13. A motion in the King's-bench, on the part of Macklin the actor, against certain persons who had hissed him from the stage, and compelled the managers to discharge him from the theatre. The court decided that as the theatre was opened for the amusement of those who paid for admission, they had a right to express their opinion of the performers; but they had no right previously to combine for that purpose. Motion refused.

22. LAW OF COPYRIGHT.—The house of lords decided the important question that the author of a book or literary composition has no exclusive right to the publication of the same by the common law; such exclusive right being abrogated by the statute the 8th of queen Anne. Under the common law, an author claimed a perpetual copyright, which is limited by the statute to 14, or if he survived that term, to 28 years. The case excited great interest, and lord Camden spoke two hours in favour of the statutory limitation.

28. The hon. Charles James Fox dismissed from his seat at the treasury-board.

Mar. 4. Mr. Howard, the sheriff of Bedford, received the thanks of the commons for his humane inquiry into the state of prisons. Dr. Fothergill and surgeon Potts were examined, and gave it as their opinion that the gaol-distemper originated in a number of persons being confined in a close place and not kept clean. Ventilation, cleanliness, and hot and cold baths in prisons were recommended.

9. The heavy rains which fell on this and the three preceding days, raised the waters to a great height in the neighbourhood of London, by which considerable damage was done to the garden ground, and young plantations; two west country barges were carried out of the Thames and left in Battersea fields.

31. Penny-post first established in Dublin.

AMERICAN CORRECTION BILLS.—In this and the following month were introduced into the Commons three important measures relative to America. On the 14th inst. the Boston Port Bill was brought forward, by which the Custom-house was removed and the port closed. By the second bill the charter of Massachusetts Bay is annulled and the government of that province vested in the nominees of the crown. The third empowers the governor of the province to send all persons charged with capital offences there to be tried in this country. These bills were carried almost without opposition in both houses. As a means of enforcing them, four regiments were sent to Boston under general Gage, as governor of the province and commander-in-chief.

April 4. DEATH OF GOLDSMITH.—At his chambers in the Temple, in his 43rd year, the popular author of the Vicar of Wakefield and the Deserted Village. As a writer Dr. Goldsmith possesses those qualities which interest most, and offend none; and though not eminent for force or originality, there is, in his various productions, an ingenious facility which it has been pertinently observed (Edinburgh Review), if not genius, is its near kindred. The doctor never having realised a perfect independence, his character had hardly scope for full development; but the vanity, egotism, and simplicity ascribed to him render his biography more interesting than is usual with men of letters. He seems to have had the foibles ascribed to Irishmen—a relish for present enjoyment, with little regard to the future; and an impulsive benevolence, with little discrimination. His premature death was occasioned by dysury (Prior's Life of Goldsmith, ii. 513), the result of close application to those laborious compilations, amusing and instructive to the public, but often fatal to the literary artist.

17. Unitarian chapel in Essex-street opened with a reformed Book of Common Prayer.

19. Mr. Rose Fuller, in the commons, moved that the house resolve itself into a committee on the American tea duty. Negatived by a majority of 182 to 49. It was on this occasion Mr. Burke delivered his celebrated speech on American taxation. During the discussion on the Coercion Bills the standing order of the house against the admission of strangers was enforced. But the public for some time had taken little interest in political questions.

May 2. The Society of Antiquaries being desirous to ascertain the state of the body of Edward I., after the efforts made to preserve it in wax, obtained leave to open the stone sarcophagus in Westminster Abbey in which it is deposited. They found the body in a state of perfect preservation, and most richly dressed. The length of the corpse was six feet two inches.

10. DEATH OF LOUIS XV.—Died of the small-pox, the king of France, in the 64th year of his age and the 59th of his reign. His abandoned private life and despotic public one had long stripped him of his early appellation of the "Well-beloved." During his reign arts, science, and philosophy made great progress, and the equatorial and polar voyages, to measure a degree of the meridian, were creditable to the French government. The deceased sovereign was less illiterate than his predecessor, and might have been respectable for intelligence, had not his understanding and moral sensibilities been early blunted by habits of indolence and sensuality. He was succeeded by Louis XVI.

17. General Gage dissolved the assembly of Massachusetts Bay.

June 2. COPYRIGHT BILL.—The London Booksellers' bill for the protection of copyright having passed the commons, it came on to be discussed in the lords. Lord Denbigh spoke strongly against the bill, and said it was only meant to encourage monopoly. Lord Lyttelton replied to his objections, and said that the bill was not to repeal the recent decision of the lords (ante p. 490) but to relieve men who had laid out about 600,000*l.* in copyright since 1769. The lord chancellor opposed the bill. So did lord Camden, who said if the bill had stated what particular set of men had been injured, and what loss they had sustained, they might have had some favour shown them. Bill thrown out.

11. At a general meeting of the parishioners of Eccles, near Manchester, it was unanimously agreed to strike off from the poor's rate all paupers who shall, after the 20th instant, keep dogs.

22. Parliament prorogued, after the royal assent had been given to a bill for the better government of Quebec.

July 8. A terrible affray between the English and Irish haymakers at Mill Hill, Hendon. Some lives were lost, and a great many wounded. The quarrel arose from a resolution of the English to prevent the employment of the Irish in haymaking.

9. At Guildhall the hon. Charles James Fox obtained a verdict against Mr. Williams, for a letter inserted in the Morning Post reflecting on his character.

14. Captain Furneaux, who sailed in the Adventure in company with captain Cook, arrived at Spithhead, having circumnavigated the globe, and reached 67 deg 10 min. of southern latitude.

18. Corsica ceded to the king of Sardinia by the French.

21. Peace signed between the Russians and Turks. By this treaty the independence of the Crimea was acknowledged, and Russia obtained Kimbourn and the entire district between the Bog and the Dniester, with the free passage of the Dardanelles.

30. A great number of heavy cannon shipped at Woolwich for the American colonies.

Aug. 16. New charter of incorporation granted to the borough of Helston in Cornwall.

Sept. 1. The English evacuated, pursuant to a secret convention with Spain, the Falkland Islands, leaving an inscription to attest their claim to them.

6. The deputies of the twelve old American colonies, 51 in number, assembled at Philadelphia. Resolutions passed approving the resistance of the Bostonians, and promising them support should any attempt be made to carry into force the coercive laws. A general declaration of the right of the colonies to tax themselves, followed; then a petition to the throne—addresses to the people of Britain, to the colonies, and to the province of Quebec terminated the labours of Congress, October 26th, when they adjourned to the ensuing May.

21. Pope Ganganelli died, in his 70th year, not without suspicion of being poisoned by the jesuits.

30. Parliament unexpectedly dissolved. It had sat rather short of its legal term, namely, six years, four months, and 21 days, which was precisely the duration of George II.'s first parliament, dissolved in April, 1734.

Oct. 8. John Wilkes, esq. chosen lord mayor by 1957 votes.

16. Died, the premature victim of irregular habits, Robert Fergusson, the Scotch poet.

19. The Leeds canal from Liverpool to Wigan opened.

27. A notorious felon, called Sixteen String Jack, convicted of highway robbery at the Old Bailey.

Nov. 22. DEATH OF CLIVE.—Died, by his own hands, at his house in Berkeley-square, in the 50th year of his age, Robert lord Clive, baron of Plassey in the Irish peerage. Mental despondency, resulting from acute bodily suffering, aggravated by a feeling of mortified pride, and probably, some degree of self-reproach, are the causes assigned for this painful catastrophe. (See John Malcolm's Life of Lord Clive, iii. 372.) The resolution in the house of commons in the preceding year (ante p. 489) had fixed an ignominious inuendo on the conduct of Clive, in the East Indies, which his dark and haughty soul could ill brook. In achieving his splendid military triumphs he seems to have been guided by the maxim, that the end sanctified the means. Lord Chatham termed him "a heaven-born general, who, without experience, surpassed all the officers of his time." His talents were those afterwards successfully exemplified by the republican generals of France—energy, celerity of movement, and the precipitation of masses on weak points. He represented Shrewsbury at his death, but seldom spoke, though when roused, he rose into eloquence. He was kind and liberal in private life, and perhaps it was questionable equity to test his Indian delinquency by European jurisprudence.

25. By a decision of the court of King's bench the crown is defeated in its claim of the 4½ per cent. duty from the ceded island of Granada.

29. NEW PARLIAMENT opened. The apathy with regard to public transactions, which had began four years since, continued, and in few places were the elections warmly contested. Alderman Wilkes was returned for Middlesex, and ministers wisely not opposing his taking his seat, the political influence of this formidable agitator subsided into its natural dimensions. The resistance of the American colonies having now assumed almost the form of a general insurrection, it was pointedly adverted to in the king's speech. In both houses the ministerial address was keenly debated, but carried by large majorities. In the lords by 46 to 9, in the commons by 264 to 73. Sir Fletcher Norton was chosen speaker.

30. Resolutions of the first American congress arrived.

Dec. 8. A true bill found against the duchess of Kingston for bigamy, in having married the late duke, being then the wife of the honourable Augustus Hervey.

30. Died, Paul Whitehead, a poet of considerable temporary celebrity.

It appears by the Stamp-office books that the number of newspapers published this year was 12,300,000.

A remarkable foreign incident was the rebellion of Pugatcheff, in Russia. This man, a Cossack by birth, assumed the name of the emperor Peter III., pretending that he had providentially escaped from those who designed to murder him. His marvellous tale and sanctified look gained him many followers, but he was finally routed and put to death, by severing his head, hands, and feet from his body.

Cap. 78. Building-act for the metropolis; regulating party-walls; prevention of fires.

REVENUE, DEBT, AND TAXES.

The situation of the country at the conclusion of the war in 1762 was highly flourishing. It was encumbered, it is true, with a considerable debt, but not beyond its resources to bear. During the twelve years' peace that followed this debt might have been greatly reduced, had not ministerial changes and dissensions prevented the introduction of any great and uniform system of fiscal economy. Hence little more than ten millions of debt were paid off, from the peace to the breaking out of the colonial war in 1775, when the principal of the debt amounted to 135,943,051*l.*, and the interest to 4,476,821*l.*

At the king's accession, the public income was, (ante p. 459) 8,523,540*l.* In 1775, the first year of the colonial war, it had increased to 10,138,061*l.*

The peace establishment, on an average of four years, ending in 1770, was as follows:—

Army	1,513,412
Ordnance	227,907
Miscellanies	108,231

Sinc. Hist. Rev., Pt. iii., 94.

The king's civil list, in 1760, was fixed at 800,000*l.* per annum, subject to the several annuities of 50,000*l.* a year to the princess-dowager of Wales; 15,000*l.* to the duke of Cumberland; and 12,000*l.* to the princess Amelia. This provision appears to have been insufficient to meet the royal expenditure, as large arrears speedily accumulated. In 1769, 513,511*l.* was granted to discharge arrears of the civil list. In 1777, 620,000*l.* was again voted for a similar purpose, together with an additional 100,000*l.* per annum to the income of the crown: 120,000*l.* was also given as the marriage portions of the princesses Augusta and Matilda.

COMMERCE, MANUFACTURES, CONSUMPTION.

It will be seen from the subjoined statement of the amount of tonnage which yearly cleared outwards from British ports, and the value of the cargoes exported, that the commercial impulse of the preceding reign continued unabated up to the period of the American war. The statement is continued down from that inserted page 457, which included the first two years of the reign of George III.

Years.	Tons.	Value of Cargoes.
1764	658,734	17,756,331
1765	719,257	15,731,374
1766	746,034	15,188,668
1767	709,041	15,090,001
1768	741,520	16,620,133

Year.	Time.	Value of Cargoes.
1769	772,875	£15,001,289
1770	780,971	15,996,569
1771	836,922	19,018,481
1772	890,711	17,720,169
1774	863,513	17,288,487

There appears to have been in the years 1764-7 a decline in the value of the cargoes, though little in the quantities exported. It probably resulted from the fall in prices, after the commercial panic of 1763. Nine years after this, another mercantile revulsion occurred, of greater intensity, and which was followed by a fall both in the amount and value of exports. In 1772 the number of bankruptcies in England amounted to 523; in 1773 to 562, nearly double the usual number of antecedent years. This increase of commercial failures was occasioned by the speculative activity of preceding years, and the subsequent re-action (Macpherson's Annals of Commerce, iii., 533); as is evinced by the fact, that the export trade of Britain reached a height in 1771 which it did not again attain till the year 1783.

The first period of the reign of George III. is distinguished by those remarkable mechanical inventions that gave such a powerful impulse to manufacturing industry, and enabled us to distance all foreigners in the race of competition. In 1764, James Watt, a native of Greenock, began his wonderful improvements in the application of steam power, the full extent and importance of which we seem hardly yet to have appreciated. Three years after, James Hargreaves, an ingenious carpenter of Blackburn, invented the spinning-jenny, the first of a series of mechanical improvements in the cotton manufacture. At first, this admirable machine enabled eight threads to be spun with the same facility as one: and it was subsequently brought to such perfection, that a child was able to work no fewer than from 80 to 120 spindles (McCulloch's Statistical Account of the British Empire, ii., 64). The jenny was applicable only to the spinning of cotton for worst, being unable to give to the yarn that degree of fineness and strength requisite in the longitudinal threads or warp: but this deficiency was soon after supplied by the introduction of the spinning-frame, which spins a vast number of threads of any degree of tenuity and firmness. The invention of this extraordinary machine has been usually ascribed to Richard Arkwright, a native of Preston. But Mr. Baimes has shown (History of the Cotton Manufacture, p. 134) that the merit of being the original discoverer is due to a John Wyatt, who, thirty years before, had attempted to spin by rollers. Either from the ignorance of his machinery, the want of capital, or some other cause, Wyatt was compelled to abandon his undertaking; so that the merit of rendering this important discovery practically available unquestionably belongs to sir Richard Arkwright, who, after overcoming great difficulties, took out his patent in 1769. In 1771 he took out a second patent for a new system of carding and roving by rollers.

These inventions were followed by the contrivance of the mule jenny; so called from its being a compound of the spinning jenny and the spinning frame. It was invented by Mr. Crompton of Bolton, but did not come into general use till after the dissolution of Arkwright's patent in 1785. At a later period the power-loom was discovered by Mr. Cartwright, a clergyman of Kent, and effected that economy of labour in weaving which the jennies had effected in spinning.

By these discoveries a sudden impulse was given to the increase of population, to agricultural improvements, and a vast augmentation of individual and national wealth.

The increase of manufacturing population produced an important change in the corn trade. Either from the inducement of a bounty, or from the home produce outgrowing the consumption, England for seventy years had been a considerable exporter of corn. It appears, however, from the several periods of scarcity mentioned in the Occurrences, and the tumults occasioned by the dearth of grain, that the home produce was becoming barely equal to domestic consumption. This is also attested by the very considerable rise in the price of wheat: in the first fourteen years of the present reign the average price per quarter at Windsor market was about 50s., whereas during the entire reign of George II. it was only 30s. Owing to this rise of price there were several suspensions of the restrictions on importation; and in 1773 an act passed by which foreign wheat was allowed to be imported on paying a nominal duty of 6d., whenever the home price was at or above 48s. a quarter, and the bounty and exportation were to cease when the price was at or above 44s. In this year wheat rose to the unusual price of 59s. a quarter.

The rise in price may have been partly produced by a change of national diet. Rye, oats, and barley anciently formed the staple bread-corn of the common people. It was only during the prosperous reign of George II. that we began to be a wheat-fed population; and at the accession of his successor it is thought by a well-informed author that not more than half the people of England fed on wheat. For two centuries and upwards the wheaten loaf has been slowly travelling across the island, from the southern to the northern counties; so recently as the year 1800 it had only partially reached Yorkshire; the oaten cake, as the writer of this well remembers, being commonly eaten by the labouring classes of the West Riding; and the same infallible test of improved popular condition can hardly yet be said to have fully penetrated into Scotland, or even the northern districts of Cumberland, Durham and Northumberland.

The subjoined statements will help to illustrate the subjects of this section, and some of the occurrences embraced in the first period of the reign of George III.

In the first ten years of the reign of George III., the number of prisoners annually tried at the Old Bailey increased twofold. This appears from the following abstract of Mr. Gurney's minutes of the prisoners tried from the first session in the mayoralty of sir Edwin Glynn, 1760, to October, 1769:—Glynn, 318; Blackstone, 322; Hudge, 312; Fudyer, 508; Bridges, 509; Stevenson, 551; Nelson, 536; Kite, 582; Harly, 643; Turner, 616. The total number of persons tried from the mayoralty of Sir William Calvert, 1749, to 1769, was 10,473. Branding in the hand, which is now discontinued, was a common punishment at this period. In the convictions of 1774, the last year of the above table, the punishments inflicted were—capital, 68; transported, 190; whipped, 32; branded, 48.

GEORGE III. A.D. 1775 to 1785.

In the important and diversified events which distinguished the first twenty-five years of the king's reign, his character, personal and political, was matured and developed. A narrow education and restricted intercourse with the world were ill calculated to supply his original want of mental activity, or of a strong and expansive mind. In his conduct a tenacity of purpose verging on obstinacy was observable; his religion was tinged with bigotry and intolerance, and, though of unquestioned rectitude of intention, his preferences and dislikes of individuals sometimes savoured of caprice or injustice; and his intercourse with them of subtlety and dissimulation.* He was possessed more of the accomplishments than the knowledge appropriate to his high station. He spoke most modern languages with fluency; wrote with brevity, perspicuity and facility; had some taste for the fine arts and even for mechanics and agriculture; but he was little acquainted with mankind, had not deeply studied the principles of laws, morals, and political philosophy—sciences which, from their bearing on public happiness, seem peculiarly to claim the attention of rulers.

The chief transactions embraced in the second portion of the reign of George III. are, first, the commencement of the war with the North American colonies, and the recognition, after an unsuccessful struggle of eight years, of their independence of the mother country. Secondly, the relaxation of the penal laws against Roman Catholics and the disgraceful riots with which it was accompanied. Thirdly, the beginning of those attempts, which have never since been intermitted, of raising Ireland to an equality of civil rights and commercial advantages to England. Fourthly, the apprehensions occasioned by the increasing influence of the crown, in consequence of the vast increase the war had occasioned in the public expenditure; and the necessity of a more full and responsible representation of the people in parliament. Fifthly, and last, ministerial changes, the overthrow, in 1782, of lord North's administration, and the rapid succession of the Rockingham, Shelburne, and coalition ministries, till the government was firmly grasped and long settled in the hands of Mr. Pitt. Besides these general topics there are minor events and occurrences of great interest, bearing on the affairs of the East India Company—the armed Neutrality of the northern powers, ostensibly formed to limit the power of the belligerents to interfere with neutral commerce—the abrogation of the proceedings of a former parliament, declaring Mr. Wilkes ineligible to a seat in the house of commons—the restoration of the estates forfeited by the rebels in 1745—extravagant loans—increase of taxation—and the repeated arrears and disorderly expenditure of the civil list.

* The earl of Shelburne said that "the king possessed one art beyond any man he had ever known; for that by the familiarity of his intercourse he obtained your confidence, procured from you your opinion of different public characters, and then availed himself of this knowledge to sow dissension."—Nicholls's Recollections and Reflections during the Reign of George III., 389.

The independence of the trans-Atlantic states formed one of those novel questions in the progress of nations that baffled the wisdom of contemporaries. With the exception of the city of London, and some other towns whose representations were influenced by narrow views of commercial interest, it may be safely affirmed that there was a general concurrence of sentiment in favour of the parliamentary claim to tax our American dependencies and render their resources auxiliary to our own. The unexpected resistance of the colonists having rendered the enforcement of this claim hopeless, the next ground taken up was the maintenance of the legislative apart from the fiscal supremacy of the British parliament. This was the favourite position of the earl of Chatham, and of which it may be observed, that the power to make laws, but not to impose taxes, could at best be only an incomplete, if not an unprofitable sovereignty. The declaration of independence, the disasters of the war, and the accession, first covertly and then openly, of France, Spain, and Holland, to the cause of the revolted provinces, at length induced the Rockingham whigs to acquiesce in the policy of withdrawing all pretensions of supremacy by the mother country. This they did from necessity, not choice. They were as much opposed to colonial independence as the Chatham, or (as they were termed after his death) the Shelburne whigs, who were ultimately compelled to conclude peace on this basis only: they resorted to it as an unavoidable expedient to extricate the country from a calamitous and exhausting war. Neither section of politicians foresaw the actual consequences of separation,—that they would be mutually advantageous to England and America. They viewed it as a disastrous alternative, hardly less so than a dismemberment of the empire, pregnant with national decay, if not ruin. They could not conceive how by the severance of one distant and unmanageable limb of the body politic, the rest would be made more strong and vigorous. They were influenced by the prevalent ideas that national greatness (happiness not being especially thought of) mainly consisted in extent of territory and increase of population. Experience had not forced upon them, as it has more recently begun to force upon statesmen, the conviction that colonies are costly dependencies; that, like children, they may be planted from necessity and reared from duty and affection; but that the age of adolescence will arrive when separation is mutually beneficial. The start which England made immediately after the termination of the war shows that she was benefited by the loss of her trans-Atlantic provinces. No commercial injury was sustained. The industrial pursuits of both countries were sharpened and multiplied. The distractions of a distant government were avoided, and the attention of our own legislature concentrated on financial and other domestic improvements. America had long been a source of expense and involvement to the parent state. Two wars had been waged on her account, which cost upwards of 240 millions of money, and the expense of her civil government, from the accession of the Brunswick family to 1788, is estimated by sir John Sinclair at 40 millions more.* For all these pecuniary sacrifices, the only return was the imaginary profit of some miserable navigation and mercantile monopolies that cramped the energies and impoverished both countries.

In the management of the American war, Lord North was severely reproached by the Opposition for want of foresight, and obstinacy. But it was as little in the power of the minister as of his accusers to calculate the force of popular enthusiasm. Physicians usually commence with mild prescriptions till they ascertain the extent of the malady, and upon a similar tentative principle Lord North essayed with a few Irish regiments and ships of the line to subdue the "rebels," the "deluded and unhappy multitude," as the armed citizens of Boston and New York were termed in the king's speech of 1777. At first no addition was made to the peace establishment, and the impression was that the force on foot would be amply sufficient to reduce the colonies to obedience. Disappointed by their formidable resistance, the minister increased his expenditure and his armaments till they attained a scale of unprecedented magnitude; but his efforts were not ably seconded. The surrender of general Burgoyne at Saratoga in 1777, and of the marquis Cornwallis at York Town, in 1781, were overwhelming disasters, which seem to have been partly brought about by the superior generalship of Gates and Washington. The naval administration of the country under lord Sandwich was inefficient; ships were sent out not properly equipped; the subaltern officers were meanly jealous of each other, and disobedient to their superiors, and to such an extent had this refractoriness and insubordination—the results of bad discipline—extended in the fleets, that the admiralty was obliged to suppress those portions of the dispatches of the commanders in which they complained of the misconduct of their captains, not being in a state to adopt decisive measures, either from weakness or the pressure of the war, to bring the delinquents to justice.†

Another disadvantage attended England in this contest. All the spectators of the struggle between the mother-country and her colonies were on one side. The prayers and wishes of every European state were in favour of their emancipation. They encouraged and aided them in their resistance; under the guise of an armed association, formed on the pretext of upholding maritime rights, they supplied them with warlike stores; clandestinely received their agents; assisted them with able and enterprising officers; opened their ports for the reception of their privateers; and then, when their under-hand practices became too notorious to be longer concealed, they threw off the mask, declared in favour of one of the combatants, and by their confederated powers having overwhelmed the other, left this noble country mangled, bleeding, and, as they thought, crippled for ever.

But it was the syncope of a giant. The irrepressible energies of internal industry, which, if not in full action, were just ready to begin, soon set the nation to rights. Externally, however, the powers of the country were never more enfeebled, dispirited and disjointed than at the peace of 1783, concluded by the Shelburne ministry. The terms of the peace were condemned by the expectants of the coalition ministry, but without reason. Under the circumstances the conditions were as favourable as could be obtained, or the community had a right to expect. The country was impoverished, and, it is alleged, (Dods., Ann. Reg. xxvi., 152.) depopulated by the war. The state of the finances was deplorable. Our debt, funded and unfunded, had increased to upwards of 250 millions, and the annual interest fell little short of nine millions and a half. But the most alarming symptom was our naval inferiority. The confederated navies of the Bourbons greatly outnumbered that of England. Exclusive of the Dutch fleet of twenty-five sail of the line, the force of France and Spain amounted to 140 sail of the line; whereas the whole force of Britain, fit for service, did not exceed 100 sail of the line; and of these many were under-manned, unclean, in a mouldering state, or had been long employed on distant foreign stations (Ibid. 151). To have persisted in carrying on a distant colonial war without the command of the seas would have been wholly undefensible. Moreover, the land-forces were as incompetent as the naval. Our best troops had been captured at Saratoga and York Town, and new levies of mercenaries could only be obtained in Germany, that "great market of men," as Chat'lam termed it. Ireland was menaced with invasion, and her defence had been necessarily entrusted to corps of volunteers, who seemed more disposed to turn their bayonets against domestic oppressors than foreign foes. In short, the nation was overpowered by enemies and difficulties, and peace, on almost any terms, seemed the only refuge.*

During the pressure of the American war, a question of great importance assumed, for the first time since the era of the commonwealth, an imposing and tangible shape. This was PARLIAMENTARY REFORM. Its origin and object may be briefly described. Hostilities with the colonies, like hostilities with every other people, commenced under the favouring auspices of the yeomanry and populace. These, however, soon became dissatisfied with the privations and burdens war entailed upon them. Trade decayed; the farmers were impoverished by low prices; land rents fell;† and all the productive classes of the community became discontented with the government. But hostilities had made the minister all-powerful in parliament. A vast

* The issue of the American contest appears to have been foreseen at an early period by the celebrated DAVID HUME, the historian. In a letter to a friend, dated October 26, 1775, he thus expresses his sentiments on American politics: "I must, before we part, have a little stroke of politics with you, notwithstanding my resolution to the contrary. We hear that some of the ministers have proposed in council, that both fleet and army be withdrawn from America, and these colonies be left entirely to themselves. I wish I had been a member of his majesty's cabinet council that I might have seconded this opinion: I should have said that this measure only anticipated the necessary course of events a few years."—"Let us therefore lay aside all anger, shake hands, and part friends; or if we retain any anger, let it be only against ourselves for our past folly." It is now well known that the war was persevered in much longer than it otherwise would have been in obedience to the wishes of the king. It was considered, says Mr. Nicholls, "the war of the king personally. Those who supported it were called the king's friends; while those who wished the country to pause and reconsider the propriety of persevering in the contest were branded as disloyal."—Reflections of the Reign of George III., p. 35. The king was so eager to continue the struggle that he offered to Lord North to dissolve parliament; but the minister replied—"That measure will do your majesty no service."—(Ibid.) George III., from pique, wished to withhold from North, on his resignation, the usual pension; and when he refused to continue minister, the king told him he "must answer to the country for having gone on so long."—(Ibid. 43.)

increase in the public expenditure; improvident loans and lavish contracts had gathered round him such a host of placemen and expectants that he could always command overwhelming majorities and defy the representatives of the people. It was to disperse, or at least circumscribe, the influence of this phalanx of corruption, that parliamentary reform was projected; by shortening the duration of parliaments, and throwing into the commons men who represented the interests of industry, the power of a reckless and extravagant war-faction it was thought might be counteracted.

For the promotion of these objects, at the end of the year 1779 a great meeting of the freeholders was held in the shire-hall of York. It was the largest and most respectable meeting that had ever been held in that county, and an energetic petition for reform and retrenchment was agreed to, to be presented by that inflexible patriot sir George Savile. Meetings of similar import were held in the county of Middlesex, the cities of London and Westminster, and in most of the chief counties and towns of the kingdom. Reform associations were generally established; and immediately parliament had assembled after the Christmas recess a vast number of petitions, signed by persons of the first consequence, both clergy and laity, were presented. Such was the effect of the general excitement that several popular measures were forthwith carried in defiance of the minister; among them Mr. Burke's bill of economical reform, and the resolution of Mr. Dunning, that "the influence of the crown has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished."

About eight weeks after passing this famous resolution, the metropolis was brought to the brink of destruction by the anti-catholic riots of the Protestant Association. A re-action almost instantly followed. People became alarmed at the evidence of ignorance and violence which these dreadful disorders afforded. The executive rather than the democratic branches of the constitution seemed to require strengthening for the general security. Government gained immensely by the tumults; for they so strongly impressed the minds of the public with the danger arising from popular assemblies for political purposes, that the county associations for promoting reform fell into discredit, and were deserted by many persons who had at first encouraged them. Advantage was taken of the prevailing apprehension to dissolve parliament, and at the general election, which ensued in September, most of the members who had advocated parliamentary reform were thrown out.

The close of 1779 and the following year were altogether a period of great national humiliation, disaster, and embarrassment. The combined fleets of France and Spain rode triumphantly in the channel, threatening to make a hostile descent on our coasts. Ireland was in a very perturbed state, and by the convention of military delegates at Dungannon, had assumed an attitude more alarming than that of America at the commencement of her insurrection. Incendiary attempts, supposed to be at the instigation of the enemy, were made to set fire to the royal dock-yards and arsenals. Immense losses were sustained at sea, by the capture of the outward-bound East and West India fleets. The French had succeeded in sending a powerful armament to aid the revolted colonies, and the Armed Neutrality against the maritime claims of England was formed. These losses and mortifications seemed to deprive the nation of all energy, and the subject of reform was not again introduced till the session of 1782. In that year Mr. Pitt, who had in the session of the preceding year made his first appearance in public life as a Shelburne whig and reformer, again brought forward the subject with great eloquence and ability. He repeated his motion on precisely the same day (May 7th) of the following year, and again in 1785, when he had become premier; but it does not appear on these occasions that he was seconded by any strong expression of popular feeling.

In two important descriptions of measures the government of Lord North appears to have been considerably in advance of the people in wisdom and justice. These were in the policy adopted in 1778 of relaxing the penal laws against the catholics, and in removing (June, 1778, Dec., 1779) some of the restrictions that impeded the commercial prosperity of Ireland. In both the course of ministers was opposed by popular ignorance and selfishness. The concessions to the catholics had the effect of originating the fanatical riots already alluded to of lord George Gordon; and ministers would have gone much further in opening the trade of Ireland had they not been restrained by the petitions and remonstrances of the mercantile classes of England.

The overthrow of the twelve years' administration of Lord North, in 1782, opened the way for a quick succession of ministries. That of the marquis of Rockingham subsisted only a few months, but during that time several measures of economy, and for lessening the influence of the crown in parliament, were passed. On the death of Rockingham, the king immediately appointed the earl of Shelburne his successor, and this appointment the earl at once accepted, without consulting the rest of the cabinet. Upon this, the Rockingham whigs resigned their places, either, as appears, from its being a violation of the established usage on such occasions by the new minister, or from its having thwarted the aspirations of Mr. Fox (ostensibly of lord Portland) to the premiership. After the death of lord Rockingham, Mr. Nicholls says the "whigs had ceased to be a party, and became a faction;" their efforts being no longer employed to attain any great public object except the possession of power. The terms of the peace were the alleged reason of their hostility to the Shelburne ministry, but the substitution of themselves in their places, combined with personal dislike of that nobleman, seem to have been the real ones. They enjoyed, however, for a very short term the fruits of their ill-assorted coalition with Lord North;—it proved quite as unprofitable as unprincipled. Mr. Fox's India Bill was the rock on which they proximately foundered. This celebrated measure was so unfortunate in its reception that it alarmed the king for his prerogatives, and the corporations for their chartered immunities. Dexterously availing himself of the opening thereby afforded, Mr. Pitt seized the helm, which he long continued to hold, to the great mortification and discomfiture of his opponents.*

* In justification of his anomalous coalition with Lord North, Mr. Fox used this expression: "Our party is formed on the principle of CONFEDERACY; ought we not, then, to confederate with him who can give us the greatest strength?"—Nicholls's Recollections and Reflections during the Reign of George III., p. 172. It will be seen from the Events and Occurrences of 1784, and the defeats in the general election of that year, that the coalition and the India Bill were fatal to the influence of the whig party. Dr. Watson, the late bishop of Llandaff, who was a contemporary witness of this period, speaks strongly on this point. "From the moment," says he, "this coalition was formed betwixt Lord North and the men who for many years had reprobated in the strongest terms his political principles, I lost all confidence in public men. I clearly saw that they sacrificed their public principles to private pique, and their honour to their ambition. The badness of the peace, and the supposed danger of trusting power in the hands of lord Shelburne, were the reasons publicly given for the necessity of forming this coalition: personal dislike of him and a desire to be in power themselves, were in my opinion the real ones."—Anecdotes of the Life of Bishop Watson by his Son, p. 105.

EVENTS AND OCCURRENCES.

1775. Jan. 17. The Rivals, a play by Mr. Sheridan, performed for the first time at Drury-lane theatre, and not favourably received.

Buckingham-house purchased for the Queen.

20. Lord Chatham moved in the lords an address to the king to withdraw his troops from Boston. Negatived by a majority of 68 to 18.

23. A petition from the London merchants being presented to the commons, it was suggested that as the American business was political, not commercial, there could be little connexion between the views of the house and the petitioners; therefore the petition ought to be referred to a committee separate from that to which the papers ministers had laid on the table relative to the colonies had been referred. This suggestion was adopted, and all the other petitions from the commercial towns being treated in like manner, they were made of no weight in the discussion.

25. Thirty men of war and frigates put in commission to cover the American coast and prevent the colonies being supplied with European goods.

Feb. 1. Lord Chatham unsuccessfully renews his motion for the settlement of the American differences.

3. The king of Denmark throws open to his subjects the trade to the East Indies.

9, 10. Warm debates in both houses on American affairs; ministerial address in favour of coercion carried in the commons by 304 to 105, and in the lords by 104 to 29.

Mar. 17. A clergyman about to measure the depth of Pen Park Hole, near Bristol, slipped into the cavern and was drowned.

30. Royal assent given to a bill for restraining the trade of New England and the fisheries of that colony on the banks of Newfoundland.

31. The peasantry of Bohemia, oppressed by feudal services, revolted; the emperor Joseph sought to relieve them, but was opposed by the nobility.

Apr. 18. The city of London presented an address to the king, justifying the resistance of the colonies, and praying for the dismissal of the ministers who had advised coercive measures. Mr. Wilkes attended officially, as lord mayor, to present the address, and was cautioned not to speak to the king, as Beckford had done on a similar occasion.

12. Notice sent to the lord mayor that the king will not receive on the throne any address from the lord mayor and aldermen except in their corporate capacity.

The earl of Kington retired from the army, alleging that he would not enforce measures in a military capacity which he had opposed as a legislator.

19. First skirmish between the king's troops and Americans at Lexington.

May 1. First stone of Freemasons' hall laid.

4. The charity children, to the number of 5000, attended St. Paul's as usual.

8. Tunnel at Norwood hill, on the Chesterfield and Trent canal, 2850 yards long, opened.

10. Matilda, the exiled queen of Denmark, sister to George III., died at Zell.

American congress resolve to raise an army, and issue a paper currency on the security of the "United Colonies."

17. Americans surprise forts Ticonderoga and Crown Point.

22. Royal assent given to a bill empowering the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge to hold in perpetuity the copyright of books given or bequeathed to them.

26. Parliament prorogued by the king, with strong expressions of satisfaction at their proceedings.

29. An injunction obtained by the Stationers' Company against Mr. Carnan for printing almanacks, dissolved.

June 7. King of France crowned at Rheims.

17. Battle of Bunker's Hill, in which the king's troops sustained a loss of 1054 men, of whom 226 were killed. That of the provincials, as returned by themselves, was 450. In the conflict Charleston, which had been occupied by the Americans, was set on fire and burnt to the ground.

22. A regatta on the Thames, borrowed from the Venetians, and being the first of the kind in this country, attracted a great concourse.

July 7. The Americans sent a long address to their fellow subjects in England, containing their reasons for taking up arms; signed John Hancock.

25. French clergy vote the king a free gift of 20,000,000 of livres.

31. The Endeavour, captain Cook, from the South Seas, arrived at Portsmouth.

Aug. The White Boys in Ireland commit great excesses, chiefly in revenge for serving tithes processes.

26. Died, James Burgh, formerly master of an academy at Newington Green, and author of "Political Disquisitions," and other works.

Sept. 13. An address to the king from the people of Manchester deprecating the American rebellion, and promising to support the king with their lives and fortunes. Similar addresses from Lancaster, Liverpool, and Leicester.

15. An imperial order published at Vienna, limiting the privilege of sanctuary in churches.

24. The justices of peace, at their quarter sessions, Hicks' Hall, addressed the king to the same effect.

Oct. 4. The king of Denmark prohibited any intercourse with the revolted colonies.

11. Address to the king from 1171 merchants and traders of London, praying a termination of the American contest. Similar address from Bristol, presented by Mr. Burke.

14. Counter address, disapproving the proceedings of the Americans, from 941 merchants and traders of London. An address from 1029 liverymen was also presented, offering their support to maintain the rights of the crown.

23. Extraordinary reports of a conspiracy to seize the king. Mr. Sayre an American, and banker in London, arrested and committed to the Tower. He was soon after discharged, and brought an action against lord Rochford for false imprisonment, obtaining 1000*l.* damages.

26. MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.—The opening speech of the king was almost exclusively occupied with the affairs of America. It was unusually long, setting forth that the rebellion had become general, and indicated a purpose of establishing an independent empire, and that it was too important to give up colonies planted by our industry and protected by the blood and treasure of the parent stock. The debate on the address in the lords was chiefly remarkable from the declaration of the duke of Grafton, the lord privy seal, who expressed his entire dissent from the coercive policy of his colleagues, but could not support the amendment moved by lord Rockingham, which was negatived by 66 to 33. In the commons the ministerial address was carried by 278 to 108. The point chiefly dwelt upon by the opposition was the employment of the electoral troops to garrison Gibraltar and Minorca, in place of the British, who were sent to America.

Nov. 9. The duke of Grafton resigned the privy seal. He was succeeded by the earl of Dartmouth, whose office of secretary to the colonies was given to lord George Sackville Germaine, the nobleman implicated in the affair of Minden in 1759. Another cabinet change was occasioned by the appointment of lord Weymouth to the southern secretaryship, lord Rochford retiring from public life.

20. Lord North obtained leave by a majority of 192 to 64, to bring in a bill to prohibit all trade whatever with the American colonies. One clause of the bill, which compelled all who were taken on board American vessels to serve as common sailors in British ships of war, was especially noticed in the lords as a "refinement in tyranny."

Dec. 5. The Norwich stage coach was attacked by seven highwaymen on Epping forest, three of whom were shot dead by the guard, but his ammunition failing, he was shot dead himself, and the remainder of the gang robbed the passengers.

A charter of incorporation granted to Greenwich hospital.

31. General Montgomery and colonel Arnold attempting to surprise Quebec, the former was killed and the latter had his leg shattered. The failure of this coup de main was ascribed to the unexpected defection of the Canadians. Montgomery was an officer of great merit and accomplishment, and highly respected.

STATISTICAL FACTS.—It may be gathered (says the Annual Register for 1775) from authentic papers, that the stage coaches generally drive with eight inside, and often ten outside passengers. That there are now of these vehicles, flys. machines and diligences upwards of 400; and of other four-wheeled carriages 17,000. That the number of packs of cards stamped last year, amounted to 428,000; and of dice to 3000. That there has been coined at the Tower, since 1772, about 13,000,000*l.* in gold. That the public pays the Bank 50,000*l.* a-year for management; and that the proprietors do not divide more than 240,000*l.* a-year. That the balance paid for corn imported (the value of corn exported in each year being first deducted) was in FRANCE.—Turgot and other ministers were this year seriously engaged in promoting reform. They reduced the useless part of the army, applied to the digging of canals, making rivers navigable, and promoting manufactories. They were opposed by those who throve by public abuses. A scarcity of corn prevailed, which was sought to be relieved by a bounty on importation.

In Spain an unsuccessful effort was made with a powerful armament to chastise the Barbary powers.

In the Duchy of Tuscany a law passed for regulating the age and term of admission into the monastic orders, the object of which was to reduce the number of votaries. On the motion of Mr. Dunning in the king's-bench, rule made absolute for a mandamus to restore the clerk of Hampstead, who had been discharged by the rector for indecorously giving a kiss to the bride to whom he had stood father as soon as the ceremony was over, the court declaring the clerk not to be dischargeable at the pleasure of the rector or curate, his office being temporal, not ecclesiastical.

July 4. AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE.—The congress of North America issued their famous declaration of independence, abjuring their allegiance to the crown of Britain. Their declaration began with an assertion of the general rights of man, of the purposes for which governments were instituted, and of the right of changing them when they no longer answered those purposes. It enumerated the wrongs alleged to have been received from the mother country, and concluded with asserting in the name of the people, that the thirteen colonies "are, and of right ought to be, Free and Independent States." After reading the declaration at New York, the king's statue was taken down.

DEATH OF DAVID HUME.—Thus celebrated historian and philosopher expired at Edinburgh, in the sixty-fifth year of his age. From the nature of his malady, death had long been in prospect, and Mr. Hume prepared for it with cheerfulness and resignation. Adam Smith describes his character as eminently urbane, generous, charitable, gay and good-humoured. He had many of the qualities suited to his task of historian: his knowledge of the world, acute and vigorous intellect, industry in research, great equanimity and command of temper. Yet the fidelity of his English history has lately been sharply questioned, and an artful distortion of facts, to suit his monarchical predilections, imputed to him. In his burlesque representations of the scenes and actors of the Cromwellian era, he certainly seems to have taken the license ascribed to Livy the Roman historian, though for a different purpose. Mr. Hume's scepticism, in which he was an enthusiast, seems to have been satisfactorily disposed of in the Edinburgh Review, vol. xx., 236. Some of his political essays, especially those on Money, Public Credit, and Commerce, are remarkable for neatness, depth, and ingenuity.

EAST INDIES.—The transactions in India this year subsequently gave rise to proceedings in England of great interest and importance. Warren Hastings, the governor of Bengal, was accused of receiving large bribes, one from Munny Begum, a concubine of the late Mir Jaffer. Rajah Nundcomar was prosecuted by Hastings and Vansittart for a conspiracy; failing in that, Nundcomar, a few days after was accused of forgery, condemned and hanged amidst the regrets of his countrymen; forgery not being a capital offence by the laws of India. At Madras, violent disputes had arisen between the governor, lord Pigot, and the members of council. Lord Pigot suspended the members of council; on which the suspended members, with some others, declared themselves the government, arrested lord Pigot and committed him to prison, where he died, April 17th, 1777.

He was a native of Edinburgh, had enlisted and deserted three times from the army, committed several robberies, and never expressed any remorse for his crimes.

John Peter le Maître, a Frenchman, was tried for robbing the British Museum of several valuable medals and coins: he was found guilty and sentenced to five years' hard labour on the Thames.

9. CIVIL LIST ARREARS.—Lord North delivered a royal message to the commons, informing them that the debts of the civil list had increased to upwards of 600,000*l*. It occasioned warm debates, being the second application in the present reign; and the accounts presented to the house were sharply scrutinised, especially the items of pensions and secret service money, which had enormously increased. Such, however, was the feeling in favour of the court, that the arrears were not only provided for, but an addition of 100,000*l*. a year voted to the king's income. Upon presenting to the king the bill for the purpose (May 7th) for the royal assent, sir Fletcher Norton, the speaker, took occasion to deliver the following unusual address:—"In a time, Sir, of public distress, full of difficulty and danger, their constituents labouring under burdens almost too heavy to be borne, your faithful commons, postponing all other business, have not only granted to your majesty a large present supply, but also a very great additional revenue, great beyond example, great beyond your majesty's highest expense; but all this, sire, they have done in the well-grounded confidence that you will apply wisely what they have granted liberally." This gave much offence to some members, as not expressing the sentiments of the house, but ultimately thanks were voted to the chair.

30. Lord Chatham, after a long absence, came down to the lords wrapped in flannel, and in a speech distinguished by his usual fervid eloquence, moved an address to the King to put an end to hostilities in America, by the removal of grievances. Referring to the expectations that were entertained of success in the present campaign, he remarked, that as for the conquest of America, the gaining of ten pitched battles would do nothing towards it. "You talk," he exclaimed, "of your numerous friends to annihilate the Congress, and of your powerful forces to disperse their army; I might as well talk of driving them before me with this crutch." The motion was supported by the dukes of Grafton and Manchester, the bishop of Peterborough (Dr. Hinchcliffe), and lord Camden; but rejected on a division by a majority of 99 to 28. At this time strangers were admitted to hear the debates in the lords, though excluded from the commons, where a motion for opening the gallery had shortly before been thrown out by a majority of 53 to 16.

July 1. A cause of an extraordinary nature was tried before lord Mansfield, which involved a question as to the sex of the Chevalier D'Eon, who had formerly acted as French minister in England; two foreign witnesses (one a surgeon) swore positively that the Chevalier was a female, in consequence of which a verdict for 700*l*. was given for the plaintiff, being the amount of a wager laid upon the subject. After this decision the Chevalier put on female attire, which he continued to wear till his death in 1810, when it was indubitably established that he was of the male sex; proving the gross perjury of the witnesses at the trial.

4. Rev. John Horne convicted of a libel in charging the king's troops with murdering the loyal subjects of America at Lexington. When brought up for judgment he was sentenced to be imprisoned one year, and to find sureties for good behaviour for three years.

The legal point was, whether one phrase did not imply a lease in possession, the other in reversion.

Dec. Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow and Edinburgh, raised regiments at their own expense for the American war.

11. Royal assent given to a bill for suspending the Habeas Corpus Act.

12. Died, aged 70, Dr. Haller, the celebrated Swiss physician.

24. A subscription was opened to assist the American prisoners confined in the different gaols of the kingdom.

PORTUGAL.—Joseph I. of Portugal dying, he was succeeded by his daughter Maria, who was married to her uncle Don Pedro. The prime minister, Pombal, lost both his place and his influence. His proceedings had been arbitrary, but beneficial to the public. He found the country infested with robbers; trade decayed, landed property in the hands of the nobles, and the people depraved. He tried to remedy these evils, but his measures being severe, and opposed to popular prejudices, he became generally disliked.

FRANCE.—The European powers viewed the contest between England and her colonies with great interest. France in particular beheld it with pleasure, and although she did not enter openly into the contest, privately encouraged the Americans. Dr. Franklin and two others arrived at Paris, as ambassadors from the American Congress. Many French officers embarked to join the American standard. The queen was a decided partizan of the revolted colonies, and she influenced the king.

1778.—PROSPECTS OF THE WAR.—The situation of the Ministry at the beginning of the year was one of extreme humiliation. Their scheme of drawing a revenue from America had produced, instead of a revenue, a successful rebellion. After nearly three years' fighting their military position in the country they aimed at conquering was worse than at the close of the first campaign. Their armies were for the most part either destroyed, or cooped up like general Howe at Philadelphia, in spots where they could not act and from which they durst scarcely stir. On the other hand, every day was adding to the strength and resources of the insurgents. They had established for themselves an efficient government; they had agents at the principal European courts; they raised and maintained armies; issued letters of marque and reprisal, licensed privateers, and had their own flag, which was every where respected. Not only were the high seas thus made dangerous to British commerce, but even the coasts of Ireland and Britain could not be navigated with safety by unarmed vessels. In these circumstances the public, especially the commercial part, began to be not discouraged but dissatisfied with the further prosecution of the contest. Attempts were made to raise additional troops by the voluntary subscriptions of individuals, but of 15,000 men that were eventually obtained not 5000 were raised in England; above two-thirds of the whole number being procured from Scotland, and mostly from among the Highland clans. London had from the first been opposed to the war; and both here and at Bristol the public meetings that were called scouted the scheme. Even the country gentlemen began to turn upon lord North; and the parliamentary majorities diminished when, instead of an American revenue, they found, from the course of his policy, an addition to their burdens.

Jan. 2. The king on alighting from his sedan at St. James's assaulted by a lunatic who called herself queen Beck.

10. American prisoners in England amounted to 924, and the subscriptions raised for their relief to 3815*l*. In the spring of last year the Americans tried to negotiate an exchange of prisoners. They applied for this purpose through the medium of Dr. Franklin, the resident of the United States at Paris, to lord Stormont, the British ambassador at the French court, and to which application his lordship thought fit to return the following answer:—"The king's ambassador receives no application from rebels, unless they come to implore his majesty's mercy."

10. Died, at Upsal, the celebrated naturalist Linnæus, aged 71.

15. Nootka Sound and the Sandwich Islands discovered by captain Cook.

Subscriptions were opened for raising troops for the war, by the justices of the peace, grand jury, and freeholders of Middlesex. In London the motion for a subscription was carried in the court of aldermen by a majority of 11 to 9; but it was rejected by 3 to 1 in the common council. The monied interest, however, evinced their loyalty by subscribing 14,000*l*.

15. The court of session at Edinburgh unanimously gave their opinion in favour of the unlimited freedom of the negroes in this country, which went much further than the courts of England had done.

17. The prices of provisions in Newgate market were as under:—

	per stone.	per stone.
Beef	2 s . 4 d . to 2 s . 10 d .
Mutton	2 s . 2 d . to 2 s . 8 d .
Veal	2 s . 10 d . to 3 s . 6 d .
Pork	2 s . 8 d . to 3 s . 4 d .
Butter	1 s . 7 d . to 1 s . 10 d .	per lump.

Feb. 4. Lord Abingdon moved in the lords, that it is the opinion of the house, "That granting any aid by subscription towards the raising of troops without the authority of parliament, is contrary to the spirit of the constitution, and the letter of the law." Negated by a large majority.

6. The court of France concluded a treaty of defensive alliance with the American colonies, avowing its end to be the "effectual maintaining of the liberty, sovereignty, and independence of the thirteen United States of America, as well in matters of government as of commerce."

17. Lord North introduced his conciliatory bills, by which he proposed to concede every thing for which the Americans contended, except only their nominal independence of the crown. Commissioners were to be appointed to treat with the colonists, with full powers to suspend all acts passed since 1763, to agree to a cessation of arms, grant pardons, and appoint governors. The sudden abandonment of all points in dispute seems to have produced general astonishment, and his lordship's speech (says the Annual Register) was received with a "dull melancholy silence."

Mar. 5. Died, Dr. Arne, the celebrated musical composer.

9. Conciliatory bills read a third time in the lords and passed. Dr. Porteus, the new bishop of Chester, concluded a maiden speech on the occasion with these words:—"Some think the bills offer too much, others say they offer too little; therefore I think they contain just enough." On which the duke of Richmond retorted, that "the right rev. prelate had found out a new mode of reasoning; namely, that that must be right which pleased nobody."

10. French ambassador left London.

21. Dr. Franklin, Silas Deane, and Lee, publicly received at the French court as ambassadors from the United States of America.

21. Duel at Paris between the count d'Artois and the duke de Bourbon; the count had grossly insulted the duchess.

27. Embargo laid on French ships. Orders issued to embody the militia.

Apr. 7. DIVISIONS ON AMERICA.—The duke of Richmond moved an address to the king, which went to the extent of recommending a recognition of the independence of the American colonies. It was supported by the Rockingham party, who now saw no other likely issue to the struggle. Other leaders, however, of the whig party were opposed to the separation of the colonies from the mother country. This ground was taken by lords Chatham, Shelburne, Temple, and Camden in the upper house; and by Mr. Dunning, colonel Barré, and those who acted with them in the lower. The duke was first replied to by viscount Weymouth in a short speech. Lord Chatham next claimed attention: he had entered the house in a rich suit of black velvet, a full wig, and wrapped in flannel to the knees: he was supported to his seat by his son and son-in-law, Mr. William Pitt and viscount Mahon. He looked emaciated: resting his hands on his crutches, he at first spoke with difficulty, but as he grew warm, his voice rose, and was as harmonious as ever,—oratorical and affecting. “My lords,” said he, “I rejoice that the grave has not closed upon me, that I am still alive to lift up my voice against the dismemberment of this ancient and most noble monarchy.” He was replied to with great respect by Richmond, when on attempting to rise again he fell back before uttering a word, in a convulsive fit, and was carried out of the house. An adjournment immediately ensued.

8. On a resumption of the debate lord Shelburne passed severe strictures on the composition of the ministry. “I repeat again,” said his lordship, “the lawyers and commoners: the present conductors of public business, must be sent back to their proper vocations, or their original obscurity.” On a division Richmond’s motion was rejected by 50 to 33.

13. The earl of Carlisle, viscount Howe, sir William Howe, William Eden, esq., and governor Johnstone, appointed commissioners to treat with the Americans.

A bill introduced by sir Philip Jennings Clerke to restrain any member of the commons from being concerned in any government contract; it was read a first and second time, but thrown out on committal by a majority of 115 to 113.

14. General sir William Howe, who was opposed to the policy pursued towards America, was permitted to resign the chief command of the British forces, and was succeeded by sir Henry Clinton.

16. Royal assent given to a bill for laying a tax on inhabited houses. Also to a bill for enabling the king to settle annuities on his children, namely 60,000*l.* a-year on the six princes, 30,000*l.* a-year on the five princesses; also 12,000*l.* a-year on the son and daughter of the duke of Gloucester.

23. Paul Jones, the commander of an American privateer, burns in the night a sloop in the harbour of Whitehaven, and designed setting fire to the town. He afterwards landed on the western coast of Scotland near Kirkcudbright, and pillaged the house of lord Selkirk of money and plate.

25. The king visited the dock-yard at Chatham, reviewed the first regiment of Royals, and held a levee at the commissioner’s house.

May 2. Mr. Deane arrived in America, with the treaty concluded with France.

8th. Lord Mansfield decided that an action is not maintainable against the postmaster general for bank notes taken or lost out of a letter sent by post.

DEATH OF CHATHAM.—This distinguished orator and statesman survived his last appearance in parliament 34 days, expiring at his favourite seat of Hayes, in Kent, on the 11th inst., in the 70th year of his age. Chatham began life with the not very promising outfit of 100*l.* a-year, a cornetcy in the Blues, and a hereditary gout; and so far succeeded as to achieve for himself a name not inferior in lustre to any in the British peerage. A man must have had transcendent merits who could be famous throughout Europe, and have statues erected to his honour in America. He used to say he “loved honourable war;” and his first destination was not inaptly chosen, for in activity, promptitude, energy and resoluteness, he had eminently those gifts which usually lead to military celebrity. It was in wielding the offensive power of England he acquired his chief reputation; the wisdom of his civil government was never tried, nor if it had is it likely to have been conspicuous. In his ideas of international relations and of public happiness, he does not appear to have penetrated beyond his contemporaries. Essentially haughty, dominant and unyielding, he was as little tolerant of national as of individual rivalry. He cherished the old yeoman prejudices, that France was “the ancient and inveterate enemy of England;” that the greatness of his own country consisted in the humiliation of her neighbour, in the maintenance of powerful armies and navies, and in vast colonial acquisitions. Ambition was his ruling passion, but whether that is laudable or not must depend on its direction. It certainly betrayed him into apparent inconsistencies. His first opposing and then strenuously supporting the Hanoverian policy of George II., is one instance. His conduct in relation to America is not exempt from obscurity. Chatham’s game always was the PREMIERSHIP, and it was his incessant scheming to reach this prize that chiefly kept up the feud between his own and the Rockingham section of the whig party; but whether the successive positions he took up in parliament on the American question were intended to lead to its attainment can only be presumptively decided. Under his ministry the obnoxious tea-tax was imposed; yet he afterwards denounced taxation without representation as tyranny. With all the might of his eloquence he opposed the coercive policy of lord North—implored him to put an end to the war—yet towards the close, when the contest had become utterly hopeless, he declaimed almost with his last breath, against recognising the independence of the colonies,—an indispensable concession without which peace was wholly unattainable. It was at this period he was again brought into communication with the earl of Bute, through the officiousness of the physician of that nobleman, and of his own physician, Dr. Addington, father of the present viscount Sidmouth. The correspondence which took place on this occasion was published in the Annual Register, and its bearing has been a subject of political speculation. The three chief points deducible from it appear to be, first, that Bute and Chatham mutually entertained a higher opinion of the other, than either before thought possible; secondly, that they both thought public affairs could only be retrieved by “new counsels and new counsellors;” but, third, it does not appear lord Chatham was prepared to coalesce either with lord Bute or lord North for this purpose. One thing, however, is evident: that Chatham had not, in the last year of his life, either lost the hope or desire again to direct the councils of the country. Apart from the aberrations originating in an ardent love of power, the course of Chatham was splendid and magnanimous. He always cherished noble sentiments. Lord Chesterfield said of him “his private life was stained by no vices, nor sullied by any meanness.” The inscription penned by his countess testifies to his domestic worth, but a more impartial testimony to his general excellence is his unchangeable popularity. The city of London was always proud of him, and after his decease erected a flattering tribute to his memory. In addition to contemporary praise and posthumous honours, he received other, and as some may think, more substantial tributes to his deserts. Almost his entire fortune was made up of the disinterested benefactions of private individuals. Besides the legacy of 10,000*l.* left him by Sarah duchess of Marlborough, and some other legacies, sir William Pynsent, an old gentleman of 90, bequeathed him in 1765 an estate of 3000*l.* a-year, and 30,000*l.* in money. It seems to have been the prevailing fashion so to remunerate public characters, for Horne Tooke and Mr. Wilkes were similarly favoured. The vigour of Chatham in council and his eloquence in the senate have been often described. His speeches have two qualities not commonly united—they were effective in the delivery and are still readable; they are not words only, but burning thoughts, sententious arguments, and bold truths, delivered in good Saxon English, and, aided as they were by suitable action, a fine person, eagle eye, and pealing voice, that at once animated the speaker and impressed the listener, one cannot be surprised at the representations made of the irresistible force of his parliamentary oratory. Sir Robert Walpole was alarmed at the novel thunder that burst upon him, and after being exposed to his first anathemas called out for some one to “muzzle that terrible cornet of horse.” The natural gifts of Chatham, it is well known, were strengthened by careful cultivation, and he did not neglect even trifles. His last appearance in parliament was obviously the result of some preparation. Mr. Thackeray states (History of the Life of Chatham, ii. 406) that he was never seen in business without a full-dress coat and tie-wig. The under secretaries were never permitted to sit before him. He was not eminent for literary taste; his compositions are involved, careless, incorrect, and unpolished:—therefore he was not JUNIUS.

May 22. The commons resolved to make a permanent settlement of 4000*l.* a-year on the descendants of the late earl of Chatham, to whom the earldom shall descend.

28. MITIGATION OF PENAL LAWS.—Royal assent given to a bill, introduced by sir George Savile, for relaxing the severe penalties inflicted in the reign of William III. on Roman Catholics. These penalties included the punishment of popish priests as felons or traitors; the forfeitures by popish heirs educated abroad; the power given to a son or nearest relation, being a protestant, of taking possession of a father's or other relation's estate; and the depriving papists of the power of acquiring landed property. The lenity of the times had in practice mitigated the rigour of these intolerant provisions, yet the liability to incur such penalties at the pleasure of an informer or a kinsman was a severe hardship.

30. Died, in the eighty-fifth year of his age, at the house of the marquis de Vilette, the celebrated M. de Voltaire. He had only in the February preceding, after an absence of 28 years, arrived at Paris; where he had come, as he said, “to seek glory and a tomb.”

June. A general embargo laid on all shipping, and a general press for seamen on the Thames.

3. Parliament prorogued. A motion was made the day before to prevent the prorogation in the present critical posture of affairs, but negatived by a large majority. Immediately after the close of the session earl Bathurst resigned the great seal, and the attorney-general, Edward Thurlow, was appointed lord chancellor. The solicitor-general, Mr. Wedderburne, succeeded to the office of attorney-general, and Mr. Wallace became solicitor-general.

9. Lord Chatham's remains interred with great solemnity, in Westminster Abbey; the hon. William Pitt was chief mourner.

RELIEF TO IRISH TRADE.—The revolt of the colonies seems to have drawn attention to the treatment of Ireland; and two acts passed this session—one admitting the Irish to a direct participation in the colonial trade, and the other permitting the free importation of cotton yarn manufactured in Ireland into any British port. These concessions excited prodigious alarm in the commercial and manufacturing districts, as likely to prove detrimental to British industry. London, however, was uninfluenced by such selfish considerations; but from other towns petitions and instructions to representatives were sent up; counsel and evidence were heard; and the acts were only finally passed by the present abandonment of some of the provisions most favourable to Irish commerce. Mr. Burke was the great advocate of Ireland on this occasion.

17. The American congress decline to treat with the British commissioners, unless the independence of the colonies is acknowledged by the withdrawal of the king's armies.

18. Philadelphia evacuated by the king's troops, who crossed the Delaware without loss: they were overtaken by the American army at a place called Red Bank: a partial action took place: they reached Sandy Hook on the last day of the month, and were conveyed by Lord Howe's fleet to New York. Eleven days after the French admiral D'Estaing arrived at the mouth of the Delaware, with twelve ships of the line and three frigates.

28. Messrs. Harrison and Sheridan purchase the Opera-house for 22,000*l*.

July 2. Died, Jean Jacques Rousseau, the author of Emilius, Social Contract, and other eloquent productions.

27. An action between the English fleet consisting of 30 sail, and the French of 32 sail, the former commanded by admiral Keppel, the latter by count D'Orvilliers: the result was wholly indecisive, neither party having lost a single ship. This action gave rise to courts-martial on the conduct of admirals Keppel and Palliser.

30. Two brothers died at a village near Reading, one 93, and the other 83 years of age, where, for many years, they had lived together in one room in the meanest manner, and are thought to have died worth 100,000*l*.

In this month a strong party of the American loyalists, called Tories, with some Indians, laid waste the beautiful and prosperous settlement of Wyoming on the Susquehanna. The devastation was retaliated by the Virginians against the Canadian settlements on the Mississippi, which they reduced, and exacted an oath from the inhabitants of allegiance to the United States.

Aug. 1. The act which obliged lottery-office keepers to take out licenses and pay 50*l*. for the same, reduced the number of these offices from 400 to 51.

18. A cucumber was gathered near Derby, weighing twenty pounds.

Sept. 22. The grand dock at Hull opened.

25. Five hundred men of Lord Seaforth's Highland regiment deserted and took possession of Arthur's Hill, near Edinburgh, with a design to defend themselves to the last extremity. On inquiry it was found they had imbibed an idea that they were sold to the East India Company. General Houghton promising them a free pardon, they returned to their duty.

Oct. In this month the British commissioners left America, leaving behind them an angry and indiscreet manifesto, threatening revengeful consequences to the colonies from their connexions with France. Further discredit was brought on this mission by an unsuccessful attempt of Mr. Johnstone, through the medium of a lady, to corrupt some of the members of congress, and in consequence of which the congress declined all communication with that gentleman. The conduct of the earl of Carlisle in the affair with the marquis de la Fayette is the only part of the proceedings of the commissioners in which they seem to have evinced wisdom: the marquis had sent a chivalrous note to the earl, resenting the "terms of insult" (Ann. Reg. xxii. 317) in which he had spoken of France, and requiring personal satisfaction; but the earl properly declined to make a private and individual atonement for an act he had done in concert with others in discharge of a public duty.

Nov. 26. Parliament opened by the king with a speech in which he denounced the treacherous conduct of France in clandestinely supplying the American insurgents with the materials of warfare. Long debates ensued, and the opposition in the lords resorted to the unusual course of moving a direct negative to the ministerial address. It was carried, however, by 67 to 35. In the commons the house divided at two in the morning, when the address was carried by 226 to 107.

Dec. 17. The theatre at Saragossa burnt; 400 persons lost their lives.

GENERAL BURGOWNE.—On the arrival of this officer on his parole from America, a court of inquiry into his conduct was appointed, but the general officers of which it was composed reported that in his then situation of prisoner of war to the congress, no cognizance could be taken of it. He then demanded a court-martial, which on the same ground was refused. Bringing his case before parliament, motions were made by his friends in both houses for an inquiry into the causes of his surrender, but they were frustrated by the influence of the ministry. The general afterwards refusing to return to his captive army, was by the king deprived of his military commands.

PRUSSIA AND AUSTRIA.—Hostilities commenced between these powers on a scale of magnitude that threatened to revive the sanguinary devastations of the seven years' war. They originated in the revival of some obsolete claim of Austria to the succession of the Bavarian states now that the Guillemine line was extinct by the death of the elector Joseph Maximilian. Prussia resisted the pretension; and each, the emperor and king, drew out an army of 200,000 men. In July one of the Prussian corps under Frederick marched to the frontiers of Bohemia, while another invaded Austrian Silesia. The plan of the imperialists was defensive; and a campaign of marches and countermarches ensued, in which all the resources of military tactics were displayed. In September both combatants withdrew from the field without having sustained any material loss other than from sickness and desertion.

1779. Jan. A frost this winter lasted eighty-four days.

2. The beautiful chapel of Greenwich hospital burnt.

8. Glasgow, Perth, Dundee, Dunfermline, Kilmarnock and Stirling, entered into strong resolutions, to oppose to the utmost any relaxation of the laws against the Roman Catholics.

20. At his house in the Adelphi-terrace, in his 62nd year, died, DAVID GARRICK, the first of actors, and a most amiable man. He had been forty years on the stage. His remains were deposited in Westminster Abbey with great funeral pomp.

Feb. 2. The mob at Edinburgh, excited by an anonymous letter dropped in the streets, burnt down a house intended for a papist chapel, and break the windows of Roman Catholics. Similar riots disgraced Glasgow; but the exertions of the magistrates and the principal inhabitants restored order.

9. Two clergymen who had preached in a chapel in Clerkenwell, without leave of the incumbent or license from the bishop, were condemned in Doctors' Commons with costs of suit, and the chapel shut by a writ of monition.

10. A day of public fast.

11. Admiral Keppel, after a trial of thirty days, is honourably acquitted of the charges of misconduct and incapacity, exhibited against him by sir Hugh Palliser.

The metropolis was twice illuminated on the occasion, and the freedom of the city voted to the admiral. Outrages were committed by the mob on the house of lord North and others supposed to be inimical to the accused.

14. Captain Cook, the celebrated circumnavigator, killed at Owhyhee in an affray with the natives. Before this catastrophe was known in Europe the French government issued an order to their cruisers not to molest this able seaman should they fall in with him in his homeward voyage.

16. The thanks of both houses voted to admiral Keppel for having gloriously upheld the honour of the British flag on the 27th and 28th of July last. The dispute between the naval officers had now become a party question in the nation and parliament, where it was used as a means of attack on the ministry, especially lord Sandwich, the head of the admiralty, whose indecorous private life helped to sharpen the popular hatred which his politics excited.

17. Popular feeling running strongly against sir Hugh Palliser, he resigned his seat in the commons, and all his public employments to the amount of 4000*l.* a year.

25. The bridge at Puerto Santo in Spain fell down, while the priests were consecrating it, and many persons were killed.

Mar. 1. At the instance of the African Committee, a prosecution had been instituted against the master of a slave ship, and he was this day, before lord Mansfield, cast in 500*l.* damages for carrying away a free black from the coast of Africa and selling him as a slave in Jamaica.

19. The citizens of Edinburgh determined to make restitution to the catholics for the damages they had sustained from the mob.

30. The university of Oxford petitioned the commons against the bill for the relief of protestant dissenting ministers and schoolmasters.

Apr. 7. As Miss Reay was coming out of Covent-Garden theatre, she was shot dead by the Rev. Mr. Hackman, who instantly tried to shoot himself with another pistol. A refusal of Hackman's addresses occasioned this catastrophe. Miss Reay had lived with lord Sandwich 17 years, by whom she had nine children. Hackman was tried at the Old Bailey before judge Blackstone, and executed.

May 7. The barons of the Exchequer decided that the tithe of potatoes is a small tithe and payable to the vicar, not the impropiator.

13. Peace of Teschen concluded between Austria and Prussia, under the mediation of France and Russia.

30. The British take possession of Ver-plants and Stoney Point, which commanded the communication between the eastern and western colonies. Upon learning this disaster Washington decamped from the Jerseys, but without abandoning his Fabian tactics. Subsequently, on the 15th of July, Stoney Point was surprised and gallantly carried by the American general Wayne.

June 13. Rev. John Horne applied to the society of the Inner Temple, to be admitted a barrister, but was refused on the ground of his being a clergyman in full orders.

16. The Spanish ambassador presented a manifesto to the British court, equivalent to a declaration of war.

23. The East India Company determine to raise 6000 men for the public service, and to fit out three ships of 74 guns each as a present to the government.

July 3. The king, in closing the parliamentary session, said that he esteemed it a happy omen of the success of his arms, that as difficulties increased so increased the courage and constancy of the people.

6. Partial naval action in the West Indies, between count D'Estaing and admiral Byron.

9. Royal proclamation commanding all horses and cattle to be driven from the coasts in the event of an invasion.

22. A fire in the victualling-office, Plymouth.

30. Orders issued to permit no foreigners of any description to visit the royal dock-yards.

Aug. 3. At the Surrey assizes it is determined that a house which receives no benefit from the sewers cannot be assessed to the sewers' rate.

10. Eruption of Mount Vesuvius, which continued several days, destroyed some villages and a hunting-seat of the King of Naples. The country for four miles was covered with lava, which in several places lay two or three feet deep.

20. The duke of Northumberland laid the first stone of Clerkenwell sessions-house.

ALARM OF INVASION.—Very considerable anxiety was created this month by the appearance of the united fleets of France and Spain in the Channel in overwhelming force. The English admiral was obliged to retire before them, and the flags of the coalesced Bourbons continued to menace and insult the British coasts with impunity until the approach of the equinox, when count d'Orville directed his course back to Brest, without accomplishing anything further than the capture of the Ardent man-of-war, which, by accident, had fallen in with the combined fleets.

During the summer the siege of Gibraltar was undertaken by the Spaniards; its reduction being one of the principal objects of Spain in becoming a party to the war.

Sept. 28. The Houghton (Sir R. Walpole's) collection of pictures was sold to the empress of Russia, and shipped for Petersburg.

The number of prisoners of war in Britain amounted to 12,000; namely, 2200 American, 600 Spanish, the remainder French.

Oct. 5. Salary of the recorder of London fixed at 600*l.* per annum.

9. Serious riots at Manchester, occasioned by the buildings and machinery of Mr. Arkwright: two persons killed and several wounded by the intervention of the military.

11. Several persons who had remained voluntarily in the King's-bench prison for the sake of letting their rooms, were turned out of the prison.

12. The Irish parliament met, and to the usual addresses moved by the courtiers an amendment was proposed and adopted by large majorities in the following words:—"We beg leave humbly to represent to your majesty, that it is not by temporary expedients, but by a FREE TRADE, that the nation is now to be saved from impending ruin."

The address was carried up to the viceroy under the escort of the duke of Leinster at the head of the Dublin volunteers, amidst loud acclamations of the people. The thanks of both houses were unanimously voted to the volunteer corps throughout the kingdom; and in order to prevent a sudden prorogation a six months' money bill passed the commons.

16. Marquis de Pombal tried at Lisbon and condemned to perpetual imprisonment.

The fortress of Orma captured by a sudden and combined assault of British seamen and soldiers. A considerable booty was obtained; but owing to the unhealthiness of the climate it was shortly after abandoned to the Spaniards.

29. Sir Joseph Yorke, ambassador to the States General, presented a memorial, requesting that the Serapis and Scarborough, two vessels taken by Paul Jones and carried into a Dutch port, might be stopped and delivered up. The States General declined interfering in the matter.

Nov. 11. RESOLUTIONS ON MACHINERY.—The quarter-sessions held at Preston for the county of Lancaster resolved unanimously that the sole cause of the late riots was the new machines employed in the cotton manufacture; that the county, notwithstanding, had greatly benefited by their erection; that the destroying them in one county would only be the means of transferring them to another county; and that if a total stop was put by the legislature to their erection in Britain it would only tend to their establishment in foreign countries, to the detriment of the trade of Britain. These resolutions were transmitted ted to the secretary of state with a request that a special commission might be issued to try the rioters in Lancaster gaol.

15. At Dublin, a counsellor was brought in guilty of murder in having shot a gentleman in a duel. The circumstance of going out deliberately to fight being, in the opinion of the jury, sufficient evidence of malice aforethought, the judges desired the jury to recommend the culprit to the bench for mercy, which they reluctantly did.

On the same day there was an assemblage of 6000 persons before the parliament house, insulting the members, crying out for a free trade in Ireland: they stopped the speaker, and swore the members to support a short money bill: they were proceeding to greater excesses when the lawyers' corps appeared among them, unarmed, and allayed the ferment.

22. Alderman John Wilkes elected chamberlain of London by a large majority.

25. MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.—The state of Ireland was adverted to in the king's speech, but there was no mention of the war in America. It seemed now granted that all hope of recovering the revolted provinces must be given up, and the energies of the country concentrated on the more pressing contest with France and Spain. An amendment to the ministerial address was moved by the marquis of Rockingham, the drift of which was, that public ruin could only be averted "by new measures and new counsellors." He was supported by the dukes of Grafton and Richmond, lords Shelburne, Effingham, Camden, and other peers in opposition. Amongst the opponents of ministers was their former zealous champion lord Lyttleton, who spoke strongly against the pertinacious continuance of the American war. The defence of ministers was feeble, but a majority of two to one supported them. A similar amendment was moved in the commons and rejected by 234 to 134. In the debate lord George Gordon exhibited the first symptoms of that eccentricity for which he was soon after conspicuously mischievous. Some unimportant changes had meanwhile taken place in the administration. Earl Bathurst was nominated president of the council in the room of earl Gower, and viscount Stormont (a nephew of chief-justice Mansfield) was appointed to the northern secretaryship, vacant by the death of lord Suffolk.

27. Died suddenly, in his 36th year, Thomas, Lord Lyttleton. His lordship's abilities were considerable, and he had distinguished himself two days before in the debates on the address and the state of Ireland. It is of him the story of the ghost is related, which is said to have announced his death to him three days before it happened.

30. Duel between the hon. Charles James Fox and W. Adam, Esq., in which the former is slightly wounded. It arose from some remarks made by Mr. Fox in parliament which were supposed to be personal.

Dec. 13. STATE OF IRELAND.—Lord North brought forward his propositions for the relief of Ireland. They consisted chiefly in a repeal of the laws prohibiting the export of Irish woollen manufactures to any part of Europe, and in the admission of Ireland to a direct export and import trade with the British colonies. "Give us a free trade," had long been the popular cry of Ireland, and some concessions had been made in 1778, but in too niggardly a spirit from the selfish jealousies of the commercial interests of England. But a crisis had arrived which rendered a longer refusal of justice dangerous to the connexion between the two countries. Under pretext of making ready to resist the threatened invasion by France and Spain, associations comprising all ranks and parties were formed, and in a few weeks a volunteer army, 50,000 strong, had sprung up in all the pride of military array and all the strength of military discipline. With such a power, the advocates of unrestricted commerce did not attempt to conceal that their object was as much to wrest a redress of domestic grievances from their own government as to repel foreign aggression. They had, as was said, "their face towards America and their back towards England." In fact, the first aspect of the American contest was not so menacing as this armed combination. Ministers were alarmed and embarrassed at finding a second colonial rebellion upon their hands while they were every day losing hope of being able to make head against the first. Hence the resolutions of lord North for opening the Irish trade, and which in the existing temper of parliament were agreed to without opposition.

ARMY AND NAVY.—Before the recess, the commons voted 85,000 men for the sea-service; 111,000 for the land-service, exclusive of militia, amounting, with the additional volunteer companies, to 42,000. The foreign troops in British pay were estimated at 24,000, and the artillery at 6000. The entire force at this period, exclusive of the troops serving on the Irish and Indian establishments, was nearly 270,000. Loans were necessary to support this vast increase of the public establishments; that of the year amounted to 12,000,000*l*.

30. YORK COUNTY MEETING.—A great meeting of freeholders, for forming an association and to consider of a petition to parliament for national economy. In their petition to the house of commons they earnestly requested "that before any new burthens were laid upon the country effectual measures might be taken by that house to inquire into and correct the gross abuses in the expenditure of the public money; to reduce all exorbitant emoluments; to rescind and abolish all sinecure places and unmerited pensions; and to appropriate the produce to the necessities of the state." Meetings were held and petitions of similar import agreed to in all the chief counties and towns in the ensuing year, and the presentation of the York petition (Feb. 8th) produced a great sensation.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—Rev. John Langhorne, an ingenious poet and miscellaneous writer. Rev. J. Ashe, author of an English grammar and other works. William Kenrick, LL.D., a well known literary character. John, duke of Rutland, marquis of Granby, aged 83. Sergeant Glyn, recorder of London and M.P. for Middlesex, a popular lawyer. Dr. John Armstrong, physician and poet. Richard Grenville, earl Temple, the great friend and supporter of alderman Wilkes.

1780. Jan. 4. A deputation from the Protestant Association, formed under the auspices of lord George Gordon, waited on lord North, to request him to present a petition from that society to parliament, against the late concessions to the catholics. Lord North refused. These associations first commenced in 1778, in Scotland, where they were suffered to attain a mischievous organization, though the act which so alarmed popular prejudice did not extend to that country.

7. Great meeting of the Middlesex freeholders at the Mermaid, Hackney, upon the model of the York county-meeting.

16. Sir George Rodney defeated the Spanish admiral De Langara, and was thereby enabled to relieve Gibraltar, besieged by the combined forces of France and Spain.

21. One Gough, a man who kept wild beasts, was fined five guineas for letting one of them loose on a sheriff's officer who came to arrest him.

A proclamation for the capture of all foreign ships carrying warlike stores to the British colonies.

Feb. 2. A great meeting in Westminster to petition for retrenchment; Mr. Fox in the chair. A committee of ninety noblemen and gentlemen appointed: among whom were lords Portland, Egremont, Temple, alderman Wilkes, &c.

4. A public fast-day.

8. Sir George Savile presented to the commons the York petition. He stated that it had been first moved (Dec. 30th) at a meeting of 600 gentlemen and upwards; that in the hall where it was voted, there was more property than there was within the walls of the commons' house; and it was signed by above 8000 freeholders. The committee appointed at the meeting consisted of 61 gentlemen, of whom 14 were clergymen, including two church dignitaries.

11. Messrs. Stratton, Brooke, Floyer and Mackay were brought to the bar of the King's-bench to receive sentence, on being found guilty of removing lord Pigot from the presidency of Madras, and imprisoning him nine months, which was alleged to be the cause of his death. They were sentenced to pay 1000*l.* fine each to the king, which they did immediately, and were discharged.

Mr. Burke introduced his famous plan of economical reform, of which the two leading objects were to lessen the public expenditure and diminish regal influence. He proposed a better regulation of the king's household, the sale of the crown lands, and the abolition of the separate jurisdiction of Wales and the counties palatine. Violent conflicts ensued, in which the ministry more than once were left in a minority; and Mr. Burke's bill was only finally carried curtailed of its chief features.

A motion by colonel Barré in the lower, and lord Shelburne in the upper house, for the appointment of a committee to inspect the public accounts, met with more favour. For this reason the plan was artfully taken up by the minister, who hastily introduced a bill, which passed into a law, for instituting a commission of accounts, consisting of persons not members of the commons. It proved a salutary institution, as their numerous reports testify.

14. DEATH OF BLACKSTONE.—In his 57th year, sir William Blackstone, one of the judges of the court of common-pleas, and popular writer on the laws and constitution of England. This eminent lawyer was the posthumous son of a London mercer, and educated on the foundation of the Charter-house. Not possessing in a high degree the talents of an advocate, Blackstone, at the commencement of his career, retired from the practice of his profession at the bar to his fellowship at Oxford, and did not return to it till after attaining celebrity by his writings and Vinerian lectures. His celebrated Commentaries have been objected to, on account of his prerogative leanings, and inculcating sentiments unfavourable to the toleration of dissenters. They have, however, the rare merit of rendering accessible, and almost intelligible to the unlearned, a very abstruse and forbidding science,—if that can be termed science which is mainly founded on precedent. By digesting and arranging the literary chaos of his predecessors, by ingenious and lucid illustrations, and by putting forth his work in clear and elegant language, he performed a task for the legal student little inferior in utility to that performed by Adam Smith for the student of political economy by the publication of his "Wealth of Nations." Sir William seasonably advocated the penitentiary system of prison discipline (Law Magazine, xv., 312), and, in conjunction with the celebrated John Howard, procured an act (19 Geo. III., c. 74) for erecting penitentiary houses for the confinement of prisoners, as a substitute for transportation.

26. A manifesto of the Russian court announced the coalition of the northern powers, under the title of the ARMÉE NEUTRALE, formed upon the basis that "free bottoms make free goods;" which principle went to authorizing neutral states to carry on their usual commercial intercourse with belligerents except in contraband goods. Although the principle was laid down generally, its operation more immediately applied to England, who remonstrated against it.

29. Thanks of the commons voted to sir George Rodney for his signal naval services.

Mar. 22. Duel between colonel Fullerton and lord Shelburne, in which his lordship is wounded. It originated in a parliamentary altercation.

Apr. 6. Mr. Dunning moved in a committee of the whole house his celebrated resolution "that the influence of the crown has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished." It was carried by a majority of 233 votes against 215; but a second motion, on the 26th instant, to give effect to the first, was lost by a majority of 177 to 134. In the interval the speaker had fallen sick, parliamentary business was interrupted, and the minister made such good use of his time, that alderman Sawbridge declared that ever since the vote of the 6th instant denounced the growing influence of the crown, that influence had been in a progressive state of increase.

17. Sir George Rodney defeated, near Martinique, the French fleet commanded by the count de Guichen, though the results were not so brilliant as they might have been had the zeal of the English admiral been properly supported by his captains. The naval administration of the country had long been wretched, and a very bad spirit pervaded the king's ships. Rodney complained of the misconduct of his officers; but it is now well known that the Admiralty deemed it necessary to suppress the criminatory passages of his despatches, and only one was brought to trial; the others, who were equally accused by the commander, being allowed to escape, from the difficulty of finding a sufficient number of non-delinquent officers to try them.

May 3. The court of King's-bench determined that the owners of adjoining lands have no property in the soil of public navigable rivers down to low-water mark.

6. A petition presented to the king, from the whites and blacks of Calcutta, against the introduction of the English laws there.

9. Two men, one a tradesman and the other a sheriff's officer, were convicted of arresting the servant of an ambassador. They were sentenced by Mr. justice Willes to be conducted to the house of the ambassador, with a label on their breasts, to ask his pardon, and then one of them to be imprisoned three months and the other fined.

29. Great meeting of the Protestant Association in Coachmakers'-hall, lord Geo. Gordon in the chair, who said he would not present their petition to parliament if fewer than 20,000 persons accompanied him. His lordship during the session had frequently interrupted public business by the introduction of religious topics, which excited the risible, rather than the irritable, feelings of the members.

June. RIOTS IN THE METROPOLIS.—On Friday, the 2nd instant, many thousands of people, agreeable to prior notice, met in St. George's fields to accompany lord George Gordon, with a petition to repeal the law of May 28, 1778, in favour of the catholics. Here they divided into three bodies, and proceeded in processional order over the bridges, to the avenues of the house of commons. Many of the mob behaved ill, insulting the members of both houses, and compelling some to put blue cockades in their hats, with the inscription, NO POPERY. Lord George Gordon presented the petition to the house, and moved that it be taken into immediate consideration; but his motion was rejected by 192 votes to 6. The petition is affirmed to have had 120,000 signatures or "marks of men as outrageously zealous as grossly ignorant." During the discussion, his lordship frequently addressed the mob outside, and told them the people of Scotland had no redress till they pulled down the pope's chapels. When the house adjourned, the populace, acting on his suggestion, proceeded to demolish the catholic chapels of the foreign ambassadors. The mob proceeded to Newgate, released the prisoners, destroyed the keeper's furniture, and set fire to the whole. They did the same at the New Prison, Clerkenwell. On Wednesday they destroyed the King's-bench prison and several private houses. The Fleet prison, New Bridewell, and the toll-gates at Blackfriars-bridge shared the same fate. Thirty-six fires were seen blazing this night at one time (Annual Register, xxiii., 262). They attempted the Bank, but the soldiers inflicted a severe chastisement upon them. The military came in from the country, and, in obedience to an order of the king in council, directions were given to the officers to fire upon the rioters without waiting the sanction of the civil power. On Friday tranquillity was restored, but not before 458 persons had been killed and wounded, exclusive of those who perished from intoxication; especially in the house of Mr. Langdale, a catholic and distiller. Under a warrant of the secretaries of state, lord George Gordon was committed to the Tower on a charge of high treason.

The magistracy of the metropolis have been reproached for supineness during the prevalence of these dreadful riots, but Mr. Belsham says (Memoirs of George III., iii. 12) that it was assuredly not forgotten that Mr. Gillam, an excellent magistrate of the county of Surrey, was tried at the Old Bailey for his life in consequence of the order given by him at the riots in St. George's-fields, in 1768, for the military to fire, after long and patiently enduring the greatest provocations from the rioters, and twice reading the riot-act. Such a precedent could not but tend in similar emergencies to enfeeble the civil power.

Attempts were made to create anti-catholic disturbances at Hull, Bristol, and Bath, but they were frustrated by the timely vigilance of the magistrates. It happened unfavourably for a popular motion of the duke of Richmond, that the riots in London commenced on the day he gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill for annual parliaments. The tumults threw a general damp upon all endeavours at political reformation.

9. The earl of Surrey and sir Thomas Gascoigne recanted, before the archbishop of Canterbury, the errors of the church of Rome. The former was candidate for Carlisle, the latter for Beverley.

10. A French force of 6000 men, under count de Rochambeau, landed at Rhode Island, and was cordially received by the Americans.

July 8. Parliament prorogued by the king.

15. Under the special commission appointed to try the rioters, it appears 135 have been tried, and 59 of them capitally convicted. Chief justice Wedderburn, recently created a peer, by the title of lord Loughborough, presided.

18. The court of aldermen resolved to dispense with the service of the military, there being no fear of disturbance, and their maintenance cost the city one hundred pounds per day.

NAVAL LOSSES.—Rich and numerous outward-bound East and West India fleets having sailed from Portsmouth at the end of the month, unfortunately fell in with the combined fleet under don de Cordova, and five East, and above fifty West India men became prizes to the enemy. Shortly before, a great part of the outward-bound Quebec fleet had fallen a prey to the American privateers. The only set-off against these naval disasters was the capture, by admiral Geary, of twelve ships of the home-ward-bound French West India fleet.

Aug. 15. Lord Cornwallis signally defeated general Gates, the Americans losing 900 killed and 1000 made prisoners. Soon after, the American partisan Sumpter was routed by colonel Tarleton, while the English partisan Ferguson was killed, and his corps destroyed.

21. The French king abolished the application of torture to criminals to extort confession.

Sept. 1. Parliament, which had completed its sixth session, and might have continued in existence for another year, was unexpectedly dissolved.

4. Died at Brompton, sir JOHN FIELDING, one of the police-justices of the metropolis. He was half-brother to the author of "Tom Jones," and himself a writer of various tracts on the criminal law, and a miscellaneous publication called "The Universal Mentor." It is a remarkable fact that Fielding was blind from his youth, yet was an active and sagacious magistrate (Gent. Mag.), and the promoter, if not the founder, of the Magdalen hospital, the Marine Society, and other charities.

22. At the close of the poll for Westminster, the numbers were—for admiral Rodney, 5298; Mr. Fox, 4878; lord Lincoln, the court candidate, 4157.

Oct. 2. Major Andre hanged, as a spy, by the Americans. He had been detected in the American lines, with a false passport, disguised in plain clothes; and the papers found upon him showed that he had been employed in negotiating the infamous treachery of general Arnold to betray his position at West Point, and troops, to the British general.

6. Mr. Laurens, late president of the American Congress, after an examination by the privy-council, committed to the Tower, on a charge of high-treason. He had been taken on his passage to Holland, and papers were found showing that an alliance was about being concluded between the Americans and that country.

31. NEW PARLIAMENT.—Sir Fletcher Norton having lost the favour of ministers, Mr. Cornwall was chosen speaker of the new house of commons by a majority of 203 to 134. One hundred and thirteen new men obtained seats in parliament. The alarm of the late riots caused several popular members to be thrown out; but generally the elections had been carried on with much apathy. Several members of the late parliament, tired out by constant attendance and fruitless opposition, would neither be at the trouble nor the expense of a contest. The general poverty and depression, occasioned by the war, had worn down both the spirit and principle of the people. Sir George Savile, in his address to the freeholders of York, told them that there was no hope of arresting the progress of public calamity "till the purity of the constituent, and thereby that of the representative," was restored.

Nov. 1. The returns of losses by the riots amounted to 180,000*l.*

29. Died in her 63rd year, lamented by her subjects, whom she had governed forty years, MARIA THERESA, empress of Germany and queen of Hungary. She was warmly attached to the catholic religion, and this restrained her son Joseph from acting as he wished in ecclesiastical matters till her death. Soon after that event he issued two ordinances respecting religious orders; by one they were forbidden holding correspondence with their chiefs when in foreign parts; by the other, he forbade any bull or ordinance of the pope being received in his dominions, until it had been sanctioned by him. He granted throughout the whole of his hereditary states a free toleration for all religions. He granted also a greater liberty to the press, and abolished slavery in Bohemia, Moldavia, and Silesia. At the same time, Leopold, the emperor's brother, archduke of Tuscany, ordered that all church property in his dominions should be subject to the same contributions as other property.

Dec. 2. Mr. justice Wilmut obtained a verdict against the inhabitants of Bethnal-green, and 135*l.*, for the destruction of his property by the rioters. Many other actions were brought by sufferers for compensation. One against the Sun fire-office, on the 15th instant, failed, a clause in the policy protecting them against loss by civil or military commotion.

18. Society of Antiquarians instituted in Edinburgh by the endeavours of the earl of Buchan. Earl of Bute first president.

20. War declared against Holland.

The king of France made a considerable economical reduction in his household this year, 406 offices being abolished by one edict. The duke of Modena abolished the inquisition in his territories.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—Hon. Topham Beauclerk, a gentleman well known in the Johnsonian literary circle, and celebrated for his conversational powers. Francis Vives, an eminent engraver. James Harris, the author of "Hermes" and other philological works. Dr. John Fothergill, a quaker and eminent physician. Thomas Dilworth, author of a popular spelling-book. Francis Walkern, a carpenter, aged 104. At Leeds, aged 106, Mr. Wheatley, a clothier. At Hoxford, aged 102, Thomas Field, a labouring man: his father was 104; his uncle, 93; his brother, 95 (Annual Register, xxiii. 236).

1781. Jan. 1. The prince of Wales declared of age, and appears at court. A few days before the bishop of Osnaburg was sent to Germany to finish his education.

6. The French landed 800 men in the island of Jersey. They marched unperceived across the roads, and arrived in the market-place of St. Hillier by six in the morning, making prisoners the lieutenant-governor and magistrates; but the militia and other forces in the neighbourhood being collected by major Pierson, a young and gallant officer, they attacked and defeated the French, destroying and taking prisoners the whole of the invading force; but, unfortunately, Pierson was killed in the moment of victory. The French commander had previously fallen.

25. The commons voted 120,000*l.* for the relief of the sufferers by a hurricane in Barbadoes and Jamaica.

Feb. 1. A motion of censure on the recent appointment of sir Hugh Palliser to the governorship of Greenwhich hospital negatived.

2. Admiral Rodney takes the Dutch island of St. Eustatia, with 250 ships and other booty, estimated at three millions sterling. Thirty Dutch West Indiamen under convoy, and a 60-gun ship were also made prize of. The Dutch colonies of Essequibo and Demerara capitulated.

5. Trial of Lord George Gordon. It lasted two days; but the charge for high-treason not being sustainable, he was acquitted. thus this very mischievous and fanatical person escaped all punishment.

15. Mr. Burke again introduced his bill for the reform of the Civil List Establishments. It was ordered to be read a second time on the 26th instant, when the chief debate ensued, and was memorable for the first appearance of some distinguished characters. Mr. Pitt delivered his maiden speech: it was in favour of the bill, and the report says of the speaker, "his voice is rich and striking, full of melody and force; his manner easy and elegant; his language beautiful and luxuriant." The present earl of Lauderdale, then viscount Maitland, came out on the same occasion, in the ranks of opposition. This session witnessed, too, the commencement of Sheridan's brilliant course: he spoke pointedly, the same night, in defence of Burke's bill. All this display of eloquence, however, did not avail; the house divided at midnight, and the bill was lost on the second reading by 233 to 190.

Mar. A distemper broke out among horned cattle; and to prevent the spreading of the infection, an order in council directs them to be killed and buried.

7. THE BUDGET.—In opening the budget, lord North estimated the entire expenditure of the year at 21 millions, of which it would be necessary to raise 12 millions by a public loan. The debate on this day, and on the 26th instant, shows the prevalent mode of parliamentary management. The loan had been contracted for on the most lavish terms, and distributed to the supporters of the minister. That the terms were wasteful appears from the fact that the shares the next day were sold in the money-market at an advance of from 10 to 11 per cent. Mr. Hyng affirmed that half the loan had been subscribed by members of the house, which was in fact, he said, a distribution among the parliamentary supporters of government of full 680,000*l.* Lord Rockingham characterized the loan as one by which at least a million of the public money had been corruptly lavished in bribing the representatives of the people to support the war (Companion to the Newspaper, No. 47, p. 275). Much of the loan was subscribed for in the names of clerks in different banking houses; some of them being set down for 25,000*l.* each, the better to screen the parties really interested. About this time two measures were introduced to curtail the ministerial means of corruption; one to exclude government contractors, the other, revenue officers from seats in parliament. They were defeated in the usual way. Towards the end of the debate a body of members poured in from the coffee-rooms, called for a division, and gave to the minister his customary triumph, that of a large majority.

10. Alderman Kennett, the late lord-mayor, found guilty of a dereliction of duty during the "No Popery" riots.

15. Lord Cornwallis defeated the American general, Green, at Guildford; but the victory was so dearly bought, that the English general was shortly after obliged to retreat, leaving behind his sick and wounded.

Apr. 3. Captain Donellan executed at Warwick for poisoning his brother-in-law, sir T. E. Boughton. He declared himself innocent to the last.

May 8. The exclusive right of the king's printer, to print the forms of prayer for a public fast-day, established in the Exchequer.

12. Dr. Brownlow North translated from Worcester to Winchester, vice Dr. John Thomas, deceased. Dr. Hurd succeeded North in Worcester.

June 1. Government consented to renew the charter of the Bank of England for 25 years, on condition of their lending to the public 4,000,000*l.* sterling, at 3 per cent.

11. Ostend declared a free port, and in the following October the emperor acceded in form to the Armed Neutrality, as the kings of Prussia and Portugal had also previously done.

12. Mr. Fox made a motion for terminating the American contest. He was supported by Mr. Pitt, who characterized the war as a "series of inefficient victories or disgraceful defeats,—victories obtained over men struggling in the holy cause of liberty." Negativied by 172 to 99.

15. The number of prisoners exchanged with France since the beginning of the war, 44,000.

25. Rev. Hen. Bate, proprietor of the Morning Post, sentenced to one year's imprisonment for a libel on the duke of Richmond.

July 14. De la Motte, a spy in the pay of the French, tried for high-treason, in transmitting intelligence to the enemy, respecting our naval operations. He was convicted on the evidence of a German, his accomplice, and hanged on the 27th instant.

18. On closing the session, the king said, "Peace is the earnest wish of my heart."

Aug. 5. Obstinate battle with the Dutch off Dogger Bank, under sir Hyde Parker. Both parties claimed the victory.

19. Treaty of Chunar signed between governor Hastings and the subahdar of Oude; by which the nabob was relieved of all his debts to the Company, on condition of seizing the property of the Begums, his mother and grandmother, and delivering it up to the English. On this occasion the nabob made a present to Mr. Hastings of 100,000*l.*

Oct. 19. Lord Cornwallis, after a gallant defence, surrendered York Town, with the whole of his army, to Washington, and the British vessels in the harbour to the French admiral de Grasse. Mr. Laurens, the American commissioner who drew up the articles of surrender was the son of Mr. Laurens, at that time close prisoner in the Tower.

Nov. 13. Townsend, a lieutenant of a privateer, executed for murder on the high seas, by ordering a gun to be fired into a neutral ship, which killed the captain.

20. French re-captured Eustatia.

27. Parliament met. The amendments to the address, moved by Mr. Fox in the lower, and by lord Shelburne in the upper, house, ~~presented~~ a change of counsels, but did not go the length of advising a recognition of American independence.

Dec. 4. Mr. Burke moved for an inquiry into the conduct of admiral Rodney in illegally confiscating the property of the inhabitants of St. Eustatia. The admiral defended himself, supported by his brother-in-arms, general Vaughan, on the ground of Dutch perfidy; and the motion was negatived.

12. Sir James Lowthian moved that all further attempts to reduce the revolted colonies were contrary to the true interests of the kingdom. Negatived only by a majority of 41, in a house of 339 members. It was on this occasion Mr. Dunning, very mistakenly, declared, "he thought the ruin of this country was accomplished when America was acknowledged to be independent."

14. It appears from the army estimates that the whole military force required for the year 1782, including the provincial corps serving in America, amounted to 195,000 men. The house had already voted 100,000 seamen and marines. Lord George Germain intimated that ministers had abandoned the idea of subduing the Americans, and that no fresh army would be sent to replace that captured at York Town.

EAST INDIA COMPANY.—The charter of the Company was this year renewed to continue till March 1794. The Company to pay 400,000*l.*, and to be allowed a dividend of 8 per cent.; three-fourths of any surplus to be paid to the government. All political dispatches to be first communicated to Ministers, who are to decide in all questions relative to peace and war.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS.—Robert Raikes, a printer, in conjunction with the rev. Mr. Stock, established at Gloucester the first Sunday-school in England. His aim was greatly facilitated by the institution, four years after, of the Sunday School Society; the objects of which were to promote, by correspondence and pecuniary assistance, the formation of Sunday Schools; to induce the opulent to visit and superintend them, and suggest such improvements as might offer to their consideration. Next to charity-schools (ante 385) Sunday-schools may be considered the second step in the progress of popular instruction. Before their establishment education was at a very low ebb, even among the middle orders; as may be seen by the writing and spelling of respectable tradesmen of that period.

At the close of the year public meetings were held in the cities of London and Westminster, and in Southwark, by the freeholders of Middlesex and Surrey, to consider the calamitous state of public affairs.

NAVY AND ARMY.—It appeared, by returns from the Navy Office, that from 1774 to 1781, 175,900 men had been raised for the King's service, of whom, in the five years ending in 1780, 18,548 had died, 1243 were killed, and 42,069 had deserted. In the same period, by returns from the War Office it appeared there had been raised for the army 76,885 men, out of which 10,012 had died, made prisoners 8,629, deserted 3801, unfit for service 3855. The corps and recruits sent to America and the West Indies were in 1778, 3774; in 1779, 6871; in 1780, 10,237.—Annual Register, xxiv. 174.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—Edward Capel, examiner of plays and editor of Shakspeare's plays. William de Grey, baron Walsingham, in his 62nd year, many years chief-justice of the common pleas. Lord Hawke, a distinguished naval commander. Henry Thrale, esq., LL.D., an eminent brewer, and late M.P. for Southwark. Dr. Watson, author of a History of Philip II. at Burford, Oxfordshire, aged 75, Mr. Lenthall, great-grandson to Lenthall, speaker of the Long Parliament in Cromwell's time.

1782. Jan. 31. The king having refused to receive on the throne, as customary, the address and remonstrance of the Livery of London, resolutions were passed expressive of the necessity of parliamentary reform and a more frequent election of representatives.

Feb. 7. Mr. Fox moved "that there had been gross mismanagement in the administration of naval affairs in the year 1781." Had this passed, Mr. Fox intended to follow it up with another motion for the removal of lord Sandwich from the head of the admiralty. It was negatived only by a majority of 22 in a house of 283 members. Meanwhile lord Germain had retired from the secretaryship of the colonies, and was succeeded by Welbore Ellis, a staunch supporter of the American war.

VISCOUNT SACKVILLE.—The elevation of lord George Germain to the peerage, immediately after his resignation, by the title of viscount Sackville, was sharply discussed in the upper house. His lordship, it will be remembered, had, twenty-two years before, been adjudged by the sentence of a court-martial incapable of serving his majesty in any military capacity, in consequence of disobeying his superior officer at the battle of Minden. In the interval, however, he had filled important public offices, and had been restored to the privy-council under the Rockingham ministry; therefore the opposition to his new honour seemed fastidious. The discussion was raised on the 7th and 18th inst.; on the last day lord chancellor Thurlow delivered one of his most powerful speeches in defence of this exercise of the royal prerogative.

22. General Conway moved an address to the king, imploring that the war in America might no longer be pursued for the impracticable purpose of reducing the inhabitants of that country to obedience by force. After an interesting debate, which lasted till two o'clock in the morning, the house divided and the minister found himself in an ominous majority of one—192 being for, and 193 against the question. Ministers, however, still clung to office, and a series of resolutions of more impulsive force were requisite before lord North expressed his intention to resign.

Mar. 8. Lord John Cavendish moved a string of resolutions, declaratory of the calamities of the war, concluding with an affirmation that the chief cause of these misfortunes had been a want of foresight and ability in the ministers. They were seconded by Mr. Powys, a principal leader of the independent interest, or country gentlemen, in the house, but negatived by 226 to 216. On this occasion Mr. Fox took occasion to say that the two chief points on which he differed with ministers were the necessity of peace and a diminution of regal influence. The war was supported by placemen and contractors; leaving out these, the majority against ministers was upwards of 100.

15. The opposition, determined to carry their point, pressed into their service sir John Rous, member for Suffolk, and once zealously attached to the ministry. On this day sir John moved, that taking into consideration the debt and losses of the war, no further confidence could be placed in the ministry who had the conduct of public affairs. A vehement debate ensued, and the motion was only negatived by 236 to 227.

19. The wished-for crisis had now arrived. The earl of Surrey had given notice for to-day of a motion of similar import to that of sir John Rous. But when his lordship was about to rise, lord North informed the house that his majesty had come to a determination to make an entire change of administration. Upon which the house adjourned.

ROCKINGHAM MINISTRY.—About the end of the month the new ministry was completed.

Marquis of Rockingham, First Lord of the Treasury.

Earl of Shelburne and Mr. Fox, Secretaries of State.

Lord John Cavendish, Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Admiral (Viscount) Keppel, First Lord of the Admiralty.

Duke of Grafton, Lord Privy-Seal.

Lord Camden, President of the Council.

Duke of Richmond, Master-General of the Ordnance.

General Conway, Commander-in-Chief of the Forces.

These eleven constituted the Cabinet, consisting of five Rockingham and five Shelburne whigs, and the tory chancellor Thurlow, who was more especially considered "the king's friend." Nearly all the subordinate offices were filled by new men. Mr. Burke was made paymaster-general of the forces; Colonel Barré, treasurer of the navy; Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Orde, under-secretaries of state; Mr. Townshend, secretary-at-war; Mr. Kenyon, attorney-general; Mr. Lee, solicitor-general; earl of Tankerville and O. H. F. Carteret, joint-postmasters general; the duke of Rutland, viceroy of Ireland; and general Burgoyne, commander-in-chief there.

MEASURES OF REFORM.—Various measures of reform which the opposition of the late ministry had defeated were now successfully introduced. Among these were two bills, one prohibiting contractors from sitting in the house of commons, and the other disabling revenue officers from voting at elections, both of which became law. The loss of the colonies having rendered the office of a third secretary of state unnecessary, that office was abolished. Mr. Burke introduced, for the third time, though much narrowed in its provisions, his bill for the reform of the civil list establishments. By this bill a mass of useless places and offices in the royal household were abolished, and the crown restrained from granting any pension exceeding 300*l*. Provision was also made for the discharge of the debts of the civil list, which had again accumulated to the amount of 300,000*l*, notwithstanding the recent augmentation of the king's income. In the commons these retrenchments were adopted without hesitation, but in the upper house lords Thurlow and Loughborough vainly tried by every species of legal subtlety first to defeat and then delay their progress.

Apr. 3. Prince de Gallitzin and M. de Markoff, the Russian ministers, offered their services to Holland, to mediate a peace between that country and England; and accompanied this offer with a letter from Mr. Fox expressive of the readiness of the English court to agree to an immediate armistice with the Dutch. To this communication no satisfactory answer was given.

12 GREAT NAVAL VICTORY.—Admiral Rodney completely defeated count De Grasse in the West Indies: the battle lasted from seven in the morning till sun-set; and the results were the capture of seven ships of the line and two frigates. Among them was the Vainqueur of 112 guns, which struck to sir Samuel Hood, and is said to have been the only first-rate man-of-war that up to that date had ever been taken and carried into port. In this action the nautical manœuvre of breaking the line and attacking the enemy on both sides at once, was first tried and successfully executed. This victory saved Jamaica, ruined the naval power of France and Spain, and gave a finishing blow to the war. The news arrived in England just after an order had been despatched for the recall of Rodney, whose politics differed from those of the new ministry.

19. Holland acknowledged the independence of the United States of America and admitted Mr. Adams in the quality of minister.

27. Died, Edward Chamberlayne, F.A.S.; one of the joint secretaries of the treasury. In a moment of nervous diffidence about his fitness to discharge the duties of his new appointment, he threw himself head foremost out of a window and was killed. He was one of the best scholars of the age.—Ann. Reg., xxv. 208.

May. The early part of this month was unusually severe, and the winter, throughout Europe, had continued longer than had been known for several years.

6. Mr. Wilkes after many abortive efforts, succeeded in his object, and carried a motion to erase from the journals this resolution of Feb. 17th, 1769, by which he was "judged incapable of sitting in that house." Lord North and Mr. Fox opposed the motion, but it was carried by 115 to 47. Mr. Wilkes addressed a congratulatory letter to his constituents; but thirteen years had elapsed, and little was now thought of the Middlesex election.

7. REFORM OF PARLIAMENT.—Mr. Pitt brought forward his celebrated motion for a committee to inquire into the state of the representation. The treasury boroughs and those in the possession of private individuals he described as the great sources and supports of bad government. The leader of the opposition was Mr. Thomas Pitt, afterwards lord Camelford, and a cousin of the mover. Mr. Fox, in a short speech, supported the motion. Upon a division there were 141 for and 161 against the motion.

18. Illumination for Rodney's victory.

CONVENTION OF DUNGANNON.—The recent concessions (ante p. 511, 514) of the English parliament neither met the wants nor the wishes of Ireland. They denied the supremacy of the British legislature and the right of the Irish privy council (under Poyning's act) to originate laws; they called for a habeas corpus act and the abolition of superfluous places and pensions. These claims were made by armed men, whom it was perilous to refuse. At Dungannon, last year, the representatives of 143 corps of volunteers assembled, and passed resolutions declaratory of a fixed determination to seek "a speedy and effectual" redress of Irish grievances. "They knew," they said, "their duty to their sovereign, and were disposed to be loyal; but they knew also what they owed to themselves, and were resolved to be free." On the 16th of April, 1782, Mr. Grattan, in a speech of extraordinary eloquence, moved in the commons of Ireland for a "Declaration of Rights," under the form of an address to the throne. Such was the power of his eloquence that it passed both houses unanimously, and was transmitted to England. On the 18th of May following the subject was introduced to the English parliament, by Mr. Fox, and the obnoxious act (6 Geo. I.) for securing the dependency of Ireland repealed.

June 14. Advice from Brest of the prevalence of an epidemic by which half the persons in the king's employ were confined to their beds.

26. Slavery entirely abolished in Austrian Poland.

July 1. Died, in his 53rd year, the marquis of ROCKINGHAM, first lord of the treasury and head of the ministry. His lordship leaving no issue the title became extinct, and his estates descended to his nephew, earl Fitzwilliam. Rockingham was a nobleman much respected, not remarkable for strength of mind, but patriotic, and had the merit of bringing forward Burke and other distinguished characters into the political arena.

SHELburne MINISTRY.—The death of the Marquis broke up the ministry after a short but not inglorious continuance of thirteen weeks. It had been composed of the Rockingham and the Chatham, or Shelburne whigs, two sections of the whig party which could only agree together in opposition, not in place, and who had temporarily coalesced to oppose first, Mr. Grenville, and afterwards lord North. During their short-lived ministry they were not cordially united. Now that the contest with the American colonies had become hopeless, the Rockinghams were at once prepared to recognise their independence and put an end to hostilities; but the Shelburnes only at the last hour and very reluctantly made up their minds to this unavoidable concession. In the allocation of offices too there were heart-burnings. The Shelburnes seem to have expected the chancellorship for Dunning, but this honour the Rockinghams either could not or would not grant him, and the place was left in the possession of Thurlow, lord North's chancellor, who all along, in public at least, had supported the policy of that minister. The inequality, however, in the distribution of the honours seems to have been partly made up by the distribution of emolument. Ashburton had a valuable sinecure and pension given him, and colonel Barré received a large pension: so that the injustice perpetrated among themselves could not have been great. The causes of the king's preference are generally known. On the American question George III. more nearly agreed in opinion with the Shelburne than the Rockingham section of his cabinet; and it is not likely the king viewed with satisfaction Mr. Burke's attack on the economy of the royal household, nor the opinion Mr. Fox had openly avowed of the necessity of circumscribing regal influence. If Mr. Fox aspired to the premiership, which it is said he did (Companion to the Newspaper, No. 48. 306), no time was allowed him to put in his claim. Immediately the death of Rockingham was known lord Shelburne was appointed his successor, and without consulting Mr. Fox, lord Grantham was appointed to the vacant secretaryship. Upon learning these changes, made without their knowledge or concurrence, the Rockingham whigs resigned in a body. Mr. Fox was succeeded by Mr. Thomas Townshend (afterwards viscount Sydney); lord John Cavendish, as chancellor of the exchequer, by Mr. William Pitt; Mr. Burke by col. Barré, whose office of treasurer of the navy was given to Mr. Dundas (afterwards viscount Melville), Mr. Henry Erskine (brother of the earl of Buchan) succeeded Dundas, lord-advocate, and Mr. Pepper Arden (afterwards Lord Alvanley) Mr. Lee, as solicitor-general. Earl Temple became the new viceroy of Ireland, and Mr. William Wyndham Grenville (afterwards lord Grenville) the chief secretary. At the treasury and admiralty boards lord Althorp, lord Duncannon, Mr. Montagu, &c., resigned; also Mr. Sheridan his under-secretaryship of state.

July 9. Mr. Coke, the member for Norfolk, moved for an address to the king against the pension of 3000*l.* a year granted to colonel Barré, to commence at the time he should cease to hold the office of treasurer of the navy, and which grant had been made at the moment Mr. Burke's bill for reforming the civil-list, which restrained the minister from granting any greater pension than 300*l.* a year, was lying ready for the royal assent. Ultimately the motion was withdrawn. Mr. Fox expressed his approval of the grant, and entered into some explanation of his resignation of office. He ascribed it to political differences; and indulged in the odd prediction (as events proved) that "the new ministers would in a very short time be joined by those men whom the house had precipitated from their seats." Without this explanation, Mr. Pitt said he should have anticipated the resignation of Fox "to be a baulk in struggling for power." Next day lord Shelburne confirmed the surmise of Pitt, and ascribed the flight of the Rockinghams to disappointed ambition. Shelburne affirmed that he had, on the resignation of lord North, the premiership within his grasp, but gave way to Rockingham; that he had always stood out for the exercise of the constitutional prerogative of the crown, and "opposed the doctrine that the king should be a mere puppet in the hands of the aristocracy, or rather, of a certain select number of great families."

11. Parliament prorogued by the king without any allusion to domestic politics, but expressing a strong desire to terminate the war.

13. Advice of the surrender of the Bahama Islands to the Spaniards.

Severe storms of hail in France and Spain. Some of the stones weighed eight ounces. London and neighbourhood was visited by a storm of thunder and lightning on the 15th inst.

Aug. 5. Count de Grasse landed at Portsmouth. He was the first commander-in-chief of a French fleet or army that had been prisoner in England since the capture of marshal Tallard in queen Anne's wars.

24. The Gazette contains dreadful details of the ravages of the plague and of a most destructive fire at Constantinople. Ten thousand houses, besides 50 mosques and other public buildings, destroyed.

30. An express reached the Admiralty of the loss of the Royal George of 100 guns. She was careening at Spithead, some of her upper ports open, when a sudden gust of wind overset her. Four hundred men, and as many women and children, perished; admiral Kempenfelt among them.

Sept. 13. A grand attack was made by the united French and Spanish forces upon the fortress of Gibraltar; the cannonade and bombardment from floating batteries were tremendous; but the brave governor, sir Gilbert Elliot, by a well-directed and impetuous discharge of red-hot shot from the fortress, set fire to the besieging flotilla, the vessels of which successively blew up, and the scene of destruction was indescribable. Sir Roger Curtis, with great gallantry and considerable personal risk, saved 400 of the enemy. Not a vestige was left on the following day of all the formidable preparations which were collected for the carrying on this celebrated siege; it had now lasted five years, and during that time the enemy had vainly tried all the expedients of warfare.

16. A terrible gale of wind in the West Indies; several ships of war were lost.

Oct. 8. Many emigrants from Geneva having removed to Ireland, 50,000*l.* was given by the king to defray the charges of their removal and settlement.

11. The cenotaph, erected in Guildhall to the memory of the late earl of Chatham, opened to the public.

19. Dr. Richard Watson consecrated bishop of Llandaff in the room of Dr. Barrington, translated to Salisbury.

22. New Sessions-house, Clerkenwell-green, opened for the use of the Middlesex magistrates.

Nov. 8. First general meeting of the patrons of charity-schools in Britain held at St. Paul's Coffee-house.

22. Mr. Townshend, one of the secretaries of state, writes to the lord-mayor in order to prevent speculations in the funds, pending the negotiations in Paris for peace, that the question of peace or war would be decided prior to the meeting of parliament.

30. Provisional articles of peace signed at Paris between Britain and the thirteen United States, on the basis of a full acknowledgment of the independence of the colonies. Dr. Franklin had the honour of concluding this important arrangement. A clause was inserted, by which in return for a full participation in the Newfoundland fisheries, the congress engaged to recommend to the several States to provide for the restitution of the confiscated estates of the loyalists. But this recommendation proved nugatory, and that portion of the king's subjects were obliged to take refuge in England or the barren regions of Nova Scotia and the Bahamas.

Dec. 6. Parliament met, when the king, in a speech of unusual length and ability, for the first time announced the determination to concede the independence of the American colonies.

Subscription for a national bank opened at Dublin; in a few hours, 30,000*l.* more than needed was offered.

18. The dividend of the East India Company, for the half year ending at Christmas, declared to be 8 per cent.

27. At Edinburgh, in his 86th year, died HENRY HOME, lord Kames, the Scottish judge, and author of many learned and ingenious publications.

In this month died Hyder Ali, who by talents and enterprise had risen from the rank of a private soldier to be one of the most powerful princes in India. He was succeeded by his son Tippoo Saib, who inherited all his father's hostility to the English.

This year the Irish parliament voted 50,000*l.* for the purchase of an estate to be settled on Mr. Grattan, "as a testimony of their gratitude for the unequalled benefits conferred by him on that kingdom."

Mr. Wedgwood invented a thermometer for measuring the higher degrees of heat.

WORKHOUSE SYSTEM.—The plan of congregating the poor in workhouses, which was first introduced about 1724 (ante 386), received great extension from an act passed this year, called Gilbert's Act, from the name of the member of parliament by whom it was framed. This act, aiming to combine the advantages of an assemblage of a number of poor on one spot, of a minute division of labour, and a joint management of expenditure, empowered magistrates to consider any large workhouse as a common receptacle for the poor within a diameter of 20 miles. Judicious as this plan apparently was, it did not prove successful. Proper care was seldom taken to separate the inmates of the workhouses according to their ages or their habits; neither was the division of employment carried to the necessary length. Their earnings consequently were insignificant, and the charge to the parish amounted in general to 9*l.*, 10*l.*, or even 16*l.* each, while half the sum would have sufficed if paid to the poor at their own habitations.

The inquisition was this year abolished in Tuscany.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—Daniel Bernoulli, physician and professor of natural philosophy at Basil. John Parry, the famous blind harper. Sir James Burrow, master of the crown office and compiler of a volume of Reports. At the house of Dr. Johnson, Bolt-court, his friend Robert Levett, aged 80, a practitioner of physic. Sir John Pringle, late president of the Royal Society, and physician extraordinary to the king. Dr. Solander, who went round the world with captain Cook and sir Joseph Banks.

1783. Jan. TERMS OF PEACE.—The preliminary articles of peace between England, France, and Spain, were signed at Versailles on the 20th instant. By these, Britain restored the island of St. Lucia to France; also the settlements on the Senegal and the city of Pondicherry, in the East Indies. Britain relinquished all claims on Dunkirk. France gave up all her West India conquests with the exception of Tobago. Spain was allowed to retain Minorca and West Florida, East Florida being also ceded in exchange for the Bahamas. Peace with Holland was longer postponed, the Dutch claiming an indemnification for the expenses of the war, and the restoration of Trincomalee. A suspension of hostilities, however, was agreed to.

21. Parliament re-assembled.
Feb. 1. Orders to disband the militia.

5. Order of St. Patrick created.

A series of violent earthquakes occurred in Calabria and Sicily. The first and most destructive occurred on the 5th instant, when cities, towns, and villages were totally demolished. The city of Casal Nuova was entirely swallowed up, and the princess Grimaldi, with more than 4000 people, perished in an instant. The inhabitants of Scylla, who with their prince had descended from the rock, and taken refuge on the sea-shore, were all swept away by an enormous wave on its return from the land which it had inundated. Messina and the northern parts of Sicily were also great sufferers.

17. Grand debate in both houses on the terms of the peace, which were ably defended by lord Shelburne as the best the country had a right to expect. But on a division the address was carried only by a majority of 72 to 59 voices. A similar address in the commons was seconded by Mr. Wilberforce, but opposed with great vehemence by Fox and North. Mr. Powys said it was "an age of strange confederacies,—a monstrous coalition had taken place between a noble lord and an illustrious commoner,—the lofty asserter of the prerogative had joined in an alliance with the worshippers of the majesty of the people." On a division, the effect of this monstrous coalition was visible, ministers being left in a minority of four in a house of 432 members.

21. A resolution more pointedly disapproving of the peace being moved and carried by lord J. Cavendish, the earl of Shelburne resigned the premiership.

25. Petition presented to the commons for parliamentary reform from the freeholders of Yorkshire with 10,124 signatures. Petitions for the same object were shortly after presented from the metropolis and various parts of the country.

Mar. Disturbances among the seamen at Portsmouth appeased by lord Howe.

25. In the year ending at this date were manufactured in the West Riding of Yorkshire 131,092 pieces of broad woollens, measuring 4,563,376 yards; and 108,641 pieces of narrow cloth, measuring 3,292,002 yards. Increased this year, 18,622 pieces of broad, and 11,892 pieces of narrow.—Ann. Reg., xxvi. 204.

30. Died, in his 65th year, Dr. William Hunter, the celebrated anatomist and medical practitioner. He bequeathed his valuable museum to his nephew for thirty years, afterwards to be removed to the university of Glasgow, near which he was born. He tried in 1765 to establish a museum on the site of the King's-mews, but his application was negatived by the then minister, Mr. Grenville.

Apr. 1. Ryland, an engraver, discovered to have forged on the East India Company to the amount of 7114*l*.

COALITION MINISTRY.—The Rockingham and Shelburne whigs were so nearly balanced, that the North party had the power of turning the scale in favour of either section. They preferred a union with the former, and to which, according to the declaration of lord North (Feb. 21), he was invited. Shelburne made overtures to Fox, but none to their common enemy. The Rockinghams separated from men with whom they mainly agreed, to unite with those to whom they had long been vehemently opposed. With lord North, Mr. Fox differed upon most great public questions—upon the American question—upon parliamentary reform—and the necessity of circumscribing the growing influence of the crown. The terms of the peace seem to have been a mere pretext; the object of the coalition was the expulsion of Shelburne from power, who had accepted office in obedience to the king's wish, independently of factious dictation. Their triumph proved short-lived and unprofitable. Events proved their abandonment of principle for power to be a weak and ruinous expedient, which lost them the confidence and support of the nation. Six weeks elapsed before the hybrid ministry was completed: it was occasioned by the king's reluctance to part with the chancellor, and Thurlow's claim of a pension and the tellership of the exchequer. On the 2nd inst., the duke of Portland was announced as first lord of the treasury; lord North and Mr. Fox, joint secretaries of state; lord John Cavendish, chancellor of the exchequer; viscount Keppel, first lord of the admiralty; viscount Stormont, president of the council; and the earl of Carlisle, lord privy-seal. These seven constituted the new cabinet, the whigs having a majority of one over the three Tories, North, Carlisle, and Stormont. The great seal was put in commission, Loughborough being appointed first commissioner.

May 1. The population of the American colonies, at the time of their declaration of independence, was estimated at 2,614,300.

7. Mr. Pitt renewed his motion for a reform in the representation, by proposing to add 100 members to the counties, and abolish a proportionate number of the burghage-tenure, and other smaller boroughs. Being a specific plan, it was negatived by a larger number than on the preceding occasion, the numbers on the division being 293 to 149.

June 1. Mr. Spalding and his assistant, descending in the diving-bell to examine the wreck of the Imperial East Indiaman, were drowned by the accident of the signal-ropes getting entangled.

6. A verdict given in favour of some French seamen, prisoners of war, for wages, for working a ship home from the West Indies.

25. A grant of 60,000*l.* for a separate establishment for the prince of Wales.

July 8. Parliament prorogued.

Aug. 18. DEATH OF DUNNING.—In his 52nd year, died the celebrated JOHN DUNNING, recently created lord Ashburton, and famous for his resolution of 1780, on the increasing influence of the crown. According to the Law Magazine (vol. vii. 318), he was the son of a poor attorney at Ashburton, who after a brief but brilliant career as lawyer and member of parliament, left behind him a peerage, a vast landed property, and 180,000*l.* in money, the reward of his industry, perseverance, and ability. He belonged to the Shelburne section of whigs, and sat, with colonel Barré, for his lordship's borough of Calne. Lord Rockingham's second ministry was not so pure as his first, and during its short existence there was a sharp scramble between his adherents and those of the rival section of lord Shelburne for titles, sinecures, and pensions. Dunning flattered for himself a coronet, the chancellorship of the duchy of Lancaster, and a pension of 4000*l.* a year. He was thought to have been greedy and inconsistent; for he had strenuously supported Mr. Burke's economical bill, which abolished the sinecure of the duchy, and his life having been chiefly spent in his profession, he had rendered no public services to entitle him to a pension. His patent of peerage is dated April 8th, 1782; so that he did not long survive his elevation, and the title became extinct in his family, his successor having died without heirs.

27. Montgolfier ascends with an air-balloon at Paris. The first experiments in aërostation were made by inflating the balloon with heated air in lieu of hydrogen gas.

Sept. 4. Colonel Thomas, of the guards, killed in a duel with colonel Gardiner.

5. An order of council issued, limiting the commerce between the United States and the British West India islands to ships British built. It gave umbrage to the Americans, though they could hardly complain in not enjoying the advantages of independence and dependence at the same time.

Died at St. Petersburg, aged 76, EULER, the distinguished mathematician. Some time before, he had lost his sight, but that did not prevent him completing, by the help of an amanuensis, his celebrated "Elements of Algebra" and the "Theory of the Moon."

Nov. RESIGNATION OF WASHINGTON.—This illustrious chief having by his wisdom, firmness, and bravery achieved the independence of his country, resigned the command of the American army. Some difficulty at first arose in the disbandment of the military, who claimed rewards for their services; but it was surmounted by the prudence of Washington, who prevailed upon them to trust to the generosity of congress. Unlike Oliver Cromwell, he did not artfully foster their discontents for his own ambitious purposes. On his way to Mount Vernon, he delivered in an account of all the public money he had received while in arms, amounting in eight years to less than 16,000*l.*, nothing being charged for personal services, or claimed for relatives and friends.

10. Pursuant to arrangement in the preceding September, a convention of delegates from all the volunteer corps of Ireland was held at Dublin, when a plan of parliamentary reform was produced and considered. It was attended by the earl of Charlemont, the commander-in-chief of the volunteer army; by the right hon. Thomas Conolly, the first commoner, in point of wealth, in the kingdom; and by the brother of the bishop of Derry. Next day, Mr. Flood brought the topic before the commons, by moving for leave to bring in a bill "for the more equal representation of the people in parliament." Being looked upon as a motion tendered at the point of the bayonet, it was rejected with indignation, by 157 votes to 77.

11. Parliamentary session commenced, when the prince of Wales was introduced with much ceremony, and took his place as one of the supporters of the ministry.

18. EAST INDIA BILLS.—Mr. Fox introduced his two bills for the better government of India, by which the entire administration of the civil and commercial affairs of the company were to be vested in a board of 7 commissioners, nominated by the bill, and irremovable by the crown except by an address of either house of parliament. There was also to be a subordinate board of 9 directors, to be named in the first instance by parliament, and afterwards chosen by the proprietors. This bold and comprehensive scheme is ascribed to Mr. Burke, but it soon raised a storm, both within and without the walls of parliament, that overpowered the administration.

20. Mr. John Scott and Mr. Thomas Erskine (both hereafter lord-chancellors) entered the lists, on opposite sides, in the debate on the India bill.

Dec. 4. Christopher Atkinson having been tried and found guilty of perjury, was expelled the house of commons.

9. Notwithstanding the alarm created by Mr. Pitt on the threatened violation of "CHARTERED RIGHTS" by the India bill, it passed the commons by a large majority and was this day carried up to the lords by

Mr. Fox. It was read a first time as a matter of course, but a determined opposition soon manifested itself; Temple, Thurlow, Richmond, and Camden were its chief opponents. Temple characterized the bill as infamous. Thurlow said, if the bill passed, the crown would be no longer worthy of a man of honour to wear; "the king would in fact take the diadem from his own head, and place it on that of Mr. Fox." Meanwhile, rumours got abroad that the king was hostile. On the 11th instant, between the first and second reading, Temple had an interview with the king, and convinced him that he was deceived if not duped. A card was immediately written, stating "That his majesty allowed earl Temple to say, that whoever voted for the India bill was not only not his friend, but would be considered his enemy. And if these words were not strong enough, earl Temple might use whatever words he might deem stronger or more to the purpose."

17. India bill rejected in the lords by 95 to 76. Several proxies, intrusted to ministers, had been withdrawn, in consequence of the royal interference.

18. At midnight Mr. Fox and lord North received a message from the king, commanding them to deliver up the seals of their offices, and send them by the under-secretaries, as a "personal interview with him would be disagreeable." Next day the other ministers received their dismissal, signed "Temple."

22. The commons addressed the king not to dissolve parliament; to which he replied that he should not exercise his prerogative either by prorogation or dissolution.

PITT'S MINISTRY.—The new administration was speedily formed; Mr. Pitt at its head, as first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer. Lords Sydney and Carmarthen were made secretaries of state; duke of Rutland, lord privy-seal; earl Gower (afterwards marquis of Stafford), president of the council; earl Howe first lord of the admiralty; the duke of Richmond, master of the ordnance, without a seat in the cabinet. Thurlow was re-instated in the chancellorship. Among subordinates were Mr. Dundas, treasurer of the navy; Mr. (afterwards sir) George Rose and Mr. Thomas Steele, secretaries of the treasury; Mr. Kenyon, attorney-general; Mr. Arden, solicitor-general. A week after, Rutland was transferred to the government of Ireland; on which Gower took the privy-seal, and was succeeded as lord-president of the council by lord Camden.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—Dr. Nares, organist and musical composer. Christopher Pinchbeck, an ingenious mechanic. Dr. Frederick Cornwallis, archbishop of Canterbury; Dr. Moore was promoted to the primacy. M. Cervetto, aged 102, violin-player at Drury-lane theatre, and long familiar to the galleries by the enormous size of the nasal feature.

It appeared, from the first volume of the Society of Arts, published this year, that they had, since their first establishment, paid in premiums, and in medals, and pallets of gold and silver, to the amount of 28,212*l*.

1784. Jan. 12. The re-assembling of parliament exhibited the singular spectacle of the ministry and a majority of the commons at open variance, yet the former maintaining its ground. To carry on the public business was impossible, and a new ministry or a new parliament seemed unavoidable. Ultimately, the latter expedient was adopted, the opposition having first vainly exhausted all the resources of parliamentary tactics, to dislodge the young premier, who, steadily supported by the court, maintained his position with extraordinary firmness and ability. The majority against him had been continually decreasing since the Christmas recess, under the joint influence of the crown and popular opinion. Addresses of thanks to the king, for the dismissal of his late official advisers, were presented from most municipal and corporate bodies, who conceived their immunities endangered by the whig scheme of Indian government. Notwithstanding these evidences of unpopularity, Mr. Fox succeeded in carrying resolutions for postponing the passing of the Mutiny Act, and the appropriation of the supplies; and the contest did not terminate till the month of March.

14. Mr. Pitt introduced his India Bill, by which the commercial affairs of the Company were left in their own management, while a board of control was to be nominated by the king, possessing a veto over their political measures. It was read a first time, and only rejected on the committal, by a majority of eight.

21. Died at Florence, aged 60, Charles Edward Stuart, grandson of James II., and prince-pretender to the British throne in 1745. He left no issue.

Feb. 2. A meeting at St. Alban's tavern, of about 70 independent members of parliament, for the purpose of reconciling political parties. It ended in nothing, the duke of Portland demanding, as a preliminary, that Mr. Pitt should resign, which he refused to do.

4. The earl of Effingham, in the lords, moved two resolutions, directed against the extraordinary proceedings in the commons; the first, declaring that an attempt in any one branch of the legislature to suspend the course of the law was unconstitutional; the second, asserting the undoubted prerogative of the crown to appoint to the great offices of the executive government. They were carried by 108 to 53; and were the first notice the lords had taken of the struggle in the lower house.

10. Thanks of the common-council of London voted to Mr. Pitt for his able, upright, and disinterested conduct. They also voted him the freedom of the city in a gold box of 100 guineas value.

20. An address to the crown passed the house of commons by 177 to 156, pointing to a removal of ministers. It was not carried up to St. James's till the 25th inst., when the king replied that no charge had been brought against them, and that many of his subjects had expressed their satisfaction at the change made in his councils.

A cause for breach of contract came on before lord Mansfield, which had been pending eleven years, between Macklin the actor, and George Colman as manager of Covent-garden theatre. Lord Mansfield advised a reference, and kindly undertook to be the referee. The demand being 1000*l.*, and the dispute arising from Mr. Macklin's having been driven from the stage by the audience, which, the judge said, was equally unfortunate for actor and manager, he awarded 500*l.*

22. From 10th Dec. last, there have been 63 days' frost; of these it snowed 19 days.

28. Mr. Pitt dines at Grocers'-hall. A general illumination closed the evening.

Mar. 8. Grand field-day in the commons; the subject of debate, a REPRESENTATION to the throne, addresses having failed, setting forth the pernicious consequence of the retention of men in office not having the confidence of parliament. Mr. Burke spoke for two hours, being his first speech pending the struggle of parties. But no tolerable report of the debate has been preserved, sir James Lowther having moved the exclusion of strangers to make room for a friend in the gallery. On a division, the minister was beaten only by a majority of ONE; the numbers being, for Mr. Fox's motion, 191 against 190. This ended the parliamentary struggle; Mr. Pitt had triumphed over his opponents on their own ground, and immediately after took the sense of the nation.

9. Mutiny bill passed.

24. Parliament prorogued, and next day dissolved.

GENERAL ELECTION.—At the elections ministers carried every thing before them. Even the dissenters, long one of the main supports of the whigs, gave all their interest to the court. The consequence was a complete rout, in both counties and towns, of the whig and tory adherents of the coalition. Upwards of 160, known by the name of "Fox's Martyrs," were thrown out; among them Mr. Coke of Norfolk, Mr. Foljambe (heir of sir George Savile) for Yorkshire, Mr. Astle, Mr. Baker, Mr. Townshend, and even Mr. Fox only secured his return for Westminster by a narrow majority. Both royalists and liberals were disgusted by the recent abandonment of principle, and candidates who reckoned on their return as matters of course were unexpectedly rejected by the junction of local parties which never joined before. Moreover, the East India Company and other corporate bodies exerted their influence in favour of the new premier as the great champion of CHARTERED RIGHTS.

Apr. 6. The poll for the city of London closed, when the numbers were, for Watson, 4789; Lewes, 4554; Newnham, 4471; Sawbridge, 2832.

10. Mr. Burke elected lord rector of the university of Glasgow. He was attended by many persons of rank, and, after taking the oaths, addressed the audience in an elegant and appropriate speech.

23. At the close of the poll for Middlesex, the numbers were, for Mainwaring, 2117; Wilkes, 1858; Byng, 1787. Mr. Wilkes was the ministerial candidate; in his address to the electors (Annual Register, xxvii, 275) he offers himself on the basis of parliamentary reform, and "supplicates" the honour of their suffrages that "I may be enabled to strengthen the hands of our present virtuous young minister in his patriotic plans."

May 16. After polling 40 days, one of the hardest contests for Westminster ever known, closed; the numbers were, for lord Hood, 6694; Hon. C. Fox, 6233; Sir C. Wray, 5998. A scrutiny was demanded by Sir C. Wray, and granted.

18. On the meeting of the NEW PARLIAMENT this day, Mr. Cornwall, the former speaker, was re-chosen. The accession of strength received by the minister soon became manifest; the opposition only proposed an amendment to the address, to leave out a paragraph expressing approbation of the late dissolution, when they were outvoted by a majority of 282 to 114.

26. Grand festival in commemoration of Handel, in Westminster Abbey; the king and royal family and 4000 persons of rank and fashion attended. Next day the festival was renewed at the Pantheon: the performances were of a more lively nature, and went off with great eclat.

June 7. Disappointed by the peremptory rejection of Mr. Flood's motion, and encouraged by the accession of a reform minister to the helm of affairs, the citizens of Dublin held an aggregate meeting; wherein it was resolved to address the throne, and assemble a national congress in Dublin, composed of five representatives from every county, city and considerable town. The very name of congress was alarming to government, and Mr. Fitzgibbon, the attorney-general, adopted vigorous measures to avert the gathering storm. Political discontent was further aggravated in Ireland by the prevalence of commercial and manufacturing distress.

10. Serious riots in Edinburgh on account of the high price of provisions; they attacked the galleries, on the ground of the corn used by them. These disorders continued three days; the military were called in and several persons lost their lives.

21. Consumption Act.—Mr. Pitt introduced resolutions for lowering the duty on tea from fifty to twelve and a half per cent.; and to make up the loss the revenue would sustain by an adequate increase of the tax upon windows. His great object was to lessen the temptation to smuggling. It appeared, he said, that only 5,500,000 pounds of tea were sold by the East India Company, whereas the annual consumption of the kingdom was at least twelve millions, so that the illicit trade in this article was at least double the legal. The resolutions passed.

30. Mr. Pitt presented his budget to the house, which was found to comprise a loan of six millions, with some new taxes which were allowed to be judiciously selected. The loan too had been contracted on favourable terms, and acquired much financial reputation for the minister.

On the motion of Mr. Dundas a bill was introduced and became law, for restoring the estates forfeited by the rebellion in 1745; omitting, however, from its provisions those forfeited under similar circumstances in the rebellion of 1715.

July 9. Mr. Pitt brought forward his INDIA BILL upon the same principle as that which he unsuccessfully introduced into the last parliament: namely, for the institution of a board authorised to check and superintend the civil and military government and revenue of India; and thence denominated the Board of Control. It was to be composed of six commissioners of the rank of privy counsellors, nominated by the king and removable at his pleasure. The governor-general, presidents, and the members of council to be named by the court of directors, subject to the approval of the king. The commander-in-chief to be chosen by the king only. A special tribunal established for punishing delinquencies incurred in India; the fortunes acquired to be ascertained on the return of each servant of the company from India. (This clause was repealed two years after by 26 Geo. III.) Mr. Pitt's bill encountered much opposition, but was passed by large majorities.

14. Mr. Edmund Burke brought an action against the printer of the Public Advertiser for a libel; he laid his damages at 5000*l.*, and obtained 100*l.*

lated the non-importation agreement, by the importation of English goods, was seized by the mob, stripped and tarred. He was with great difficulty rescued by the sheriff.

17. Mr. Pitt having dined with Mr. Jenkinson, and returning home, the post-boy missed his way, and Mr. Pitt alighting at a farm-house to inquire, the man of the house came out with a loaded gun and fired: the ball went through the loose part of the premier's coat, but without doing further injury.

18. Parliament prorogued by the king. Count de Grasse, who was taken prisoner by admiral Rodney, was tried on his return to France, and exiled to a provincial town.

Sept. 15. Mr. Lunardi made an ascent in a balloon, from Moorfields, and after traversing the air for upwards of three hours, safely alighted 25 miles distant from the place of ascent.

The populace took the horses from the coach of the hon. C. J. Fox in Old-street, and substituted themselves in their places.

Nov. 27. Christopher Atkinson, late M.P., who had been convicted of perjury, was sentenced by the court of King's-bench to pay a fine of 2000*l.* and to stand in the pillory.

30. Mr. Blanchard and Dr. Jefferies ascended in a balloon.

Dec. 1. Charles Pratt, earl Camden, appointed lord-president of the privy-council.

13. DEATH OF SAMUEL JOHNSON, LL.D.—This celebrated philologist and moralist expired at his house in Bolt-court, in the 76th year of his age, after a life of sharpish trial, in which he experienced the

It was the fate of this distinguished writer to be too much neglected in the beginning of his career, and too much worshipped towards the close: between the two he never seems to have fallen into his right place, neither acquiring the exact wisdom of a philosopher, nor the independence to which a man of letters ought always to aspire. Fortunate, however, in an unrivalled gossip for a biographer, his literary history and celebrity fill a wide space—wider perhaps than the next generation will award him. He certainly produced one work of singular industry; several of force and ability: he lived much in the world, and was an attentive and shrewd observer of human life; but none of his productions, except his beautiful story of Rasselas, are of striking originality. He was more eminent for words than thoughts; for the leaves and flowers than the fruits of science. Eccentricity of opinion, manner, or appearance, often excites more interest, if not more respect or admiration, than worth or genius: this may have been partly the case with the lexicographer, who was unquestionably an extravagant in person, politics, religion and personal predilections; and for these his memory will be cherished by congenial minds. His fame rests a good deal on his classical erudition and conversational powers: the former did not elevate him above an ignoble fear of death and the superstitions of the nursery; the latter owed much to his bushy wig, brown suit, grotesque action, oracular solemnity and magisterial air. Even Boswell admits there was some truth in Lord Pembroke's remark to him on the apophthegms of his idol, when he said that "Dr. Johnson's sayings would not appear so extraordinary, were it not for his bow-wow-way." It shows a want of enduring excellence that his manner has not increased in popularity, any more than his style of "big words on little things"—sentences padded out with useless epithets—and antithesis in the expression where there is none in the ideas. His Latinity was so pedantic that he refused, though it would have been more german to his subject, to indite poor Goldsmith's epitaph in English. Had he written on fishes, the Edinburgh Review says, (No. 107) he would have made them "all whales." After all, his style was part of his nature; it was like his form—colossal. His goodness of heart and benevolence are redeeming and indisputable virtues.

20. The remains of the late Dr. Johnson interred in Westminster Abbey in the Poets' Corner, close to those of his friend David Garrick. In the procession, consisting of a hearse and six, with ten mourning coaches and four, were Sir Joshua Reynolds, Mr. Edmund Burke, General Puoli, Messrs. Malone, Nichols, Hoole, Strahan, and the deceased's favourite black servant.

ICELAND.—This remarkable island was this year the scene of a volcanic eruption more dreadful in its consequences than had ever been remembered. It began in June and continued its devastations to the ensuing month of May.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—Jeremiah Milles, D.D., president of the Antiquarian Society, Thomas Morell, editor of Ainsworth's Latin Dictionary. Sir Thomas Sewell, master of the rolls. Allan Ramsay, portrait painter to the king, and son of the poet of that name. George Alexander Stevens, author of the "Lecture on Heads." Sir George Savile, in his 58th year, the late patriotic representative of the county of York. In his 89th year, Sir Thomas Parker, formerly lord chief-baron of the court of exchequer.

PUBLIC STATUTES, XV. TO XXV. GEORGE III.

15 Geo. 3, c. 28. For giving personal freedom to the colliers, coal-bearers and salters in Scotland the preamble states that they were "in a state of slavery, or bondage, bound to the collieries and saltworks, where they work for life, transferable with the collieries and saltworks when their original masters have no further use for them." These bondsmen were set free, grateful for the boon of emancipation, conceiving it to be the result of a desire on the part of the proprietors to get rid of what they called head and tarigold money, payable to them when a female of their number made an addition to the live-stock of their master.

Cap. 32. Repeals statute (31 Eliz. c. 7.) against erecting cottages without having four acres of ground to them.

REVENUE, DEBT, AND NAVY.

Public taxes were considerably increased during the pressure of the colonial war: these, however, were insufficient to meet the enormous increase in the national expenditure without the aid of loans, which were yearly borrowed after the first year of the contest. The following statement exhibits the sums raised by taxes and loans in each year.

Years.	Revenue.	Loan.
1776	10,265,405	£2,000,000
1777	10,604,013	5,500,000
1778	10,732,405	6,000,000
1779	11,192,141	7,000,000
1780	12,255,214	12,000,000
1781	12,454,936	12,000,000
1782	12,593,297	13,500,000
1783	11,962,718	12,000,000
1784	12,905,519	12,879,341
1785	14,871,520	10,990,651

The American war terminated in 1783; but as the loans of the two following years were raised to wind up the expenses of that struggle, it is proper they should be included. The total expense of the American war will stand thus:—

Taxes	£142,975,229
Loans	93,869,992
Advances by the Bank of England	110,000
Advances by the East India Company	3,200,000
Increase in the unfunded debt	5,170,273

£242,265,494

Deduct expense of a peace establishment for eleven years, as it stood in 1792 £113,142,403

Net cost of the American war £129,123,091

The interest of the public debt increased from 4,476,821*l.* in 1776, to 10,774,398*l.* in 1786; the last being the year in which Mr. Pitt established the sinking-fund. This happy delusion was a complete opiate, the nation having become seriously alarmed at the amount of its incumbrances, chiefly from the desponding representations of Mr. Hume and Dr. Price, who had some years previously predicted that public bankruptcy was unavoidable. In 1783 John Earl of Stair concluded a pamphlet with the following lugubrious announcement:—"If the premises are just, or nearly just, and nothing effectual is done to prevent their consequences, the inevitable conclusion is, that the nation is a BANKRUPT, and those who have entrusted their all to the public faith are in imminent danger of becoming (I die pronouncing it!) BEGGARS." A prophecy happily not yet fulfilled.

The circulation of NEWSPAPERS increased during the American war, as appears from the number printed in Britain and Ireland:

1776	12,830,000
1777	13,150,000
1778	13,240,000
1779	14,106,000
1780	14,217,000
1781	14,397,000
1782	15,272,000

The following is the state of the NAVIES of Britain, France, Spain, and Holland, at the close of 1782:—

	Brit.	Fra.	Spa.	Hol.
Line-of-battle	105	89	53	32

COMMERCE, MANUFACTURE, CONSUMPTION.

The American war caused a sensible decline in the export-trade of the country; but immediately peace was completely restored with the separated colonies and the continental states that had taken part in the contest, commerce revived with augmented force. These facts will be established by the subjoined statement of the tonnage of the ships employed in the export trade, and the value of the cargoes exported. It may be compared with the preceding statement of exports during peace, p. 493.

Had England, like Spain, received any public revenue from her trans-Atlantic territories, she had doubtless lost this income by the independence of her colonies. But the contrary was the fact, as before shown (p. 498). The American states were the source of enormous expense to the mother-country, and all she lost by their severance was a sovereignty without jurisdiction. Even commerce benefited by the disruption, our exports to America being greater after the establishment of her independence than before. In the three years from 1771—3 the exports to the American colonies averaged 3,064,843*l*. This was greater than the average of preceding years. (Chalmers's Estimate, edit. 1804, p. 167.) In 1784 they rose to 3,397,500*l*.

In 1782 the MANUFACTURES of Britain were calculated to produce as follows:—

Woollens . . .	£16,800,000
Leather . . .	10,500,000
Flax . . .	1,750,000
Hemp . . .	390,000

It is necessary to bear in mind the exact period when peace was concluded to judge of the causes of the fluctuations in prices, crimes, and mortality. General peace with all the belligerents was not concluded till the summer of 1784. The preliminary articles were settled with the separated colonies in November, 1782. The preliminaries with France and Spain were adjusted in January, 1783. The definitive treaties with both, and the United States of America, were signed September 3rd, 1783. Though an armistice was agreed to with Holland, in February, 1783, preliminaries were not settled till September, and the definitive treaty was not signed till May 24th, 1784. Peace with Tippoo Saib, which influenced the price of India stock, was not concluded till March, 1784. And in July of that year there was a general thanksgiving for all these blessings.

The returns of criminal convictions at the Old Bailey have been collected from the Annual Register; they are incomplete, and, except perhaps the capital punishments, are not to be depended on for accuracy. The increase of convictions in 1780 was owing to the riots of that year, and the still further increase in 1783 was probably owing to the peace and consequent reduction of the military and naval forces.

POPULATION OF LONDON.

At this period the population of the metropolis, including the cities of London and Westminster, the borough of Southwark, and the out-parishes within the bills of mortality, amounted probably to about 700,000. In the year 1700 it amounted to 674,350; it had not greatly increased in the interval. In 1801, when a census for the first time was accurately taken, the population of all the parishes within the bills of mortality amounted to 747,043; little more than half the present number.

From the reports of the Westminster General Dispensary (Philosophical Transactions, lxxi.) it was found that in 1782, of 3236 married persons in London, 824, or one-fourth, were born in London; 1870 in the counties of England and Wales; 209 in Scotland; 280 in Ireland; 53 were foreigners.

GEORGE III. A.D. 1785 to 1793.

THE leading topics of the third period of the present reign are the administration of the country during eight years of peace and the breaking out of the French Revolution.

After the termination of the American war, the wisdom of the government and the energies of the people were directed to the repair of the evils occasioned by that unfortunate contest. An appeal to the country at a moment of popular excitement produced by the North coalition and their scheme of Indian administration, having given to Mr. Pitt a decided parliamentary majority, he was enabled to introduce and carry, with no more opposition perhaps than was necessary to due investigation, a series of national improvements.

The first measure that signalled the ministry of the young premier was his India Bill, resembling in its main features that introduced by Mr. Fox, but divested of those objectionable parts which had at once excited the jealous fears of the sovereign, and of corporations. Some judicious fiscal and financial regulations followed for improving the management of the crown-lands, the suppression of smuggling, the commutation and consolidation of taxes, the improvement of the revenue, and the reduction of the public debt. The establishment, in 1786, of the ingenious, but as to its ostensible purpose, delusive sinking-fund, evinced a patriotic spirit in the minister, though it is now clearly understood that he was almost ludicrously led astray as to the miraculous powers of compound interest in the liquidation of a national debt; an error he shared with some of the strongest minds of the country; forming a striking instance of the manner in which the best intellects may be caught in the chasm that separates the abstract from the practical. He went, however, beyond his contemporaries in the conclusion, in the same year, of a Commercial Treaty with France; it being arranged on those sound principles of FREE TRADE and reciprocity which were then only beginning to be known, and are not yet universally understood, or at least practised. Two years after, he had the good fortune to take up popular and constitutional ground in resisting the doctrine of the Opposition, that the regency, during the king's indisposition, devolved in full sovereignty, and by right, on the prince of Wales. He, on the contrary, maintained, and certainly more in accordance with the revolution principles of 1688, that it lay in the two remaining branches of the legislature to fill up the office as they should think proper; admitting, at the same time, of the prior claim of the heir-apparent.

In bringing forward while minister the question of an amendment in the national representation, Mr. Pitt redeemed his engagements to the reformers. He also evinced an attachment to constitutional principles by the introduction, in 1791, of a liberal and comprehensive measure for the government of Canada. It was not free from the objections, which did not escape the vigilance of Mr. Fox, of copying some of the defects along with the excellencies of the English constitution; but it avoided the cardinal error that originated the colonial war, by leaving the Canadians to tax themselves. In the celebrated impeachment of Warren Hastings, Mr. Pitt seems to have been influenced by a desire that impartial justice should be awarded to the accused; though that, after a painfully protracted suit, appears at last to have been only imperfectly attained, owing, in a great measure, to the mis-directed zeal and wasted abilities of the managers of this famous trial. Improvements in the police of the metropolis, efforts to lessen the horrors of the African slave-trade, and the passing of the Libel Bill of Mr. Fox, may also be enumerated among the prominent features of Mr. Pitt's domestic government.

The FOREIGN POLICY of the minister seems to have been most obnoxious to censure. It was meddling and officious; the old error of constantly interfering in the affairs of neighbouring nations, of volunteering the arbitrament of their differences, which had entailed such irredeemable incumbrances on the community, was tenaciously and obtrusively persisted in. Intoxicated by the success of his interference in the business of the Stadtholdership of Holland, Mr. Pitt was constantly on the watch for objects of foreign intervention. Proud of the vast resources he wielded, and which had so greatly augmented during the peace, he was not only ready but impatient for the combat. The affair with Spain relative to the fur-settlement at Nootka Sound might have been arranged without the parade of a costly armament. Jealousy of Russian aggrandisement was the next pretext for vast warlike preparations; and in grandiloquent terms the insignificant town of Oczakov was magnified into the "Key of Constantinople," the pivot on which turned the exact poise of the European balance of power. Happily, on this occasion, there was no disposition in the people for hostilities, and the Quixotic aspirations of the premier ended without interrupting the steady progress of the nation in the arts of peace.

From the sections devoted to the state of the finances, and the progress of commerce, manufactures, and shipping, during the period under notice, it will be seen that the country had not only recovered from all the difficulties of the American contest, but had reached a height of prosperity wholly unprecedented. On the commencement of the parliamentary session of 1792, both the king and his minister indulged in the most gratifying pictures of national happiness and prosperity. They foresaw nothing likely to interrupt them; on the contrary, they predicted in glowing terms their long continuance and probable increase; and no one rose with gloomy forebodings to shadow the brightness of the prospect; so little prescience was there in any party of the awful futurity!

While England was increasing in riches and population, the other European nations were not stationary. There had been no general continental war since the peace of 1763, and the interval had been occupied in salutary ameliorations. Frederick II. of Prussia, Catherine II. of Russia, and Joseph II. of Germany, were contemporaries, and all sovereigns of liberal and extraordinary minds. They were all reformers; they were proud of the vocation; they gloried in adopting whatever social or political amendment the intelligence of the age suggested, and their example was followed by the lesser princes. Under their auspices and those of the vast body of men of science and letters whom they patronised, the character of European society had been changed, partly in its outward forms—its institutions, laws, and usages—but more in its inward spirit and substance. The influence of a rich and superstitious priesthood was circumscribed; the Jesuits extirpated; the monastic orders vastly reduced in number; and the flames of that religious zeal which for two centuries had so often kindled civil discord and the faggot of persecution, were sunk into the ashes. Judicial torture was abolished, and the dark tribunals of the Inquisition rendered innoxious. In Hungary, Bohemia, and Russia, the serfs were being gradually enfranchised; and Rousseau even thought they ought not to receive liberty too suddenly. Agriculture was sedulously promoted, and the pursuits of commerce no longer esteemed degrading. Artificial distinctions and titles of honour had still a ceremonious precedence allowed them in private life; but the nobility indulged as little in the supercilious pride and exclusiveness as the barbaric pomp of their feudal predecessors. All the diversified classes of society began everywhere to harmonise with each other in a way hitherto unknown; and whatever prescriptive rights might remain to the privileged orders, “a sweeter blood” had been infused into every member of the political body*.

This was the state of things in 1789, in the despotic countries of the Continent. A revolution was being silently effected in society by the quiet diffusion of reason and philosophy. It had become the policy, as much as the ambition of princes, to listen to the claims of humanity and justice. How long this progression would have continued had not the FRENCH RE-

Having mentioned above the abolition of the Inquisition and of judicial torture in Europe, a few facts may be properly subjoined. The last person burnt alive by the Inquisition in Spain was an unfortunate woman at Seville, in 1781, for licentious intercourse with a demon (Llorente, Hist. d'Inquisit., iv. 270). In the catholic countries of Tuscany and Modena the Inquisition was abolished in 1780-2. Joseph II. abolished torture in Germany, in 1776, and his example was soon after followed by his brother Leopold, in Italy. In France torture was abolished in 1780. There is no instance of the use of torture in England later than 1619. In that year a warrant was issued by the privy-council, signed, among others, by lord-chancellor Bacon, to put Samuel Peacock, who was suspected of treason, to the rack (Archæologia, vol. x.; paper by Mr. Chalmers). The practice of torture continued in Scotland till the revolution of 1688, and was only made illegal by the Act of Union in 1706. The infliction of barbarous criminal punishments continued till a recent period. So late as 1789 there is an instance of a woman burnt in the heart of the city of London for petty treason (post, March 10, 1789). Branding in the brawn of the thumb continued till 1779, and the disembowelling of traitors was in practice till within these few years.

So late as 1789 there is an instance of a woman burnt in the heart of the city of London for petty treason (post, March 10, 1789). Branding in the brawn of the thumb continued till 1779, and the disembowelling of traitors was in practice till within these few years.

revolution intervened, can only be conjectured. It had not obtained the essential guarantee of positive law and institutions; it depended on the personal character, the capricious fiat of absolute rulers.

One immediate result, however, of that crisis is undeniable, namely, that for a time at least the progress of political reform was arrested in England, Germany, Prussia, the Netherlands, Spain, and Italy. Their governments viewed the new aspect of their Gallic neighbour with trembling apprehension, as an incomprehensible and pestilent eruption; and any semblance of imitation, in the way of change or amendment, was resolutely opposed, as pregnant with undefinable ruin. France only derived immediate benefits from her terrible convulsion, which she still retains; while adjoining states were too alarmed to discern them amidst the mingled uproar of blood and anarchy by which they were temporarily obscured. At one "fell swoop" she rid herself of a wasteful and profligate court; of the feudal oppression of the game-laws, corvées, and the detestable gabelle; of arbitrary imprisonments by lettres de cachet; of the exemption of the noblesse and clergy from taxation, and the exclusive eligibility of the former to military and civil offices; of an oppressive ecclesiastical establishment; of restrictions on the freedom of the press; of the delays, corruption, and conflicting jurisdiction of her judicial administration; of the embarrassments of her finances, and the unequal apportionment of public burthens.

These were unquestionably great national benefits, but accompanied with enormous contemporary suffering and crime. Now, however, that the tempest has abated, one may more clearly discern and enumerate the errors of inexperience committed in the first stages of the Revolution—errors that long intercepted to France the enjoyment of the fruits of her extraordinary exertions, and precipitated upon her, almost in self-defence, and hostile array, surrounding nations.

The first error of the French Revolutionists of 1789 refers to the STATES-GENERAL. Disordered as the kingdom was in every part, the assembling of a body of men who represented all classes and all interests seemed a necessary and just expedient. But in the very commencement of its proceedings an act of irreparable mischief was committed. By the resolution to vote by poll, not by orders, the three estates of the realm became absorbed in one, and the salutary check of intermediate stages of legislation, especially in periods of popular excitement, was removed. Hence followed injustice and spoliation. The clergy and nobles, outnumbered by the tiers état, were speedily sacrificed. Tithes were swallowed up without equivalent to the plundered ecclesiastic. Titles of honour, and other social distinctions, were abolished. All this was the work of a single sitting*. None of the usual safeguards against iniquitous and precipitate enactments were observed; and the members of the National Assembly returned from their dinners, their clubs, and their wine, and laws which struck at the foundation of government, morals, and society, were decreed by acclamation. In one night sixteen laws were so made, or rather proclaimed†. Abbé Sieyès told them, "if they wished to be free, they should begin by being just‡." His admonition was disregarded, and from that time his voice was rarely heard among them.

The next error in the progress of political regeneration was in the overwhelming influence of the metropolis. The national assembly legislated for France, but Paris legislated for the national assembly. Had the virtue and intelligence of the capital dictated, they might have been less pernicious; but they did not: it was ignorant presumption, want, violence, and ferocity that ruled. In three weeks of 1789, Paris underwent three revolutions in her municipal government*; at the end of which the city became divided into sixty sections or parishes, forming so many little republics, each swayed by one or more demagogues, who by the aid of the illiterate had succeeded in silencing or driving from their meetings the more moderate and better informed inhabitants. Connected with these were established republican societies in every town of the kingdom. By this affiliated machinery was Paris, the national assembly, and France moved, and confusion, riot, and massacre organised. In place of the delegated will of the nation, acting for the common good, was substituted the projects of unprincipled agitators, scheming for their own selfish and ambitious purposes.

The third misfortune in the initiation of this great national movement was in the absence of an adequate executive power. Without providing a succedaneum, the monarchy, with all its supports in the aristocracy, the church, corporations, and magistracy, the army and navy, was subverted. There was no central authority left anywhere, adequate to check the disorders of the capital or in the provinces. Tumults, slaughter, and desolation stalked through the land uncontrolled. Bands of peasants, armed with such weapons as they could seize, rose against the seigneurs, hunted them down like wild beasts, laid waste their domains, and fired their châteaux. The privileged orders became alarmed by the possession of their immunities; and it was amidst the terror, occasioned by the rising of their vassals, that the extraordinary scenes of August were enacted. The viscount de Noailles and the duke d'Aiguillon, in the name of their order, made a voluntary surrender of their privileges of exemption from taxes; of their claims of feudal services; of their exclusive rights of chase; of fishing; of warren; and of dovecotes. The parish curés gave up their church fees, and the beneficiaries bound themselves never again to hold a plurality. Deputies of privileged towns and districts surrendered their charters and municipal documents. Provinces which possessed a right of taxing themselves renounced that right and their states together; and the parliaments were annihilated, as well as the provincial states. The national assembly decreed a medal to be struck to commemorate these patriotic sacrifices, and the title of "Restorer of the liberties of France" was conferred on the king. So far much was done that was laudable and to be rejoiced at. But a spirit of destruction had been evoked which could not be laid when its work was completed. It long continued to rage, to the great dismay of the peaceable and virtuous of the nation; and in this, France felt the want of that strong executive power, paramount to that of insurrectionists, factions, and parties.

The promulgation of the famous declaration of the Rights of Man, by the national assembly, was as hurtful to the cause of liberty as the bombastic manifesto of the duke of Brunswick to the cause of the allied despots. It was wholly unprofitable, originated discussions of no practical utility, and alarmed the established governments of Europe, while it conferred no actual immunity on the oppressed. Moreover, it was prematurely issued. It ought at least to have followed, not preceded, the framing of a constitution*. The rights of men in society are conventional; they are not derived from a state of nature, but from laws and institutions, and can only be known when the constitution is known which creates and guarantees them.

The fifth error of the Constituent National Assembly was in the resolution by which for two years after their dissolution the members disqualified themselves from taking any share in the administration of the government, or being re-elected representatives. This was a generous but mistaken act of self-denial and patriotism. After giving a constitution to France†, founded for the most part in wisdom and justice, it certainly seemed an equitable proceeding to leave the trial of its merits to an entirely new and disinterested authority. It was emulating the conduct of Lycurgus, who, after giving laws to Sparta, took no part in their execution, but withdrew into obscurity. But in practice it proved injurious. The legislative, or second national assembly of France, which met in 1791, was confessedly inferior to the first—without its experience—possessed of less virtue and wisdom: instead of consolidating and improving, they perverted the institutions of their predecessors.

The sixth and last error of the Constituent Assembly was in prematurely dissolving themselves. They had pulled to pieces the entire fabric of French government and society; they had hastily substituted new institutions in their place which required time to settle and harmonize; and they certainly ought to have kept longer together to have watched over them. Their apprehension seemed to be lest they should, by perpetuating their power, imitate the usurpation of the Long Parliament of England; a body of men whom, in their collective capacity, they as much transcended in the magnitude of their proceedings, as in patriotic devotedness. All the errors indeed of the famous Constituent National Assembly of France leaned to "virtue's side." They were errors of inexperience, enthusiasm, and disinterestedness; of too much confidence in human nature and popular intelligence.

The career of the French Revolution proceeded with augmented force through the whole of 1792. Enraged at the threatening manifesto of the duke of Brunswick, and mistrusting Louis XVI. after his unsuccessful attempt to escape to Coblenz, and refusal to sign the decrees against the emigrants and non-juring priests, the Parisians stormed the Tuileries, massacred its defenders, and all others whom they suspected of being favourable to, or acting in concert with, the allied invaders. Pétion, the mayor of Paris, and Danton, the minister of justice, were suspected of having connived at, if not indirectly promoted, these and subsequent excesses of the metropolis. Royalty was deposed, and a provisional executive appointed, who were influenced in their proceedings by the municipality of Paris, chosen by the republican sections of the capital, the virtual rulers of the kingdom. The year closed with the hasty dissolution of the Legislative Assembly, having first published an able appeal to their contemporaries and posterity in defence of their proceedings, and the election, with unlimited powers, on the principle of universal suffrage, of the NATIONAL CONVENTION. Under this new tribunal the trial of the king began.

EVENTS AND OCCURRENCES.

1783. Jan. 1. The English newspapers prohibited in France, owing to the absurd stories they indulged in, for want of political matter, relative to the princes of Europe.

10. The boats of the smugglers at Deal having been all laid up by the severity of the winter, Mr. Pitt seized the opportunity to send a regiment of soldiers to burn them, which they did in spite of the opposition of the townspeople.

22. A loyal address presented from Dublin, signed by 21 peers and 1113 commoners.

25. Parliament re-opened, after the recess, by the king, who particularly recommended to consideration the commercial intercourse with Ireland.

Feb. 7. Seven ruffians, about eight o'clock at night, knocked at the door of Mrs. Abercrombie, in Charlotte-street, Rat-bone-place, calling out post, and on its being opened, rushed in, and took from Mrs. A. all her jewels, and fifty or sixty guineas in money, with all the clothes and linen they could get. The neighbourhood was alarmed, and a great crowd assembled, but the robbers sailed forth, and with swords drawn and pistols presented, threatened destruction to any who opposed them. The mob tamely suffered them to escape with their booty, without offering any resistance.

11. The court of King's-bench decided that the insurance offices had no right to recover from the city of London 22,000*l.*, which they had paid to Mr. Langdale, the distiller, and other sufferers by the "No Popery" riots.

Mar. 2. This day chief-justice Mansfield completed his eightieth year, and presided on the bench at Guildhall in perfect health and spirits. Mr. Gorman, an eminent merchant, distinguished for his legal and constitutional knowledge as a juror, presented his lordship with his annual offering of a bouquet, which the chief received with his usual politeness.

Apr. 2. The winter was severe and protracted, having commenced on the first fall of snow (Oct. 7), and lasted 177 days.

12. George Barrington, a notorious pick-pocket, tried for stealing a gold watch. He made an eloquent appeal to the jury, and was acquitted from a defect of evidence.

13. REFORM OF PARLIAMENT.—Mr. Pitt, who stood pledged to the reformers to use his endeavours, "as a man and a minister," for promoting their cause, moved to bring in a bill to amend the representation of the people. His plan was to transfer the right of election from thirty-six decayed boroughs to the counties and principal unrepresented towns; allowing a pecuniary compensation to the owners of the disfranchised boroughs, and to extend the right of voting in populous towns to the inhabitants in general, and for knights of the shire to copyholders. Mr. Fox strongly objected to purchasing the franchises of boroughs; "government," he said, "was not a property but a trust; whatever was given for constitutional purposes should be resumed when those purposes were no longer answered" (Belsham's Hist. George III., vol. iv. 58). After a long debate, attended with much personality, the motion was negatived by a majority of 248 to 174.

28. The twelve judges unanimously decided that a military officer on half-pay is not subject to a court-martial.

May 14. The new canal, connecting the North Sea and Baltic, completed, and declared to be open to all European states.

The prince of Wales elected a member of a classical and convivial society, called the Beef-steak Club.

Some persons set on fire the heath growing in Windsor forest. It extended for miles, destroying several forest trees. The like occurrence happened at Boughton in Kent. The heat and dryness of the season occasioned the fires to spread with rapidity.

June 1. John Adams, the first ambassador from the United States of America, was presented to the king.

16. Warren Hastings, the late governor-general of Bengal, arrived in London.

17. A petition presented to the house of lords from Manchester, with 120,000 signatures, chiefly against the importation of Irish linens duty free. As the Irish did not participate in the burthens of England, the petitioners objected to their participating in her trade.

July 1. Died, aged 102, general Oglethorpe, one of the founders of the colony of Georgia in America.

Letters from all parts of the Continent speak of the extreme heat and dryness of the summer.

Aug 6. At Shrewsbury, before justice Buller, came on the trial of Dr. Shipley, dean of St. Asaph, for a libel, in publishing sir W. Jones's 'Dialogue on Government;' when the jury returned the following verdict:—Gilty of publishing only, but whether a libel or not, the jury do not find. On this trial, Mr. afterwards lord. Erskine, exerted himself in a distinguished manner.

27. The victualling business entirely removed from Tower-hill to Deptford.

Sept. 1. French manufactures destroyed at Dublin by the populace.

30. Parliament prorogued.

Oct. 21. Salary of the recorder of London advanced from 600*l.* to 1000*l.* a year.

27. Medical theatre of the London hospital opened, with four introductory orations by Mr. Blizard, and Drs. Harwood, Healdé, and Maddock.

Nov. The shop-tax grievously complained of in London.

18. Died, Mrs. Kelly, the noted Irish fairy, who was only 34 inches long. She had been delivered of a child 22 inches long, which lived about two hours after birth.—Annual Register.

Dec. The number of executions at the Old Bailey, since February last, amount to ninety-six.—Annual Register.

An important cause was tried before the Court of Session in Scotland, respecting literary property. The proprietors of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" had printed a great part of Mr. Gilbert Stuart's History in their work. The court determined they were subject to the penalty of the acts.

18. Mr. Howard, the philanthropist, left England to visit the plague-hospitals of Marseilles, to communicate some discoveries, and try some experiments to save the lives of the patients.

AEROSTATION.—Aerial excursions by balloons had become very frequent in England. Lunardi, an Italian, made several ascents. Mr. Sheldon, professor of anatomy to the Royal Academy, also ascended. A Mr. Sadler and colonel Fitzpatrick went up from Birmingham; but the former, in his descent near Trentham, was in considerable danger. A Frenchman, named Blanchard, had been up in balloons two or three times, when he and Dr. Jefferies ascended from Dover castle, with a view to cross the Channel: they succeeded, and landed with some difficulty between Calais and Boulogne. Pilatre de Rosier and another ascending in a balloon, called a Mongolfier, it took fire: they fell from a considerable height, and both perished. Mr. Arnold and his son went up from St. George's-fields: the former was thrown out by the car striking a cart, and his son fell into the Thames. Major Money ascended from Norwich, and being unable to open the valve, he was carried to sea, into which he descended, and was only saved from drowning by a revenue-cutter.

ANNUAL ORITUARY.—M. Diderot, a celebrated French metaphysician. Peter, the Wild Boy; he was found in the woods of Hanover in George I.'s reign. William Whitehead, the poet-laureate. Samuel House, a publican, noted for his strong attachment to the person and politics of Mr. Fox. Abbé de Mably, a French author of celebrity. John Henderson, a popular comedian. Mrs. Clive, a noted actress. John Cipriani, an artist of eminence.

IRELAND.—The city of Dublin continued through the whole of the summer in a state of perturbation, and after the rising of parliament, non-importation agreements with England became frequent in the capital, and spread into every part of the kingdom. They were even sanctioned by the grand juries, and the merchants in the ports found it necessary to comply with them. To restrain the violence of the populace, the military were posted in the most disorderly parts of the town, where their presence naturally inflamed the passions of those whom their arms kept in awe.

1786. Jan. 1. The number of vessels which passed the Sound last year amounted to 10,268; of which 2535 were English, 2136 Swedes, 1789 Danes, 1571 Dutch, 114 Russians, 176 Bremens, 161 Dantzickers, 1358 Prussians, 110 Rostock, 79 Lubeckers, 66 Imperialists, 61 Ham-burghers, 28 Portuguese, 25 Courlanders, 20 French, 20 Americans, 15 Spanish, and 4 Venetians.—Ann. Reg., xxviii. 196.

6. The Halsewell East Indiaman wrecked at Seacombe; nearly 100 persons lost.

24. Parliament opened by the king, who expressed an earnest desire to enforce economy in every department; and recommended the establishment of a sinking-fund for the reduction of the national debt.

31. The right of vicars to clover-seed, turnip-seed, and all small tithes, established in the exchequer.

LONGEVITY.—Died lately, at the age of 110 years, cardinal de Salis, archbishop of Seville. He used to tell his friends when asked what regimen he observed,—“By being old when I was young, I find myself young now I am old. I led a sober, studious, but not a lazy or sedentary life. My diet was sparing, though delicate; my liquors the best wines of Xerez and La Mancha, of which I never exceeded a pint at any meal, except in cold weather, when I allowed myself a third more. I rode or walked every day except in rainy weather, when I exercised for a couple of hours.”—Ann. Reg. for 1786.

Feb. 10. Thirteen debtors tried and convicted of a conspiracy to escape from the King's-bench prison, by blowing up the walls. They were sentenced to long terms of imprisonment.

24. Earl Cornwallis appointed governor-general of Bengal.

27. Mr. Pitt moved a resolution approving the plan of the duke of Richmond for fortifying the dock-yards of Portsmouth and Plymouth. On a division, the numbers (169) were exactly equal, and the speaker giving his casting vote on the negative side, the design was defeated. An excellent speech of Sheridan seems to have influenced the decision.

Mar. 2. Died, in his 50th year, JOHN JEAN, M.D., a zealous advocate of popular rights and freedom of opinion. He tried to improve the course of academical education at Cambridge, and relinquished his church—preferments from conscientious scruples, becoming subsequently a licentiate of the college of physicians.

24. At Portsmouth the convicts in the prison-ships rose upon their keepers, and were not overcome till eight were shot dead, and thirty-six wounded.

29. SINKING FUND.—Mr. Pitt introduced his celebrated plan of a sinking fund for the gradual reduction of the national debt. The surplus of annual taxes amounting to 900,000*l.*, he proposed to impose new taxes to make up the sum of one million, which, with compound interest, was to be applied to the purchase of stock at the market price, to be vested in commissioners. At the expiration of 29 years, it was estimated that the annual income of the fund would amount to four millions, beyond which it was proposed the fund should not be allowed to accumulate; future surplusses being applied to the reduction of taxation. The bill for carrying this scheme into effect passed with general approbation.

31. An action on the case was tried before Mr. Justice Buller at Guildhall, brought by lord Loughborough against John Walter, printer of the Universal Register, for a libel, in propagating an infamous and injurious report against the plaintiff. The jury gave a verdict, and 150*l.* damages to the plaintiff.

Apr. 4. Mr. Burke exhibited nine articles of impeachment against Warren Hastings, late governor-general of Bengal, which were ordered to be printed. The rest of the charges, amounting in the whole to twenty-two, he presented the week following.

17. The west tower of Worcester cathedral, erected in the reign of William Rufus, and esteemed one of the most beautiful remains of gothic architecture, fell down, and carried with it a part of the body of the church.

May 1. Mr. Hastings, at his own desire, was heard at the bar of the commons, and the minutes of the defence ordered to lie on the table.

4. Lord George Gordon excommunicated from the parish-church of St. Mary-le-bone. He had become a convert to Judaism, and, according to sir William Wraxall, submitted to the rite of circumcision.

22. Mr. Pitt introduced a bill for transferring certain duties on wine from the customs, to the excise. He stated that the produce of the duties on wine was considerably less at this time than at the middle of the last century, which he ascribed to smuggling, and the sale of a spurious home-made liquor under its name. The bill became law.

June 1. The first article of impeachment, moved by Mr. Burke against Warren Hastings respecting the "Rohilla war," was discussed, and decided in favour of the accused by 119 to 67; Mr. Pitt voting in silence with the majority.

13. Upon the second charge, moved by Mr. Fox, regarding the rajah of Benares, the house resolved, by 119 to 79, "that this charge contained matter of impeachment against the late governor-general of Bengal." Upon this occasion Mr. Pitt spoke and voted in favour of the motion.

19. Mr. Fox recovered 2000*l.* damages against the bailiff of Westminster for not returning him M.P. for that city, and which Mr. Fox declared should be distributed among the charities of Westminster.

23. Mr. Pitt introduced a bill for inquiring into the condition and management of the land-revenues of the crown. It was opposed in the upper house by lord Loughborough as inquisitorial, but passed into a law.

July 11. The King's-bench determined that starting a fox on a man's own ground, and running him on his neighbour's, was no trespass.

The prince of Wales finding his affairs embarrassed, discharged his state-servants, having resolved to reduce his expenses to 5000*l.* a year, and appropriate the rest of his income to discharge his debts, which amounted to 250,000*l.*

14. A convention signed in London between Spain and Britain, regulating the cutting of logwood in South America.

31. A booth, converted into a playhouse, at Montpellier in France, fell down, and 500 persons were killed and wounded.

Aug. 2. This morning, as the king was alighting from a post chariot at the garden-gate of St. James's, an attempt was made upon his life by a woman, who, presenting a paper to him, aimed a stroke at his breast with a concealed knife. The blow was avoided by a backward movement, and as she was about to make another thrust, her hand was caught by a yeoman of the guard, and the knife taken from her; the king exclaiming, "I am not hurt—take care of the poor woman—do not hurt her." On examination, she was found to be one Margaret Nicholson, a person in obscure life, from the north of England, whose reason was bewildered by some insane ideas of right to the crown. Her insanity being fully apparent to the privy-council, she was committed to custody as a lunatic.

14. Died, at his father's house, Edinburgh, aged 44, GILBERT STUART, LL.D.; a remarkable example of very considerable historical and literary abilities rendered useless to the possessor by a sour and malevolent nature.

16. The king visits Oxford.

Sept. 5. Died, aged 74, JONAS HANWAY, a traveller and merchant of much active benevolence. He was also the author of several literary works, and was the first who carried an umbrella, which innovation, after persisting in for 30 years, he had the satisfaction to see generally adopted.

DEATH OF THE KING OF PRUSSIA.—Frederick ~~the~~ of Prussia, not undeservedly styled the "Great," expired, apparently resigned and tranquil, on the 17th instant, in the 75th year of his age. Viewed in his various capacities of monarch, legislator, and man of letters, he was the most distinguished man of his time. Chargeable as all the early part of his career may have been with unprincipled ambition, rapacity, and despotism, his latter years exhibited him in the character of a tolerant and beneficent ruler, whose cares were devoted to the happiness and prosperity of his subjects.

26. Treaty of commerce agreed to at Versailles between Britain and France, on a more liberal principle than heretofore, by promoting an interchange of the commodities of the two countries.

Oct. 20. A man contrived, by an ingenious scaffolding made of twigs, to bring down the weather-cock from the old abbey-church of St. Alban's. He was a basket-maker.

Nov. 21. Aylett, an attorney, pilloried in Palace-yard for perjury.

The countess of Strathmore, who had, since her first husband's death, married a Mr. Bowes, was forcibly carried off by him and other armed men. She was brought up to the King's-bench on the 23rd inst., by habeas corpus, and released; and her husband committed to prison till the judges determined what security he should give to keep the peace.

Dec. 4. Three clergymen of the church of England were presented to the archbishop of Canterbury by Mr. Adams, the American minister, to be consecrated bishops, to act in that capacity in the government of the Episcopal church of the United States.

9. A ship sailed from London with negroes on board, to form a new settlement at Sierra Leone.

FRANCE.—At this period the French government, directed by M. de Calonne, was uncommonly attentive to every point connected with naval and commercial improvement. Stupendous works were undertaken to improve the harbour of Cherbourg. A colony of American whalers, chiefly Quakers, arrived at Dunkirk, to be settled there, with every security for their civil and religious rites. Some indulgences were granted to French protestants, and the peasantry were partly relieved in regard to feudal services.

GERMANY.—The emperor proceeded in his civil and ecclesiastical reforms: among them was the abrogation of the old laws, and the establishment of an entire new code. In this system capital punishment was nearly abolished, but the substitutions were in many cases so severe, that humanity rather lost than gained. The suppression of religious orders was persisted in, and a list published of 413 monasteries and 211 nunneries suppressed since 1782.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—In poverty, Mrs. Baddeley, aged 42, an actress of great beauty. Sir George Nares, one of the judges of the court of Common-pleas. In his 56th year, Thomas Tyrwhitt, an eminent critic and scholar. Viscount Keppel, a British admiral. Aged 76, princess Amelia Sophia Eleonora, second daughter of George II. Sir Horace Mann, forty-six years minister at Florence.

1787. Jan. The incontestable Droit d'Aubaine, or right claimed by the crown of France to the property of foreigners dying in that country, was abolished so far as affects British subjects.

5. The three denominations of dissenters held a meeting at Dr. Williams's library, Red Cross-street, when it was resolved to petition parliament for a repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts; and a numerous committee was appointed to carry the resolution into effect.

23. Parliament re-assembled, after a protracted recess. The speech from the throne referred chiefly to the late commercial treaty with France, and the state of the finances.

27. Thomas Thurlow, bishop of Lincoln, translated to Durham. He was succeeded by Prettyman in the see of Lincoln.

FEB. SCOTCH PEERAGES.—Two of the Scotch peers (lords Queensberry and Abercorn) among the sixteen, being created British peers, the question arose, for the first time, whether they did not cease to sit in the lords as Scottish representative peers. The subject was introduced on the 13th instant, by lord Stormont, and was decided in the affirmative.

5. A new coinage of silver, in shillings and sixpences, issued, to the amount of 75,000*l*.

7. Nearly 8000 shopkeepers of the metropolis petition for the repeal of the shop-tax.

7. Mr. Sheridan delivered one of his most brilliant orations on the charge against Warren Hastings for his treatment of the Begums of Oude. It lasted five hours and a half, and elicited the unqualified praise of Pitt, Fox, and Burke. A tumult of applause followed; and members, peers, and strangers adopted a mode of expressing their approbation, new in the house (Annual Register, xxix., 150), by loudly and repeatedly "clapping with their hands."

12. TREATY OF COMMERCE.—Mr. Pitt, in an eloquent speech, introduced the commercial treaty with France. She gained, he said, a market of eight millions of people for her wines and luxuries, and we a market of 24 millions for our manufactures. Mr. Fox opposed the treaty on the same general grounds that he had done on the first day of the session, in the debate on the address. The scope of his reasoning went to show that England was the natural rival of France, and the counterpoise to her power, and "in some degree an enmity between them was inevitable" (Ann. Reg., xxix., 67). Mr. Francis followed on the same side, and "dreaded the effects of an intimate political connexion with France upon the character of the British nation. The first and most prominent feature in the political character of lord Chatham was antijacobin. The present minister had taken the opposite road to fame; and France, the object of every hostile principle in the policy of lord Chatham, was the gens amica of the son" (Ibid., 81). Mr. Wilberforce pointedly replied to the arguments of the opposition, and deprecated the folly of sacrificing the mercantile interests of the community to the vain glory of holding the balance of power in Europe. Upon a division, a vote of approval of the treaty was only carried by a majority of 76 voices; the minority amounting to 162 members.

20. The Court of Session, Edinburgh, determined that town-councils of the royal boroughs are not accountable for the expenditure of their revenues.

22. The assembly of NOTABLES was held at Versailles. It consisted of 144 persons, among whom were seven princes of the blood, nine dukes and peers of France, eight councillors of state, and eleven archbishops and bishops.

26. Motion of Mr. Pitt to consolidate the duties of customs. It met general approbation, and became a law.

Mar. 28. CORPORATION AND TEST ACTS.—Mr. Beaumont brought forward his motion for taking into consideration the repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts. He endeavoured to prove that the latter was never designed to include protestant dissenters; that the reasons for the former had ceased; that no man ought to be punished for opinions; that disqualifications are punishments; that the disqualifications were not defensible by any state necessity; vindicated the dissenters from the charge of republicanism, and of aiming at the revenue of the church. Lord North (who lately had the misfortune of losing his eye-sight) came down purposely to oppose the motion. He admitted the full right and policy of religious toleration; but it was necessary to make a distinction between a participation in the offices of state and liberty of conscience. Mr. Pitt followed on the same side. He observed that there must be a restriction of rights in all societies; that, for instance, in this nation all the modes of representation necessarily included modes of qualification. But was a man to be considered as punished, or disgraced, because he does not vote for a city, a county, or a borough? The true question was, whether there was any substantial interest which made it necessary that one part of the community should be deprived of a participation in its civil offices. He said the security of the church was an interest of this nature, and that he thought it would be endangered by the repeal proposed (Ann. Reg., xxix., 118). Mr. Fox, in a long and able speech, supported the repeal; as did also Mr. Smith and Mr. James Johnstone. Motion negatived—Ays, 100; noes, 178.

Apr. DEBTS OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.—The expenses of the prince having greatly exceeded his income of 50,000*l.* a year, he applied, in the summer of last year, to the king for pecuniary assistance. Meeting with a peremptory refusal, he immediately adopted a line of conduct creditable to his integrity. Reducing his household, as already mentioned, he formally invested four fifths of his income in the hands of trustees for the liquidation of his debts, and retired into the station of a private gentleman. Twelvemonths elapsing without any notice being taken of his voluntary seclusion, on the 20th inst. alderman Newman expressed his intention to bring forward a proposition for rescuing the prince from his embarrassments. This gave rise to an interesting conversation, in which pointed allusion was made to the recent marriage of the prince with Mrs. Fitzherbert, a Roman catholic. Mr. Fox incautiously denied that such marriage either legally could, or in fact had, taken place at all. Subsequently, Mr. Pitt had a personal interview with the prince, at the desire of the king, in which it was agreed, that on condition Mr. Newman withdrew his intended motion, a provision should be made for the payment of his debts, and an addition of 10,000*l.* a year be made to his income, payable out of the civil-list.

25. The corps of engineers, hitherto

General Pitt Rivers, and his
 Mr. Burke appeared at the bar to impeach Warren Hastings crimes and misdemeanors.

The commons, without looking into accounts laid before them, agreed to provision for the debts of the prince to the amount of 181,000*l*.
 Parliament prorogued.

23. Commodore Phillips sails from Spit-head to establish a settlement of convicts in New South Wales.

June 6. Lord George Gordon was tried in the court of King's-bench, before judge Buller, for a libel published in a pamphlet, entitled, "A Petition to Lord George Gordon from the Prisoners in Newgate, praying that he would secure their liberties by preventing them from being sent to any-bay." His lordship defended himself, without the aid of counsel, and was found guilty. He was also tried for a libel on the French ambassador, and found guilty.

12. A royal edict, imposing a stamp-duty, was sent to the parliament of Paris, for registering, who refused compliance, and addressed the king to assemble the states-general. The king held a bed of justice, in which the obnoxious edict was forcibly registered; but, at a subsequent meeting, the parliament expunged it from their journals.

 Glasgow, owing to a reduction in wages.
 The military were called in, and eight persons killed.

21. An order issued for the impressment of seamen.

Oct. AFFAIR OF THE STADTHOLDERATE.
 —The French court intimated to those of London and Berlin that it had determined not to interfere in the disputes of Holland, except as a mediator, provided other powers observed the same moderation; but if any other power took up arms against the republic, France would act according to circumstances. England and Prussia having already determined to intervene, this announcement caused immediate preparations for hostilities. Measures were taken by Mr. Pitt to equip a fleet, the land-forces were recruited, and a subsidiary treaty entered into with the landgrave of Hesse Cassel for the hire of troops. The contest, however, being speedily settled in the United Provinces by the Prussian army, and France being too much embroiled in her own affairs to interfere with those of others, she agreed to an arrangement with England. This convention was announced at Lloyd's on the 30th inst.

Nov. 27. The autumnal parliamentary session opened by the king, who adverted to the reasons that had induced him to interfere in the disputes in Holland.

Dec. 1. A notorious assembly at Worcester, owing to an apprehension that machines were about being erected for spinning wool. It was quelled by the interference of the civil power.

DEATH OF SOAME JENYNS.—This sprightly and ingenious author expired on the 18th inst., in the 83rd year of his age. He was at one time a member of the board of trade, along with the historian Gibbon and the dramatist Cumberland, and entered parliament as a supporter of the ministry of sir Robert Walpole. His most celebrated work is the "View of the Internal Evidences of the Christian Religion," the divine origin of which he founded on its superior moral code. The fundamental principle of his "Free Inquiry into the Origin of Evil" is, that the production of good without evil is impossible; that evils spring from necessity, and could not be done away without the sacrifice of some superior good, or the admission of greater disorder. His last production was "Thoughts on Parliamentary Reform," which he wholly opposed. He was a shrewd, witty, but fanciful writer, distinguished by the beauties of his style.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—Sir William Drayper, a general in the army, and known for his epistolary contest with Junius. Mr. justice Willes, one of the judges of the court of King's-bench. Rev. Paul Henry Maty, F.R.S., a gentleman of some literary celebrity. Father Boscovich, an eminent professor of astronomy. Mrs. Yates, a celebrated tragedian. Israel Mauduit, a public writer of celebrity. Sir Richard Jebb, physician-extraordinary to the king.
 Edmund Law, bishop of Carlisle, aged 84.
 Count de Vergennes, a celebrated French statesman, aged 68.

UNITED PROVINCES.—The chief foreign event of this year was the termination of the disputes which had subsisted between the Stadtholder and the United Provinces. The princess of Orange travelling near Schoonhoven, was stopped by a guard of armed burghers, and placed under arrest. Upon this, the king of Prussia demanded satisfaction for the insult offered to his sister, which being refused, he despatched the duke of Brunswick, with 18,000 men, to overrun the country. Amsterdam alone made a show of resistance, and that city speedily opened its gates. The stadtholderian party had now a complete triumph over that of the republicans, and the prince of Orange was reinstated in all his former power.

AMERICAN STATES.—Some alteration in the constitution of the Union had become unavoidable. The State of Virginia first moved, that a convention of delegates from each state should meet, discuss the various necessary alterations, and then lay them before the respective states for their approbation. The delegates met, and warm debates ensued; but the calm wisdom of Washington and Franklin prevailed, and they settled a constitution which seemingly guaranteed as much individual liberty as was compatible with an efficient administration. They enlarged the powers of the general government, not by taking from the people, but from the state legislatures. This constitution was ratified before the end of the year by three states; by eight more the next year; and the other two acceded in 1789.

10. Austria declared war against the Turks.

PRIZE-FIGHTING.—A prize-fight took place between Richard Humphreys and Daniel Mendoza, a Jew. It was fought at Odiham in Hampshire, for 400 guineas, upon a raised twenty-four feet stage, and terminated in 29 minutes in favour of Humphreys. From this time pugilism may be said to have become fashionable. The newspapers were filled with anecdotes respecting the combatants; and scarcely a print-shop in London but what exhibited the portraits of the fistic heroes. Schools of fencing, and of sparring, thrived at the theatres and Royal Circus. The most noted patrons of pugilism, the prince of Wales, the dukes of Clarence and Cambridge, the duke of Hamilton, Lord Barrymore, Alderman Coombe, Mr. Ham, and general Fitzpatrick.

13. Trial of Mr. Hastings, in Westminster Hall, began. Mr. Burke in his preliminary oration occupied four successive days; so great a trespass on attention was deemed injudicious, and the speech itself extraneous and exaggerated. At the commencement of the proceedings the lords determined, contrary to the intentions of the impeachers, who wished to have each charge decided on singly, that the whole of the charges collectively should be gone through before the accused presented on his defence.

Apr. 15. The Begum charge against Hastings was ably introduced by Mr. Adam; and the evidence summed up by Sheridan in a speech which lasted five days, and wanted only compression to have been a prodigy of eloquence.

21. Court of King's-bench determined that a woman is liable to serve the offices of overseer of the poor or commissioner of sewers.

22. Mr. Fox opened the Benares charge against Warren Hastings; it was concluded on the 25th by Mr. Grey, a gentleman whose parliamentary talents had begun to attract attention.

7. The court of King's-bench determined that interest may be charged on a debt after the usual term of credit is expired.

8. The king of France held a bed of justice, when he apprized the parliament of his intention to establish a supreme court, named the Cour Plénière, vesting in them the power of registering the royal edicts: the parliament received the communication with profound silence, and on the following day protested in the most solemn manner against this arbitrary innovation.

9. Mr. Pitt moved a resolution pledging the house to take into consideration in the ensuing session the African SLAVE TRADE. It was the first step taken towards the abolition of this iniquitous traffic.

19. Lady Strathmore recovered an estate of 12,000*l.* a-year from her husband, which she had assigned under the influence of terror.

blished in consequence of the disbandment of the troops each of the horse and grenadier guards.

June 3. Lord Mansfield resigned the judgeship of the King's-bench, a station he had occupied with distinguished reputation for thirty-two years. He was succeeded by sir Lloyd Kenyon.

AMERICAN LOYALISTS.—Mr. Pitt introduced to the commons the subject of compensation to the Americans for their losses during the war. He stated a proposition for adjusting their claims by arranging the claimants into different classes, according to their different demands upon the justice of the country, which obtained the general approbation; and concluded by moving that 1,340,000*l.* be voted to the American loyalists, which was agreed to.

18. John Scott, esq., knighted and appointed solicitor-general.

21. War between Russia and Sweden.

July. A man named Charles Craddock threw himself from the Monument and was instantly killed; a coroner's jury brought in a verdict of lunacy.

12. Parliamentary session ended.

13. HAIL STORM IN FRANCE.—On Sunday, about nine in the morning, the most fertile parts of this country were suddenly visited by a tempest of unexampled violence. Wind, hail, rain, and lightning, seemed to contend for mastery, and in about one hour the rich prospects of autumn were converted into a scene of arctic desolation. The soil was saturated into a morass, the standing-corn beaten into a quagmire, the vines broken into pieces, fruit trees of every kind were demolished, robust forest trees yielded to the blast, and the hail lay unmelted in heaps like rocks of ice.—(Ann. Reg., xxxi.

29.) The country people, on their way to church, thrown down in the fields by the fury of the hurricane, and nearly suffocated, as they lay, by the water and mud; concluded it to be the end of the world, and scarcely attempted to extricate themselves. The hail was composed of large angular pieces of solid ice, some of them weighing from eight to ten ounces, and as hard as diamonds.

17. A desperate sea-fight in the Gulf of Finland, between the Russian fleet, commanded by admiral Greig, an Englishman, and the Swedish fleet, commanded by the king's brother, the duke of Sudermania; both parties claimed the victory, and only one ship was taken by either side.

The lord chancellor refused the certificate of a bankrupt who had lost five pounds at one game of cards.

minster finally closed: the numbers were, for lord Hood, 5569; for lord J. Townshend, 6392.

8. At Dublin, a quantity of fish was found floating in the harbour, many dead and others dying; the only reason assigned is, that a large quantity of lime had been thrown into the water.

Upwards of 5000 head of horned cattle perished from want of sustenance, owing to the dryness of the season.

16. FRENCH FINANCES.—The French court, by an arrêt of council, avowed its inability to meet the demands on the royal treasury, and directed that payments in future should be made partly in cash, and partly in notes bearing an interest of five per cent. The clamour caused by this annunciation of bankruptcy drove the archbishop of Toulouse from the management of the finances. He was succeeded by M. Necker, the banker of Geneva, who was again called to the arduous post he had filled previously to M. de Calonne. His reputation for financial talent temporarily restored public confidence.

Sept. 3. William Brodie and George Smith were tried and convicted at Edinburgh for breaking open the excise office in Scotland, and condemned to die; Brodie inherited a considerable estate and 16,000*l.* in money at the death of his father, all of which he dissipated at the gaming-table.

William Scott knighted and appointed advocate-general.

20. A white partridge shot near Oxford.

Oct. Symptoms of mental derangement appeared in the king.

5. ASSEMBLY OF NOTABLES.—A second meeting of the Notables was convened on the subject of assembling the States-general of the kingdom; when it appeared to be the unanimous opinion that the states-general should be modelled according to the precedent of 1614. The court published its decision (Dec. 27th) a fortnight after the Notables were dissolved, by which it was decreed that the deputies to the ensuing states-general should be at least 1000; that the representation should bear as near a proportion as possible to the population and taxable contributions of the different baillages; and that the Tiers Etat should equal in representatives the other two orders of nobles and clergy collectively.

11. Lambeth palace robbed of plate to the amount of 2000*l.*

Nov. 5. It being the birth-day of William III. and the centenary of the Revolution of 1688, these events were celebrated with great triumph in London, Edinburgh, and Dublin. At the dinner of the Revolution Society at the London Tavern, upwards of 800 gentlemen were present, earl Stanhope in the chair. At the whig club held at the Crown and Anchor, the duke of Portland in the chair, Mr. Sheridan, after paying an eloquent tribute to the memory of the deliverer, proposed resolutions for erecting a monument at Runnymede in honour of the event. 1000*l.* was subscribed.

19. King's illness first made public.

30. A hard frost which lasted nearly two months, the Thames frozen over. On the Continent the winter was unusually severe. A new comet discovered at Paris.

Dec. 4. A report of the privy council, containing the examination of the king's physicians of the preceding day, laid before parliament.

9. Died, aged 74, JONATHAN SHIPLEY, bishop of St. Asaph; an eminent prelate, who singly distinguished himself among his episcopal brethren as the firm opponent of the American war.

QUESTION OF THE REGENCY.—The exercise of the royal power being interrupted by the king's illness, the leaders of the two great parties in the commons were divided on the mode of supplying the deficiency. On the 10th inst. Mr. Pitt moved for a committee to search for precedents: to this Mr. Fox decidedly objected, declaring that the heir-apparent, being of full age, had the same right to the exercise of the executive power as in the event of the king's death. But the minister pronounced this doctrine little short of treason to the constitution, and contended that the prince of Wales had no more claim to the regal functions than any other person; it devolving entirely on the two remaining branches of the legislature to supply the temporary chasm in the third estate. The question was agitated in the upper house, and lord Camden with great ability controverted the unconstitutional dogmas of Mr. Fox. Even the prince of Wales seemed to dissent from the part taken by his personal friends, and the duke of York in his name desired that "the question might be waved." Public opinion was with Mr. Pitt, and his popularity reached nearly the same height as at the commencement of his political career. Seconded, too, by a large majority, he was enabled, on the 16th inst., to carry the following declaratory resolutions:—1. "That the royal authority was interrupted;" 2. "That it was the duty of parliament to provide the means of supplying the defect." A violent debate ensued, but terminated in the minister's favour by 268 against 204. On the 23rd a third resolution was carried authorizing "the lord chancellor to affix the great seal to such a bill of limitations as might be necessary to restrict the power of the regent." An amendment was moved, to the effect of vesting the government unrestrictedly in the prince of Wales: it was negatived, as was a similar amendment moved by lord Rawdon in the upper house. Addresses were voted by the city of London and most corporations and counties, highly approving the conduct of ministers in this constitutional emergency.

17. The fortress of Oczakov, having been besieged and bravely defended by the Turks since July, was carried by assault by the Russians under prince Potemkin; the garrison, which originally amounted to 20,000 men, being put to the sword.

30. Mr. Pitt wrote a letter to the prince of Wales, informing him of the intention of ministers relative to the regency.

Charles III., king of Spain, died, and was succeeded by his son, Charles IV.

A great scarcity of water prevailed this year in Scotland.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—James Stuart, author of the Antiquities of Athens. Mrs. George Anne Bellamy, a once celebrated actress. Solomon Gesser, author of the Death of Abel. Count de Buffon, the celebrated French naturalist. Thomas Gainsborough, an eminent portrait and landscape painter. Percival Pott, F.R.S., an eminent surgeon. At Petersburg, admiral Greig, an English naval officer in the service of Russia, and who commanded their fleet in the late engagement with the Swedes.

GERMANY.—The emperor, at the instigation of Catherine of Russia, plunged into a disastrous war with the Turks. He opened the campaign on the Danube at the head of a grand army, but the advantages chiefly lay on the side of the enemy. In November an armistice was concluded, and he returned to his capital impaired in constitution and broken in spirits. The discontent of his Hungarian and Flemish subjects augmented his chagrin and disappointments. To the latter he had assured the enjoyment of their civil and religious rights, yet he forcibly attempted to alter their ecclesiastical government and control the universities. Influenced by a rich clergy, the people resisted; tumults arose, and much blood was shed. At Louvaine and at Antwerp the rectors and students were expelled at the point of the bayonet. Many respectable inhabitants quitted the country, and commerce and manufactures declined.

FRANCE.—The contest between political reform and despotism seemed hastening to a crisis. The course of the king was vacillating; it was marked by alternate attempts at coercion and concession; ministers were suddenly dismissed and recalled; parliaments were threatened, banished and imprisoned. That of Paris having remonstrated against the imprisonment of two of their members, the monarch told them "not to demand from his justice what solely depended on his will;" which elicited strong resolutions against lettres de cachet as inconsistent with personal security. New acts of authority were followed by fresh remonstrances, till at length the court determined to institute a supreme tribunal, called la cour plénière, which assumed the legislative functions of the parliaments, and reduced them to simple judicatories. It was protested against, several peers joining therein, and some of the parliamentarians were arrested, their place of meeting having been first surrounded by a regiment of guards. Meanwhile great disturbances prevailed in the provinces, and the military were called in to quell them. The finances were in extreme disorder and the government could only meet its engagements by a compulsory issue of paper. Public discontent was further aggravated by an enormous rise in the price of provisions, occasioned by the severity of the winter and the terrible hurricane of July that had destroyed the harvest and vintage. Alarmed by these gathering clouds, the court rescinded or suspended the execution of its arbitrary ordinances; a second convention of the Notables was summoned, and the great event of the assembling of the STATES GENERAL for the ensuing year resolved upon.

1789. Jan. 1. Died, Fletcher Norton, lord Grantley, formerly speaker of the house of commons. Next day the speaker, Mr. Cornwall, died, and was succeeded by Mr. William Grenville.

14. A thaw, after an intense frost of upwards of seven weeks.

26. The diet of Stockholm opened by the king in a long and eloquent speech. Finding the nobles opposed to him, but the other three orders in his favour, he imprisoned the chief of them and made himself absolute.

The quackery of animal magnetism introduced into England from France.

Feb. 3. REGENCY BILL.—This measure was introduced by Mr. Pitt, agreeably to the resolutions already mentioned (Dec. 10); but while its clauses were under discussion the king was announced (19th inst.) to be convalescent. Its limitations seem to have been well contrived for keeping the regent subordinate to the ministry. The queen was to have the custody of the royal person and the appointment to places in the household. As regent, the prince of Wales had no power to grant any office, reversion or pension except during the king's pleasure; and the grant of the peerage was interdicted. The Irish parliament was disposed to invest the prince with the unrestricted sovereignty, and addresses were voted on the 11th inst. by both houses to this effect; but his majesty's recovery averted any difficulties that might have arisen from a collision between the legislatures of the two kingdoms. The king's approbation of the proceedings of Mr. Pitt soon became manifest, by the dismissal of those holding removable offices who had opposed him: among them the duke of Queensberry, the marquis of Lothian, and lords Carteret and Malmesbury.

Mar. 10. A splendid illumination of the metropolis celebrates the king's recovery.

The remains of Edward IV. discovered in St. George's chapel; they were found in a leaden and wooden coffin reduced to a skeleton.

A woman, for coining, was first strangled by the stool being taken from under her, and then fixed to a stake and burnt before the debtors' door at Newgate. (Ann. Reg., xxxi. 203.) An act passed the following year (30 Geo. III., c. 48) for changing the barbarous punishment of women in high and petty treason.

Apr. 7. Died, Achmet IV., one of the most enlightened of the Turkish rulers. He was succeeded by his nephew Selim, whose first act of power was the execution of the grand vizier, on the pretext that his misconduct had lost Oczakov.

13. Mr. Bacon's famous bronze cast, personifying the Thames, erected in the quadrangle of Somerset-house.

23. A public thanksgiving for the king's recovery: his majesty went in grand procession to St. Paul's, where the interest of the scene was heightened by the presence of 6000 charity children. Next night there was a joyous illumination.

28. MUTINY OF THE BOUNTY.—A mutiny broke out on board the Bounty, capt. Bligh, which sailed in the autumn of 1787 to the Society Islands, for bread-fruit trees to plant in the West Indies: she had obtained the object of her voyage, and was returning when the officer of the watch, assisted by part of the crew, dragged the captain on deck, and committed him and eighteen others to the boat, with only 140lbs. of bread, 30lbs. of meat, one gallon and a half of rum and a like portion of wine; after having been 46 days, and traversing nearly 4000 miles in an open boat, they reached Timor, and from thence procured a vessel for Batavia. The mutineers, it was subsequently ascertained, directed their course to one of the beautiful islands in the Pacific, destroyed the ship to remove all trace of their existence, and settled among the natives. An interesting account has been since given to the public (Quarterly Review, xiii. 374.) of their habits, mode of life, and the deaths of the whole party except one. Badness of the ship's provisions was the alleged cause of the mutiny, and some slight received from the captain by Christian, the ringleader.

May 2. Alderman Boydell's Shakspeare Gallery opened.

5. MEETING OF THE STATES GENERAL.

—The king opened this memorable assembly at Versailles with a patriotic speech, and was followed by M. Necker with details of the state of the national finances. The first business was the verification of the representative powers of the members. This the Tiers Etat insisted could only take place in a common assembly of the three estates, voting not by orders but by poll. Upon this important point turned the ascendancy of the democracy or aristocracy, since the numbers of the third estate equalled that of the other two conjoined, and they might expect adherents from both. The nobles were resolute, and formed their separate house; the clergy wavered: after six weeks of inaction the Tiers Etat, at the suggestion of the Abbé Sieyès, took the bold step (June 17th) of declaring themselves the legislature, by the title of the NATIONAL ASSEMBLY. Two days after they were joined by a majority of the clergy, headed by the archbishop of Vienne. Alarmed by this defection, the king held a royal session, annulled the declaration of the 17th, propounded a new constitution, and commanded the deputies of the people immediately to separate. This was the decisive moment. When the king retired he was followed by all the nobles and part of the clergy; the commons remained. On this the grand-master of the ceremonies, addressing himself to the president, M. Bailly, said, "Sir, you know the orders of the king." To which the president replied, "The people of France in their collective capacity have no orders to receive:" and the energetic Mirabeau starting up, added, "Go, tell your master we are here by the power of the people, and that nothing shall expel us but the bayonet."—At the next sitting they were joined by the clergy and 49 nobles, headed by the duke of Orleans; and on the 27th, at the express desire of the king, by the remainder of the privileged orders. The absorption of the three estates in one was an error the court vainly tried to retrieve.

8. Mr. Beauzou renewed his motion of 1787 for the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts. It was supported and opposed by the same parties. Mr. Fox expressed his attachment to the church, but laid it down as a primary axiom of policy, "that no human government had jurisdiction over opinions as such, and more particularly over religious opinions." Mr. Pitt and lord North repeated "the pompous nothings" of the former session, and the motion was rejected by 122 to 102.

22. Two of the Tower magistrates were fined 100*l.* each for discharging Charles Bannister and Palmer, who had been committed as vagrants for acting plays, without a license, at the Royalty.

26. Duel between the duke of York and colonel Lenox, at Wimbledon.

June 1. A monument 107 feet high erected at Kelbearn to the memory of Buchanan, the Scottish historian.

9. Mr. Addington elected speaker in the room of Mr. Grenville, appointed one of the secretaries of state.

10. A vessel launched at Deptford made of copper.

18. King's theatre in the Haymarket burnt. Next day the theatre royal at Manchester was burnt down.

July 2. The corn-factors waited on Mr. Pitt to state how far the application of France for 20,000 sacks of flour might be safely complied with. They were clearly of opinion it could not, though the demand did not exceed one week's consumption of the metropolis. A similar application from Holland was also refused.

6. A man for a wager walked 100 miles on Blackheath, in a circle of one mile, in twenty-two hours and a-half.

11. The publisher of the "Times" newspaper tried and convicted of two libels, reflecting on the characters of the dukes of York, Gloucester, and Cumberland, stating them to be "insincere" in their professions of joy at the king's recovery.

M. Necker suddenly dismissed, and ordered to leave the kingdom in 24 hours. The national assembly, conceiving his dismissal to be the prelude to designs inimical to the new order of things, passed a resolution that the exiled minister carried with him the confidence of the nation.

13. Died, aged 64, the marquis de Mirabeau, a warm advocate of Quesnay's sect of political economists; and author of the "Ami des Hommes." He was father of the celebrated count Mirabeau, the fiery orator of the national assembly.

14. CAPTURE OF THE BASTILE.—A popular insurrection in Paris. The Bastile, a state prison of almost impregnable strength, enthusiastically stormed by the citizens, aided by some of the military. The lives lost by the assailants were revenged by the massacre of the governor, and some others, whose heads were carried about the streets upon poles, and the sanguinary spirit thence imbibed which characterized the revolutionary period. That dangerous symptom of fallen authority, the attachment of the soldiery to the popular cause, alarming the court, orders were immediately issued for the removal of the troops assembled in the vicinity of the capital, and the recall of Necker.

16. La Fayette appointed commander of the national guards of Paris.

22. The count d'Artois, marshal Broglio, the princes of Condé, and other leaders of the court faction, alarmed at popular excesses, retired to Coblenz.

Aug. 4. Feudal privileges and tithes abolished by the national assembly.

16. A famine at Paris.

20. DECLARATION OF RIGHTS.—The national assembly issued the following declaration of rights as the basis of their new constitution. Some of its positions are of questionable soundness; but, on the whole, this first essay at the promulgation of a national primer evinced, amidst the storms in which it was concocted, extraordinary ability, and is valuable as a summary of the ideas on morals, laws, and government, held by the chief actors in the first stage of the Revolution:—1. Men were born, and always continue free and equal with respect to their rights. Civil distinctions, therefore, can be founded only on public utility. 2. The end of all political associations is the preservation of the natural and imprescriptible rights of man; and these rights are liberty, property, security, and resistance to oppression. 3. The nation is essentially the source of all sovereignty. 4. Political liberty consists in doing whatever does not injure another. 5. The law ought only to prohibit actions hurtful to society. 6. The law is an expression of the will of the community. All ought to concur personally, or by representation, in its formation. All being equal in its sight, are equally eligible to offices and honours, according to their virtues and talents. 7. No man should be accused, arrested, or imprisoned, except as determined by the law. 8. No one ought to be punished except in virtue of a law previously promulgated. 9. Every man to be presumed innocent till conviction of guilt. 10. No man ought to be molested on account of his opinions—not even his religious ones—provided his avowal of them does not disturb the public peace. 11. Every man may freely speak, write, and publish his opinions, being responsible for the abuse of this liberty in cases determined by the law. 12. A public force can only be maintained for the public benefit. 13. Public contributions ought to be proportioned to the means of individuals. 14. Every citizen, by himself or representative, has a right to determine the amount and appropriation of public contributions. 15. Public servants are responsible for their conduct. 16. Every community, in which a separation of powers and a security of rights are not provided for, wants a constitution. 17. The right to property being inviolable and sacred, no one ought to be deprived of it, except in cases of evident public necessity, legally ascertained, and on condition of a previous just indemnity.

Sept. 5. The Carron foundry, in Scotland, consumes 11,000 tons of coals per week, at 4s. per ton; and the consumption of each day is equal to that of the city of Edinburgh during a whole week. As many coals therefore are consumed in these works as would suffice a city of 700,000 inhabitants. One thousand workmen are employed, whose wages amount to 700*l.* a week.

28. Died, the ingenious but eccentric Thomas Day, the author of "Sandford and Merton." He adopted two foundling girls, with a view of training them agreeably to some of the educational reveries of Rousseau; but they disappointed his expectations, though they turned out deserving women. Mr. Day was the untimely victim of his benevolent notions, being killed by a fall from a young horse, which he would not allow to be broken in the usual manner.

Oct. 6. A scarcity of bread at Paris inflamed the fury of the populace, who proceeded to Versailles, where they made an attack by night on the palace. Amidst the confusion, the royal family were brought, in great danger of their lives, to Paris, and were followed by the national assembly.

21. The duke of Orleans arrived in London, having been got out of the way at the instance of La Fayette, to stop the mischievous part he was acting in the Revolution.

Nov. Early this month the national assembly effected a complete revolution in their polity, laws, and government. Lettres de cachet and the distinction of orders were abolished. The local divisions of provinces were abrogated by dividing France into 83 departments, which were subdivided into districts and cantons. A scheme of representation was introduced, founded upon combined ratios of population, territory, and taxation. Monastic institutions were suppressed, and the ancient provincial parliaments superseded by new courts of justice with trial by jury.

5. At a meeting of the Revolution Society, earl Stanhope in the chair, it was resolved that a congratulatory address should be presented to the national assembly of France on the regeneration of their country. This was a whig association, instituted to celebrate the birth-day of William III. Prior to the assembling of the members at the usual place of festivity, Dr. Price delivered an eloquent discourse at the Dissenters' chapel in the Old Jewry, on the "Love of our Country," in which he expatiated in an animated strain on passing events, and indulged in sanguine aspirations on the future happiness and liberties of mankind.

19. The Severn and Thames united by the Stroud canal, through the vale of Chalford, to the height of 343 feet, by 28 locks.

23. The publisher of the "Times" (one

July 11) sentenced to pay a fine of 50*l.*, be imprisoned twelve months in Newgate, to stand in the pillory at Charing-cross, and find security for good behaviour for seven years.

27. The national assembly ejected from their benefices the refractory priests.

30. The Flemings finding they had no alternative between implicit submission to the arbitrary innovations of the emperor, and resistance, boldly took the latter part, declaring themselves independent of Austria.

Dec. 1. Dr. Herschel discovered a seventh satellite moving round Saturn, nearer to his body than any of the rest.

7. The north wing of Houghton-hall, with many valuable paintings, burnt.

8. The printer of the "Morning Herald" convicted of a libel on the house of commons.

MONSTROSITY.—Mr. Everard Home records a singular case (Philosophical Transactions, lxxxii., pt. 2) of a child born with two heads. The body was naturally formed, but the head appeared double; there being, besides the proper head of the child, another of the same size, and, to appearance, almost equally perfect, attached to its upper part. This upper head was inverted, so that they seemed to be two separate heads united together by a firm adhesion between their crowns, but without any indentation at their union, there being a smooth continued surface from one to the other. It lived nearly three years.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—Joseph Baretti, a scholar, and friend of Dr. Johnson. At Paris, by suicide, M. Lamoignon, late keeper of the seals, and zealous reformer of the criminal law. John Elwes, M.P., the noted miser. Mrs. Brooke, author of "Emily Montagu." Earl Cowper, prince of the German empire. Duchess of Albany, natural daughter to the late pretender: she was the last direct descendant (if a natural child can be so called), except cardinal York, of the Stuart family.

1790. Jan. FRENCH REVOLUTION.—This extraordinary movement had now assumed an aspect that astonished adjoining states. In six months all that previously existed in France had been subverted. Monarchy, nobility, the church, corporations, laws, judicial establishments, and local boundaries had fallen in rapid succession beneath the sweeping scythe of the national assembly; and what new forms of order might arise, it was premature to discern. In general, the commencement of the Revolution had been viewed with approbation by the people of England, as a laudable effort of popular energy to abate the enormous evils of an old and oppressive despotism; but its destroying and sanguinary course speedily converted many of its warmest partisans into determined foes. This, however, was subsequent to the meeting of parliament, prior to which it does not appear there was any public expression of dissatisfaction or alarm. Several of the reform societies sent letters of congratulation to the French leaders, and opened a correspondence with them. The example of France was even so far imitated, that clubs were formed in many of the most considerable towns, with the avowed purpose of obtaining political reformation by other means than those which the constitution pointed out as legitimate.

1. The annual ode of the laureate, usually performed at court on New Year's Day, discontinued.

The states of the Austrian Netherlands entered into an offensive and defensive union, distinguished by the title of the United Belgic States.

20. DEATH OF JOHN HOWARD.—This celebrated philanthropist breathed his last, in the 63rd year of his age, at Cherson, a remote settlement of Russia, on the Black Sea. His death was occasioned by discharging an act of humanity, in visiting a patient afflicted with a contagious fever. He was the genius of active benevolence, and hovered throughout Europe. Edmund Burke's well-known eulogium on his prison labours, addressed to the electors of Bristol, cannot be surpassed. Mr. Howard's decease was announced in the "London Gazette," an unprecedented honour.

21. Parliament opened by the king, without special allusion to French affairs. The sentiments of the court, however, were apparent from the speech of lord Valletort, who moved the address, and stigmatized them in no measured terms. As his majesty went to the house, a half-pay lieutenant, found to be insane, threw a stone into his carriage.

28. The Jews admitted to the rights of French citizenship.

Feb. 3. Mr. Walter brought from Newgate, and sentenced to pay a fine of 100*l.* for a libel in the "Times" newspaper on the prince of Wales; and the like sum for a libel on the duke of Clarence.

9. Mr. Burke supported a reduction in the peace establishment. "France," said the orator, "has hitherto been our first object in all considerations concerning the balance of power. But France is in a political light to be considered as expunged out of the system of Europe. Whether she could ever appear in it again, as a leading power, was not easy to determine; but at present he considered France as not politically existing, and most assuredly it would take much time to restore her to her former active existence." He then contrasted the different characters of the French and the English Revolutions, and denounced the "most declaration of rights." Mr. Fox respectfully dissented, and said, "in 1688 we had only a constitution to preserve; whereas the French had one to create." Mr. Sheridan followed in less measured terms, and tried to extenuate popular excesses on the ground of long-standing abuse and oppression. Mr. Pitt observed a politic silence, only complimenting Mr. Burke on his zeal in defence of the constitution. These differences, however, soon spread beyond parliament, and the nation became divided into acrimonious parties.

10. The celebrated Philidor played three games of chess, blindfolded, with three different persons at once. He gained the two he played with Dr. Roget and Mr. Smith, and the third, with count Bruhl, was a drawn game. The moves were made for him as he directed.

13. Monastic establishments suppressed in France to the number of 4500, and their revenues confiscated; allowing, however, the friars and nuns to continue in the observance of their monastic vows, granting them pensions for their support, and allowing the nuns to reside during pleasure in the convents.

16. TRIAL OF HASTINGS.—The charge respecting presents was recapitulated; but the court sat only thirteen days during the session. Public enthusiasm had abated, and many began to sympathise with the accused, who seemed destined to live a life of impeachment. Only three articles of the general charge, out of twenty-two, were yet closed; so that all parties were likely to be dead before the trial reached its legal termination. The real merits of the case were lost in the immensity of detail. "Westminster-hall," Mr. Belsham observes, "was converted into a lyceum: a school of eloquence; and all was seen confused and magnified through the mists of rhetorical declamation." If Mr. Hastings were clearly guilty, so much circumlocution and amplification were needless to prove it. This became the general feeling; and towards the close of the session a resolution moved by Mr. Burke passed, "That the house do authorise the managers to insist only upon such and so many charges as may appear to them conducive to the obtaining speedy and effectual justice." Complaint having been made of a publication in a newspaper, by major Scott, grossly reflecting on the conduct of the managers, after considerable debate, the major was ordered to be reprimanded by the speaker.

18. Died, in his 49th year, JOSEPH II., emperor of Germany, an unsuccessful, because intemperate, reformer, who proceeded without due regard to the habits and prejudices of his subjects. He was succeeded by his brother Leopold, grand duke of Tuscany, who immediately tried to bring back the government of the Netherlands, in which enterprise he succeeded by promising to govern them according to their ancient charters and institutions.

25. The common-council of London resolved, by a large majority, to oppose the repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts.

Mar. 2. Mr. Fox moved for the repeal of the Test Acts, but the house was more opposed to repeal than on the two former occasions, when brought forward by Mr. Beaufoy, a partisan of the minister. The majority against repeal had now swelled to 189, in place of 20. Societies had been formed, and an alarm got up that the CHURCH was in DANGER.

4. FLOOD'S MOTION.—At the same inauspicious period, Mr. Flood moved for a bill to amend the representation in parliament. The plan proposed for this purpose was the addition of 100 members, to be elected by the resident householders in every county. It was opposed by Mr. Windham, the eccentric member for Norwich. The question, he said, had subsided since the American war, and "who would be mad enough to advise them to repair their house in the hurricane season?" Mr. Pitt assented to this reasoning, but assured the house that he would again introduce the subject at "a more seasonable opportunity." Motion withdrawn.

20. In digging for a wet dock at Blackwall, after passing several strata of sand, clay, &c., hazel-trees, with nuts upon them, were found.

Game laws abolished in France.

31. Mr. Dundas brought forward in the commons the India budget, exhibiting a great improvement in the affairs and revenues of the Company under the present administration of the marquis Cornwallis.

A grant passed the great seal to earl Stanhope for his new-invented method of conducting vessels without sails, against wind, waves, current, and tide.

Apr. 14. William Pulteney, esq., instituted a professorship of agriculture in the university of Edinburgh; Dr. Coventry the first professor.

15. In bringing forward the budget, Mr. Pitt expatiated on the prosperous state of the kingdom and the national finances, which he mainly ascribed to the excellency of the constitution. The produce of the consolidated fund had increased half a million over the average of the three preceding years.

17. DEATH OF DR. FRANKLIN.—This celebrated philosopher and statesman closed his eventful and useful life in the 85th year of his age, having some time previously retired from public business in consequence of increasing infirmities. The estimation in which Dr. Franklin was held is shewn by his being honoured by a public burning in France and America. Next to Washington, he contributed most essentially to establish, first, the independence, and next, the internal peace and quiet government of his country. In the practical wisdom that adapts means to ends, he was perhaps never surpassed. He was attentive to his own interests, but was always ready to render to others offices of kindness and humanity. The prudential virtues of industry, frugality, perseverance, foresight, order, and uprightness, had conducted him to eminence: what had profited himself, he inculcated. He was the appropriate teacher of a rising community; a saving of time and a saving of money; patience, economy, and abstinence from vain and uncertain pursuits, forming the stamina of his ethical monitions.

18. Assignate first issued by the French.

May 5. A hot press on the Thames.

6. AFFAIR OF NOOTKA SOUND.—A message from the king informed the commons of a misunderstanding with Spain. It originated in the establishment by an English trader of a small settlement for the purpose of carrying on the fur trade at Nootka Sound, on the north-west coast of America, the liberty for which he had purchased from the Indian chief of the district. In 1789, two English vessels were seized by the commander of a Spanish frigate, who made the crews prisoners, took possession of the lands on which the buildings for a settlement were erected, pulling down the British flag and hoisting the Spanish, declaring that all the lands comprised between Cape Horn and the 60th degree of north latitude, belonged to his catholic majesty. Negotiations respecting this affair had been carried on between the two courts, which had not produced an accommodation, and the royal message expressed a determination to support English interests. An address in accordance with this resolution was unanimously voted, which was followed by a vote of credit for a million. Vigorous preparations were made for war on both sides; but Spain finding she could expect no co-operation from France, and unwilling to engage singly in a contest with Britain, the dispute was adjusted by a convention, in which Spain agreed to restore the settlement at Nootka, with reparation for the injury inflicted; and also to a free navigation and fishery in the Pacific Ocean by British subjects, stipulating only, to guard against smuggling, that they should not approach within ten leagues of any part of the coast already occupied by Spain. During the summer, hostilities were generally anticipated from this affair, and the country incurred an expenditure of three millions in warlike preparations.

June 12. Parliament dissolved by proclamation.

16. Mr. Horne Tooke nominates himself as a third candidate for Westminster. At the close of the poll (July 2) the numbers were, C. J. Fox, 3516; lord Hood, 3217; J. H. Tooke, 1697. Mr. Tooke made a patriotic speech, in which he complimented the independent electors who had supported him.

19. Hereditary nobility abolished in France; likewise all titles, blazonry, coats of arms, and liveries: in short, all memorials of heraldry and ancestry.

22. The heat of the weather intense; the thermometer rose to 80°. Several storms of thunder and lightning, which did considerable damage.

24. Aldermen Curtis, Watson, Lewes, and Sawbridge returned for the city of London.

29. John Wilkes, esq., having met with an unfavourable reception from the freeholders, declined again offering himself for Middlesex; and Messrs. Mainwaring and Byng were elected.

July 8. Renwick Williams, called the monster, convicted of cutting the garments of Miss Porter. Being a new crime, judge Buller reserved his case for the opinion of the judges, whether it was a felony or misdemeanor only. The fellow was a dancing-master, and had been a dangerous nuisance in the metropolis. His practice was to follow well-dressed ladies in the streets, who were unprotected, cut their clothes, and often wound their persons.

In a peat-bog at Donnades, 17 feet below the surface, was found the skeleton of an Irish chief, 8 feet 2½ inches in length, with a spear 7 feet long by the side of it; but the handle mouldered away on exposure to the air. There were besides in the coffin two small urns of brass, on which were engraved figures of the sun and moon, of exquisite workmanship, though very antique. —Ann. Reg., xxxii., 210.

14. ANNIVERSARY OF THE REVOLUTION.

—The taking of the Bastille was celebrated throughout France, especially in Paris, with great solemnity, in the Champ de Mars. The king, for whom a throne had been erected, took a solemn oath to maintain the constitution. The national assembly and the armed citizens repeated it, which was taken on the same day throughout the entire kingdom. In England also, the occasion was commemorated. Upwards of 600 persons dined at the Crown and Anchor tavern to celebrate the 14th of July; lord Stanhope in the chair.

17. DEATH OF ADAM SMITH.—This well-known author had been rector of the university of Glasgow, and held the office of commissioner of customs in Scotland at the time of his death, in the 67th year of his age. The fame of Dr. Smith's "Theory of Moral Sentiments" has been eclipsed by that of his more celebrated production, "An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations," the importance of which has been constantly increasing with the increasing opulence and commerce of the country. Its great merit at the time of publication consisted in a masterly exposition of principles hitherto imperfectly defined; in showing their practical operation and dependence; and in their elucidation by striking facts and observations; all in a style of great clearness and aptitude. The ground had been partially explored before by Vanderlint (Dugald Stewart's Biog. Memoirs, 134), sir James Stewart, and the French economists, but not so scientifically. Smith exhausted his subject so far as relates to the accumulation of national wealth: its distribution and influence on public happiness; the co-equality of population with subsistence, the nature of rent, and the representative medium of exchange, were the points he left imperfectly investigated.

26. The Forth and Clyde navigation, from sea to sea, opened. The junction between the Coventry and Birmingham canals effected, by which boats pass twice a week between London and Birmingham.

Aug. 28. Powell, the pedestrian, arrived at the Monument, having performed the journey from London to York and back in five days, 16 hours, and ten minutes. It was the third time he had executed this walking tour.

Sept. 9. M. Necker resigned. His popularity had declined in consequence of entertaining opinions too moderate for the period, and Mirabeau's intrigues against him.

17. Barrington, the pickpocket, convicted of stealing a watch at Enfield races. He made a clever defence; and on receiving sentence, apologised for his evil practices by alleging that he had not met the encouragement in life due to his abilities. He was in his 32nd year, and had a narrow escape from justice before.

18. Died, in his 45th year, Henry Frederick, duke of Cumberland, brother to the king. He married Mrs. Horton, by whom he had no issue; and the match, which was considered degrading, gave rise to the Royal Marriage Act (ante 487).

Oct. 31. Riot among the frame-work knitters at Nottingham. Military called in, and 40 of the rioters seized.

Nov. 20. New dock, Blackwall, opened.

24. Died, in his 73rd year, ROBERT HENRY, LL.D., a Scottish clergyman, and author of a valuable "History of Great Britain to the Accession of Edward VI.," distinguished by a lucid style, accuracy of research, and a classified arrangement of subjects. Though at first opposed, it soon became popular and profitable to the author, obtaining for him a pension of 100*l.* a year, and net gain of 3,300*l.*—Life prefixed to Hist. Gr. Britain, i., 17.

26. MEETING OF THE NEW PARLIAMENT.

—Mr. Addington was unanimously re-chosen speaker. In the opening speech no allusion was made to France. Before the recess an important question was mooted; namely, Whether an impeachment by the commons did not remain in status quo, notwithstanding the intervention of a dissolution of parliament? And Mr. Burke moving (Dec. 17) that the impeachment was still pending, it was carried without a division, being ably supported by the speaker, though opposed by the entire legal phalanx, including Erskine, Mitford, Hardinge, and sir John Scott.

Lord Kenyon decided this term that the keeper of a livery-stable cannot detain a horse for his keep, though an innkeeper can.

Dec. 10. A convention signed between the English, Austrian, Prussian, and Dutch ministers, relative to the affairs of the Low Countries.

22. Ismael stormed by general Suvarof, with horrible slaughter of its Turkish defenders and inhabitants.

Galvani, of Italy, discovered the crural nerve of a frog to be convulsed when touched with a wet knife: hence galvanism.

STATE OF PARTIES.—The novel doctrines promulgated by the French Revolution gave great animation to political controversy. During the summer, Mr. Burke published his celebrated "Reflections on the French Revolution;" of which the object was to discredit that great change, and the principles which led to it, not without severe strictures on English societies and meetings by which it was patronized. His work caused a great sensation, drawing from one party, of which he was now deemed the champion, unbounded praise, while from the other it produced heated and angry replies. In this literary warfare his most conspicuous opponent was Thomas Paine, a writer who had distinguished himself in the American war by a pamphlet styled "Common Sense," which was very efficacious in persuading the Americans to make their declaration of independence. His present production, the "Rights of Man," though inferior to Burke's, as a literary composition, was so well adapted to common feeling and comprehension; that it greatly contributed to the diffusion of republican principles and the spirit of reform throughout the kingdom.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—William Cullen, M.D., a celebrated physician, and author of medical works. Anthony Addington, M.D., father of the speaker of the house of commons. Rev. Martin Madan, aged 84, author of "Thelyphthora." In the isle of Skye, Flora Macdonald, the famed adherent of the pretender. George Elliot, lord Heathfield, the able defender of Gibraltar. At Oxford, Thomas Warton, poet laureate, annotator and biographer. Major-general Roy, an eminent engineer and military surveyor. Marshal Laudohn, a distinguished Austrian general in the seven years' war. Philip Yorke, earl of Hardwicke, known for his "Athenian Letters," and the publication of the correspondence of sir Dudley Carleton, ambassador to Holland in the reign of James I.

1791, Jan. 1. A solemn Te Deum sung at Brussels to celebrate the triumph of marshal Bender, in again reducing the Flemings to the Austrian yoke.

17. Lord Dungarvon tried at the Old Bailey for stealing three guineas and a hat from a woman of the town. His lordship was honourably acquitted.

22. The king of France communicated to the national assembly a letter from the emperor of Germany, requiring that the decree of August 4th, of last year, for the abolition of feudal rights, be annulled as respects Alsace and Lorraine.

25. Died, in his 72nd year, of dysury, George Selwyn, a celebrated wit and bon vivant, and formerly M.P. for Gloucester. Mr. Selwyn took care not to be ruined by his lively sallies (as others have been), enjoying the otium cum dignitate in some valuable sinecures. He left off gaming except for small sums, being, as he said, "one of the greatest consumers of time, fortune, constitution, and thinking."

Feb. 21. A measure was introduced by ministers for the further relief of Roman catholics. It was objected to by Mr. Fox solely on the ground that it did not go far enough. "Let the statute-book," said he, "be revised, and every iniquitous law expunged which attaches penalties to mere opinion." With these sentiments Mr. Burke and Mr. Pitt coincided, though the latter deemed it inexpedient to act upon them.

Capt. Perry, printer of "The Argus," found guilty of a libel in charging government with withholding intelligence relative to the late dispute with Spain, for stockjobbing purposes.

Mar. 1. At the annual masquerade at the Rutland-square rooms, Dublin, the police attended with muskets and bayonets; a riot ensued, they were overpowered by the multitude, several of them killed, and the greater part severely wounded.

Dudley Ryder and Thomas Steele, esqrs., appointed paymasters-general of the forces.

2. DEATH OF JOHN WESLEY.—This remarkable man was in his eighty-eighth year and sixty-fifth of his ministry. His labours in writing, preaching, and travelling had been immense. When he commenced his Itinerary, there were no turnpikes nor stage-coaches further than York: he rode 100,000 miles on horseback, generally preaching two sermons every day, frequently four or five, all which he accomplished by early rising and punctuality. His great mental characteristics were energy, subtlety and ambition. His aims were benevolent, and methodism benefited the ignorant, but not, Mr. Southey thinks (Life of Wesley, ii. 539), the educated classes. It narrowed their views and feelings; burthened them with forms; restricted them from recreations which keep the mind in health; discouraged accomplishments that adorn life; separated them from general society; and substituted the desponding and precarious impulses of enthusiasm for the cheering and steady light of Church of Englandism.

3. In France, the silver plate of the churches is sent to the mint.

4. CANADA BILL.—Mr. Pitt brought forward a comprehensive measure for the future government of Canada. By the proposed regulations the province was divided into two distinct governments, designated Upper and Lower Canada. Councils, nominated by the king, and houses of assembly chosen by the people, were established in each. The Habeas Corpus Act became a fundamental law of the new constitution, and the British parliament abandoned all right of imposing any taxes except such as might be needful for the regulation of trade. To guard, however, against the perversion of this power, the produce of even those taxes was to be entirely at the disposal of the provincial legislatures. It became a law, and was only objected to by Mr. Fox on the ground that it unnecessarily introduced into a new country some of the anomalies of the old, in respect of hereditary honours and representation.

9. The remains of Mr. Wesley, after lying in his Tabernacle in state, dressed in the gown, cassock and band, which he usually wore, and on his head the old clerical cap, the Bible in one hand and a white handkerchief in the other, were, agreeably to his own directions, in the manner of the interment of the late Mr. Whitefield, deposited near his chapel at the Foundry, Moorfields.

Mr. Walter, the proprietor of the Times, after an imprisonment of sixteen months, was liberated, having received the king's pardon at the instance of the prince of Wales.

AFFAIR OF OZAKOV.—A message was delivered from the king on the 9th inst., importing that his efforts to effect a pacification between Russia and Turkey having proved ineffectual, he had thought it requisite, in order to add weight to his representations, to augment his naval forces. Mr. Pitt, in moving a corresponding address, argued that it was necessary to check the growth of Russia, which was becoming dangerous to the political system of Europe. Fox, Burke, and Grey joined in opposing the minister, contending that the point in dispute between the belligerents was only the possession of Ozakov, an object too insignificant to justify our armed interference. The address, however, was carried by a majority of 93. In the lords, earl Fitzwilliam and others deprecated a war with Russia, and it becoming manifestly unpopular in the nation the minister thought fit to desist, after a very useless expense in hostile armaments.

Apr. 2. DEATH OF MIRABEAU.—This celebrated orator of the Constituent Assembly was in his 43rd year, and the eldest son of the author of the "Ami des Hommes." He had been alternately the object of the idolatry and execration of the Parisians, accordingly as he had oscillated between the royalist and popular parties. It was thought (vainly perhaps) had he lived he might have been able to guide the course of the revolution, and his death was deemed a public loss; but in the following year, when it was discovered that he had been in treaty with the court, his remains were ignominiously removed from the Pantheon. Dying prematurely it is likely his powers have been over-estimated. M. Dumont, who well knew him, says, "what he possessed beyond other men was an eloquent and impassioned soul." (Recollections of Count Mirabeau, 222). His literary acquirements were superficial: he was licentious; more a man of action than conception, and possessed a ready tact in availing himself of the ideas of others, which he embodied with theatrical and sometimes electric effect. According to the authority just quoted, he was an "aristocrat in principle, but a democrat by calculation."

18. Mr. Willerforce renews his motion for the abolition of the slave trade.

The king of France stopped by the populace, and compelled to return to the Tuileries, under an apprehension that he intended to emigrate for the purpose of effecting a counter revolution.

19. Died, in his 68th year, RICHARD PRICE, LL.D., a dissenting minister, and eminent writer on statistics, politics and theology. Dr. Price suggested to Mr. Pitt his scheme of a sinking fund, and received the thanks of the corporation of London for his opposition to the American war.

He was an amiable and able man, of an enthusiastic temperament; a fact as deducible from his delusive calculations of the national effects of compound interest, as from other matters more excitable.

21. La Fayette resigns the command of the national guards.

May 3. A revolution in Poland, effected by king Stanislaus and the diet, on the basis of a constitutional monarchy with three estates, equality of rights and toleration of all religions.

4. The pope burnt in effigy at Paris, by the populace.

6. In the discussion on the Canada Bill, a warm altercation ensued between Mr. Fox and Mr. Burke, relative to the principles of the French revolution, which produced on the part of the latter a renunciation of the friendship that had long united them; a determination which moved Mr. Fox to tears, but in which the other persisted to his death. From this time Mr. Burke left the opposition side of the house.

12. A bill brought into the commons, and afterwards passed, for the establishment of a colony at Sierra Leone, for the culture of sugar and other tropical products by free negroes.

14. Advice from the East Indies, dated Jan. 9th, that general Abercrombie had forced a detachment of the troops of Tip-poo Saib to surrender prisoners; and that he had taken the forts of Cannamore, Bili-apatam, and Nuracarrow, with 34 stand of colours, 68 pieces of cannon, and 5000 stand of arms.

15. Lord Cornwallis defeated Tippoo, and drove him and his whole army under the walls of Seringapatam.

19. The National Assembly decreed that none of their members shall be re-elected. Altered next day to two years after their dissolution.

20. Mr. Fox introduced his Libel Bill, for giving to juries the same powers in the trial of libels as in other criminal trials. It was generally approved, but postponed till next session.

26. After a litigation of eight years, the claimants on the goods seized by lord Rodney and general Vaughan, at St. Eustatius, in 1782, were paid the full amount of their several claims, by a decision of the privy council.

27. Lord Kenyon decided that the half-pay of an officer is not assignable.

30. The long impeachment against Mr. Hastings closed by the managers.

31. Punishment by the wheel abolished in France.

June 2. The peers being seated in Westminster Hall, Mr. Hastings, from a written paper, gave brief and clear answers to the charges. The gist of his defence was, that his conduct had been highly conducive to the prosperity of the Indian empire; for which, he said, they had rewarded him with "confiscation, disgrace, and a life of impeachment." Trial adjourned to next session.

8. Mr. Dundas appointed secretary of state, in the room of the duke of Leeds, resigned.

10. Parliamentary session closed.

17. Died, at her house in Spa-fields, in her 84th year, Selina countess dowager of Huntingdon, celebrated for her evangelical principles; a large proportion of her fortune was applied to the support and maintenance of 64 chapels, which she had established throughout Britain. She was sister of earl Ferrers, the unhappy nobleman recorded p. 453.

20. ESCAPE OF THE FRENCH KING.—In the night, the king of France and the royal family privately withdrew from the Tuileries, through a subterraneous passage leading to the Seine. His majesty left behind a paper, in which he formally revoked all his past oaths and declarations as the effect of compulsion. On the discovery of his flight the royal arms and effigies were taken down and broken by the populace. A proclamation, however, of the national assembly restored order; and a provisional executive council was appointed. Scarcely had the first emotions of surprise and indignation subsided, when it was announced that the king and queen had been arrested on the 22nd inst., at Varennes; whence they were quickly brought back to Paris. This adventure had the unhappy consequence of destroying all confidence between the king and the constituted authorities.

Died on the 20th inst., the celebrated Mrs. MACAULEY or GRAHAM (the name of her second husband) author of a republican history of England. She was a lady of a masculine mind, and ardently attached to the principles of civil liberty.

14. BIRMINGHAM RIOTS.—The second anniversary of the French revolution was celebrated by public dinners and other rejoicings; not, however, without much opposition from the adherents of ministers, who circulated alarming reports. At Birmingham these reports had the effect of assembling a misguided mob, who assailed the hotel where about 90 gentlemen had met to dine with furious shouts of "Church and King." The company dispersed at five o'clock, when the windows were demolished by the populace, who immediately after proceeded to destroy the property and houses of obnoxious individuals; few or none of whom had been at the festival. Among them Dr. Priestley's and his valuable library; the houses of Messrs. Taylor, Ryland, Hutton, Russell, Horwood and Hobson, together with several chapels of dissenters. Owing to the supineness or connivance of the magistrates the riots continued four days. Tranquillity was at length restored by the arrival of the military, and several of the ringleaders were taken into custody; but three, however, expiated their crimes with death: so much more lenient had the government become since 1780.

27. A reward of 100*l.* offered for the discovery of the author of a seditious paper circulated with a mischievous intent in Birmingham on the 11th inst.

The court of Chancery on hearing the case of the nabob of Arcot against the East India Company, decided against the plea of the company, that in quality of sovereigns they were not amenable to its jurisdiction.

17. As the king was passing, in his carriage, through the park, a gentleman dressed in black, standing close to the rails of the Green Park, pulled a paper from his pocket, which he stuck upon the rail, addressed to the king, and then threw off his hat, discharged a pistol into his own bosom and instantly fell and expired. The unfortunate suicide was James Sutherland, esq., who had been suspended as judge advocate of Minorca, in 1780, and, from the failure of some applications to government, was reduced to great distress. A liberal provision was subsequently made for the family of this unfortunate person by the crown.

24. The famous convention of Pilnitz between the emperor of Germany, the king of Prussia, and elector of Saxony, relating either to the state of Poland or France, or perhaps both.

Sept. 3. NEW CONSTITUTION.—The National Assembly adopted a new constitution, which was accepted by the king; on the 14th, in celebration of the event, a grand fête took place in the Champs Elysée. The constitution now promulgated afforded indubitable evidence of the patriotism, abilities and industry of the constituent assembly. It was founded on the previous declaration of rights, and defines with precision the executive, legislative and judicial powers, the immunities of the people, and their international relations with foreigners.

10. A great insurrection of negroes and people of colour against the French in St. Domingo. The new notions of universal equality, and the efforts of a society in Paris, called L'Ami de Noir, had produced great disorders in the West Indies.

21. The buckle-makers of Birmingham sent a deputation to the prince of Wales to represent their distressed situation in consequence of the prevailing fashion of wearing shoe-strings in place of buckles. They were graciously received by the prince, who promised to exert his influence in their behalf.

The number of convicts sent to New South Wales is 2029; the expense of transporting them 161,075*l*.

The Society of Arts gave their gold medal to Mr. Johnson of Petworth, in Sussex, for sowing the greatest quantity of strong land with acorns.

31. Parliament opened by the king in a speech congratulating them on the prospects of peace, and of a further reduction in the naval and military establishments of the kingdom.

Feb. 17. THE BUDGET.—Mr. Pitt drew a picture of national prosperity beyond what the most sanguine could anticipate. In such a state of things he felt justified in proposing the repeal of the most burdensome imposts, and at the same time to apply 400,000*l*. to the reduction of the national debt in aid of the annual million appropriated by parliament. He said there "never was a period when, from the situation of Europe, we might more reasonably anticipate a durable peace, than at the present moment."—On the motion of Mr. M. A. Taylor, a committee was appointed to inquire into the evils resulting from raising money by lotteries.

21. On Saturday, the earl of Barrymore was convicted of an assault on a gentleman at Brighton. Lord Kenyon said he "thought the conduct of some people of rank in this country disgraceful, and suspected there was some defect in their education, when they were brought into a court of justice to finish it."

23. Died, in his 60th year, sir JOSHUA REYNOLDS, the celebrated painter, and the first president of the Royal Academy. Sir Joshua was a bachelor, and having early become rich by his profession he kept a splendid table, which was frequented by the best company in respect of talents and distinction. His "Discourses" on his art are generally admired and a standard work. Thomas Lawrence succeeded sir Joshua as portrait painter to the king, and Benjamin West as president of the Academy.

24. Preliminaries of peace signed with Tippoo Saib; the sultan agreed to cede one-half of Mysore to the English, to pay 33,000,000 rupees (about 3,300,000*l*.) to the English, and to give up two of his eldest sons as hostages for the fulfilment of the treaty.

28. House of commons, Dublin, took fire whilst the members were sitting; it soon became a heap of ruins; the accident was occasioned by the plumbers having a fire in the roof to heat their irons. It cost 41,000*l*., and was built by sir E. Pierce, in 1731.

Mar. 1. Died suddenly, and not without suspicion of poison, (Aikin's Annals, 450) the emperor Leopold II. He was succeeded by his son Francis II.; this event made no change in Austrian politics, the new monarch speedily announcing his intention of fulfilling the terms of the treaty of Pilnitz.

8. Dr. Willis set out to attend the queen of Portugal, who was afflicted with lunacy; he was to have 10,000*l.*, and 1000*l.* a month during his stay.

16. ASSASSINATION OF GUSTAVUS III.—The king of Sweden was mortally wounded with a pistol at a masquerade, by Ankerström, a disbanded officer, who had been condemned under a charge of high treason but received the royal clemency. His majesty had become unpopular among the people by eagerly engaging in the projected crusade against France, and among the nobles by depriving them of their privileges: it was by the latter the assassin was instigated. The king was in his 45th year, and lingered till the 29th inst., when he was succeeded by his son Gustavus IV., then in his fourteenth year; the regency was vested in the duke of Sudermania, who immediately declared for a system of neutrality in the approaching continental war.

17. Louis XVI., after various unpopular dismissals, appointed Roland to the interior department, Claviere to that of finance, and Servan to be minister of war; all men having the confidence of the nation.

WAR WITH AUSTRIA.—France declared war, having first received from the court of Vienna a categorical answer insisting, "1st, on the restitution of the feudal rights of the German princes in Lorraine and Alsace; 2nd, the restoration of Avignon to the pope; 3rd, adequate satisfaction that the neighbouring powers shall have no reason for the apprehension which rose from the present weakness of the internal government of France." The first two propositions being inadmissible, and the last unintelligible (Belsham's Hist. Geo. III., iv. 387) the National Assembly declared war against the emperor.

25. Ankerström the regicide beheaded, having previously had his right hand chopped off.

30. The French having invaded the Netherlands, were repulsed near Mons by the Austrians. At the same time general Dillon fell back from Lisle; being suspected of treachery he was murdered by his troops.

FOX'S LIBEL BILL.—This measure, which last session was lost in the upper house, was triumphantly carried in opposition to the law lords, Thurlow, Kenyon, and Bathurst. It removed an anomaly in judicial trials, by empowering juries, in cases of libel, the same as in felony or any other criminal indictment, to judge of the law as well as the fact, in lieu of their jurisdiction being restricted to the latter, as the judges had heretofore determined. Previously to the passing of the new act the judges unanimously gave their opinion (Ann. Reg. for 1792) on various points of the law of libel.

May. The "Society of the Friends of the People" began to meet, having for their avowed object reform in the representation; among them were Messrs. Grey, Whitbread, Sheridan, Erskine, and other members of parliament.

2. M. Chauvelin, the French minister, delivered his credentials; he made a formal application to the British government, to interfere to avert the progress of the confederacy against France.

12. Riot at Nottingham, on account of the high price of shoes and butcher's meat.

16. The house of commons narrowly escaped being burnt; the discovery of a pair of corduroy breeches thrust into the ceiling above the water-closet in a state of combustion (Ann. Reg., xxxiv., 18) excited suspicion, but no incendiary was ever discovered.

18. Russia not liking the free constitution recently established in Poland, declared war against her.

20. A grand entertainment given by the municipality of Warsaw to the king, who drank Vive la Nation, and announced that the time had arrived when "artificial distinctions should cease."

A soldier being killed in an affray in a brothel at Birmingham, the mob set about destroying all houses of that description. The magistrates called out the military and evinced more vigour than on a recent occasion in quelling a riotous assemblage.

21. A royal proclamation issued for the suppression of seditious correspondence abroad and publications at home, tending to bring into "contempt the wise and wholesome provisions made at the time of the glorious revolution." The London Corresponding Society, the Revolution (1688) Society, the Society for Constitutional Information, and various other societies had recently sent congratulatory addresses to the National Assembly.

A motion made by Mr. Whitbread to inquire into the conduct of the Birmingham magistrates during the late riots, was negatived.

June 9. A riotous mob at Edinburgh attempted to destroy the house of Mr. Dundas in St. George's-square; one person was killed and several wounded by the military.

12. Louis XVI. dismissed his popular ministers, Roland, Servan, and Le Brun; Dumourier soon after resigned. Next day the king refused to sanction the decrees against non-juring priests, and also one for the establishment of a camp of 20,000 men near Paris.

14. A plot discovered to blow up the walls of the King's-bench prison.

15. Parliament prorogued.

Lord Thurlow resigned the great seal, which he had held since June 3, 1778.

POLICE OF THE METROPOLIS.—During the session an act passed for establishing five different police offices, at each of which three justices, receiving an annual salary, were to sit. A number of constables were attached to each office, who were empowered to apprehend persons that could not give a satisfactory account of themselves. It was objected to on the ground of the additional patronage it gave to the crown; though its necessity for the protection of the inhabitants and for a more pure and efficient administration of justice in the capital was admitted. The office of justice had become disreputable in the metropolis; it was sought only by needy and venal men, whose base practices had drawn general odium upon themselves and functions. In order to suppress entirely the business of a trading justice no fees were in future to be taken by any magistrate within the London district.

16. General Lafayette addressed a letter from his camp at Maubeuge, abusing the Jacobin club.

18. A meeting of the freeholder of Surrey, to address the king on the late proclamation; it was opposed by Horne Tooke and lord William Russell.

20. The mob at Paris compel the king to wear the red cap of liberty.

25. The records of nobility ordered to be burnt by the national assembly.

28. Lafayette unexpectedly presented himself at the bar of the national assembly, calling upon them to "save their country by dissolving factious clubs." The general, however, was reprimanded and ordered to rejoin his army.

LANARK.—David Dale, esq., of this place, in the course of six years has reared a village on the Clyde containing 2000 persons; and erected five cotton mills, each of which contains 6000 spindles. (Ann. Reg. 1792, p. 27.) He is also celebrated for the provision he has made for the health and education of the children he employs. They have every day some hours allotted them for recreation in the fields, and ten schoolmasters are daily employed in their tuition.

Sir John Sinclair estimated that the population of Scotland had increased 400,000 since 1755, and that in 1792 it amounted to 1,700,000 souls.

July 1. National assembly declared the country in danger. "Your constitution, citizens," they said, "restores the principles of eternal justice,—a league of Kings is formed to destroy it."

At Paris, in his 50th year, died PAUL JONES, who distinguished himself as a naval commander in the service of America. He offered his services to the French, which were refused, and before his death being reduced to great poverty, he was buried by the subscriptions of some British residents, Jones being a native of Scotland.

2. Duel between lord Lauderdale and general Arnold. The earl a few days before had a similar rencontre with the duke of Richmond.

Tattersall, the proprietor of the Morning Post, was tried for several libels; one against Mr. George Rose, and another against lady Lambert, daughter of the countess dowager of Cavan. For the last the jury gave 4000*l.* damages.

John Bell, the publisher of The Oracle newspaper, was found guilty of a libel on the Guards.

14. The third anniversary of the Revolution was celebrated in the Champ de Mars by federates or delegates from all parts of France; among them was a deputation of Marseillois, under general Westerman, a Prussian; they soon became conspicuous in the disorders of the capital. The popular cries when the king appeared were, "Long live Petion! No Austrian committee! No traitorous correspondence with Brunswick!"

25. Duke of Brunswick issued his famous manifesto, dated Coblenz, against the French nation, threatening with military execution all who resisted the Austro-Prussian armies, and the most "avenging punishment" against the Parisians if they insulted the "palace of the Tuileries, the king, the queen, or any of the royal family, and if they did not instantly set them at liberty." This indiscreet denunciation addressed to a high-spirited, and then excited population, precipitated on the house of Bourbon the calamities it was meant to avert. Indignant at this foreign dictation in their internal affairs, and suspecting the king of secretly coalescing with the enemies of France, popular fury was directed against the royalists, and Paris in the months of August and September became a scene of dreadful crimes.

Aug. 2. Meeting at the London tavern in behalf of the king and people of Poland struggling for their liberties: W. Smith, M.P., in the chair.

DEATH OF RICHARD ARKWRIGHT.—This celebrated improver of cotton machinery expired on the 3rd inst., at Cromford, in his 59th year. He was originally a barber at Bolton-le-Moors, but lived to be knighted and fill the office of sheriff of Derbyshire. He was a man of singular ingenuity, perseverance, and comprehension of mind. The spinning-frame, to the invention or successful introduction of which (ante 494) he owed his fortune, was first worked by horse-power at Nottingham, about 1770. The water-wheel was next applied, which has been superseded by the more constant and efficient force of steam. Sir Richard had been involved in protracted litigation to protect the patents of his inventions, the entire originality of which was pertinaciously disputed. He left about 400,000*l.* in money to a son and daughter; and his manufactories were supposed (Ann. Reg., xxxiv, 36) to be worth as much more. It was the first, as it was doubtless the largest, fortune that had been realised by the recent discoveries in the manufacturing arts.

5. Died, in his 60th year, the earl of GUILDFORD, better known as lord North, and premier during the American war. His lordship was a high-church Tory, remarkable for wit and urbanity. Like his political antagonist colonel Barré, he had for several years been afflicted with blindness. Replying to some observations of the colonel in the commons, he told him that notwithstanding his "constant hostility, no two persons in the world would be more happy to see each other."

8. Grand review by the king on Bagshdt-heath. The sutlers had a plentiful harvest; for a "single mutton-chop, a cucumber, and a pint of bad wine, they charged 18*s.*; and 5*s.* for tea or coffee with two thin slices of bread and butter!"

Dr. Willis returned from Portugal loaded with bars of gold and adorned with diamonds. But the queen's malady was incurable. Living under the influence of monks, she fell into the delusion that she and her father were doomed to eternal punishment, and the doctor had no prescription for reversing the decrees of fate.

10. STORMING OF THE TUILERIES.—This was an organized insurrection, planned by Danton, Pétion, Manuel, and Marat, preliminary to the deposition of the king, who was believed to be constitutionally insincere. It was a trial of strength between the determined revolutionists and the royalists, and terminated in the entire triumph of the former. Just before the onset, the king and queen, the princess royal, and princess Elizabeth took refuge in the hall of the national assembly. Of the regiment of Swiss, near 1000 strong, not more than 180 survived; exclusive of these, five gentlemen, 100 domestics of the palace, and 20 national guards fell on the royalists' side. On the other, 3000 Parisians, and 300 or 400 fédérés. It was a bootless slaughter, and the king's conduct has been severely censured. He ought either to have perished along with his faithful defenders, rather than survived to await an ignominious death, or to have explicit orders sent to have been given (which were not) for the prompt surrender of the household troops, seeing there was little chance of resisting almost the entire population of the capital, provided with artillery, armed, and partly disciplined. The functions of the king were from this time suspended by a decree of the assembly, and his person and family incarcerated in the Temple.

11. The empress of Russia recalled her minister from Paris.

13. Allies defeated near Longwy.

DISSOLUTION OF THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.—The legislative, or second national assembly of France, prepared for its dissolution by publishing a defence of its proceedings, and by adopting a plan proposed by M. Gaudet, on the 13th instant, for summoning a national convention. It was to be elected on a more popular principle than its predecessor. All that was now necessary to entitle a man to vote for a representative, were that he should be 21 years old, a Frenchman, who had lived for one year in the country on his own revenue, or the produce of his labour, and not in a state of servitude. Before its dissolution, the assembly passed several important decrees for the banishment of non-juring priests; for the division of the waste lands of the kingdom; for the division and sale of the lands of the emigrants; for bringing into the mint the vessels, images, and other moveables of gold and silver in the churches; for the conversion into cannon of the bronze statues of their kings, from Louis XIII. to Louis XVI.

14. Le Brun appointed minister for foreign affairs; Danton, for justice; Monge, a teacher of navigation, for the marine; Roland, for home affairs; Servan, for war; and Claviere, for contributions. The three last were the patriotic ministers the king had lately dismissed after being a few months in office.

17. Earl Gower, the British minister at Paris, applies for his passport in consequence of the suspension of the executive power of the king.

19. Lafayette having been denounced by the assembly, escaped to the frontier, where, with six others, he was made prisoner by the Austrians, and for several years confined in the dungeon of Olmutz.

21. Longwy surrendered to the allies.

30. All ministerial communication with the French ambassadors in London and at the Hague was discontinued by order of their respective courts.

CANAL SHARES.—In this month England was in a ferment, created by speculations in canal shares; to promote which, many new canals were projected, and incredible sums subscribed, chiefly in the midland counties. On the 18th instant, there appeared in the Gazette 19 different notices of intended applications to parliament respecting internal navigation. The following were current premiums on single shares in those canals for which acts of parliament had been obtained:—Birmingham and Fazeley, 1170*l.*; Stourbridge, 350*l.*; Melton, 55*l.*; Grand Trunk, 350*l.*; Coventry, 350*l.*; Leicester, 155*l.*; Worcester, 20*l.*

The increase of business in the Bank of England is shown by the increase in its number of servants, who now amount to 400.—Ann. Reg., 1792.

Sept. 1. The addresses presented to the king, to return thanks for the late proclamation against seditious writings, amounted to 341.

The streets of London now swarmed with French emigrants, most of them priests, and in great distress.

2. Paris the scene of horrible outrages. The prisons were forced open in the night, and the royalists massacred by the populace, on the pretence of exterminating internal enemies before they set out to meet the allied armies. About one thousand two hundred were sacrificed in Paris alone, exclusive of those at Rheims and other places; among them the princess de Lamballe. Danton, minister of justice, being applied to, to interpose his authority to put an end to these enormities, replied, "When the people have done their part, I will perform mine." They had the effect of alienating the minds of many English reformers from the Revolution, and all projects of change were generally discountenanced.

13. It is said the Roman-catholics of Ireland have subscribed nearly three millions to purchase lands in America, should they fail in obtaining justice from the British parliament.

14. General Dumouriez retreated, and the allies entered Grand Pré.

20. Austro-Prussian armies repulsed by Kellerman near Dampierre.

NATIONAL CONVENTION met. Its first act was to sanction by law the abolition of royalty. Next day it decreed, 1st, That all public acts should be dated "the first year of the French Republic;" 2nd, That the state-seal should be changed, and have for its legend, "French Republic;" 3rd, That the national seal should represent a woman sitting upon a bundle of arms, having in her hand a pike with the cap of liberty upon it, and on the exergue, "Archives of the French Republic." On the motion of Barrere, the friends of liberty in all nations were invited to offer suggestions for the best mode of constituting the republic. Those writers or orators abroad, who had distinguished themselves in defence of the Revolution, or whose opinions they approved, they complimented with citizenship. Among those selected, were Dr. Priestley, Thomas Paine, Mr. Wilberforce (Ann. Reg. xliiv, 62), Dr. Towers, Horaz Tooke, and Mr. James Macintosh.

22. Dr. Priestley chosen a member of the national convention for the department of Arne; also Mr. Paine, by the district of Versailles, and by that of Calais. He had published a second part of his "Rights of Man," combining principle and practice. They were much read by the middle and working classes, especially in the manufacturing towns both of England and Scotland. The only reply Burke made to these popular publications was, "that they deserved no other refutation than that of criminal justice" (Appeal, &c. 95); a hint which was shortly after taken by the attorney-general.

26. Lord Macartney sailed from Portsmouth on a splendid mission to the emperor of China.

27. National convention abolished the titles of "monsieur" and "madame," and that of "citizen" substituted.

30. Spire surrendered to the French.

RETREAT OF BRUNSWICK.—About the end of this month the combined army began its retreat, leaving Clermont and its strong camp on the heights of Lalune. It had suffered immensely from sickness, occasioned by eating the unripe grapes and wheat of Champagne. Moreover, the French peasantry everywhere opposed them, by attacking detachments, forming abbas, and breaking up the roads. The emigrant princes had misled the allies as to the disposition of the country people, whom they represented (Declaration, Aug. 8) would rally round the "immortal purity of the Fleur-de-Lys in defence of the altar and the throne."

Oct. The number of French refugees landed in England, between August 30th and the 1st inst., is 3772. Subscriptions raised for their relief amount to fifteen thousand pounds.

11. A commission appointed to prepare a constitution for France, consisting of Sieyes, Brissot, Paine, Condorcet, Barrere, and others.

18. France entirely evacuated by the combined armies of Austria and Prussia.

28. DEATH OF SMEATON.—In his 69th year, at Austhorpe, near Leeds, where he was born, John Smeaton, F.R.S., the celebrated civil engineer, distinguished as the architect of Eddystone lighthouse, and conductor of various other important undertakings. Mr. Smeaton was the son of an attorney, but early showed a decided turn for mechanical discoveries. He was the author of several valuable papers relevant to his professional pursuits, and those schemes of internal improvement in which the country was intently occupied.

29. Three of the mutineers of the Beatty (ante p. 546) executed at Portsmouth.

Nov. 1. Dumourier invades Belgium.

6. Battle of GENAPPPE, in which Dumourier, in gallant style, defeated the Austrians with the loss of 4000 men, commanded by the duke of Saxe Teschen. In this battle the eldest son of the duke of Orleans, called young Egalité, distinguished himself.

14. Dumourier enters Brussels in triumph, having previously captured all the strong towns in the Austrian Netherlands.

16. National convention decreed that the navigation of the Scheldt and the Meuse should be free to all nations.

19. So elated were the convention with their military triumphs, that, in open contradiction of the previous declaration of the national assembly, of never making war except in self-defence, and of non-interference in the affairs of other nations, they passed by acclamation a decree, "That they would grant fraternity and assistance to all those people who wish to procure liberty; and they charge the executive power to send orders to their generals to give assistance to such people as have suffered, or are now suffering, in the cause of liberty."

20. At a meeting of gentlemen at the Crown and Anchor, an association was formed for preserving liberty and property against republicans and levellers; John Reeves, esq., in the chair. In their address, they recommended the formation of similar societies, for the purpose of disabusing the public mind on the new doctrines conveyed in the terms of The Rights of Man, Liberty and Equality, No King, No Parliament.

27. National convention erect the duchy of Savoy into an 84th department of the French republic.

28. Citizens John Frost and Joel Barlow, deputies from the Society for Constitutional Information, present a congratulatory address to the convention on the glorious triumph of liberty on the 10th of August.

Dec. 1. Notice given to lord Edward Fitzgerald and lord Sempill, both in the army, that his majesty had no further need of their services.

Great activity in the royal dock yards; and orders given for the ships to complete their stores and repair to Spithead.

Royal proclamation issued, alleging that "the utmost industry was still employed by evil-disposed persons acting in concert with persons in foreign parts, with a view to subvert the laws and constitution;" that a spirit of tumult had manifested itself in "acts of riot and insurrection;" that his majesty had therefore "resolved to embody part of the militia of the kingdom."

MEETING AT MERCHANT-TAILORS' HALL. A numerous meeting of bankers, merchants, and traders of the metropolis; Samuel Bosanquet, esq., in the chair. Upwards of 3000 persons were in the hall, exclusive of the crowd in the yard and street. Amidst great enthusiasm, a declaration was agreed to, expressive of attachment to the British constitution as settled at the Revolution of 1688, and of confidence in its inherent excellences to reform all abuses. This confidence, it was alleged, was further strengthened by experience of the improvements in agriculture, commerce, manufactures, navigation, and the increase of population. It was signed by more than 8000 persons, and the original declaration (Ann. Reg., 1792, p. 49.) deposited in the records of the Tower.

6. Public alarm was kept up by troops being marched into London, the guard at the Bank doubled, and the fortifications of the Tower repaired.

13. MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.—The law requiring that if the militia be drawn out during the recess, and this it can only be in the case of invasion or actual insurrection, parliament shall be assembled in fourteen days; it consequently anticipated the period (Jan. 3rd) to which it had been prorogued. Considerable apprehension existed of a plot against the state. In the opening speech the king said, "I have carefully observed a strict neutrality in the present war on the Continent, and have uniformly abstained from any interference with respect to the internal affairs in France; but it is impossible for me to see, without the most serious uneasiness, the strong and increasing indications which have appeared there, of an intention to excite disturbances in other countries, to disregard the rights of neutral nations, and to pursue views of conquest and aggrandizement, as well as to adopt towards my allies the States-general, who have observed the same neutrality as myself, measures which are neither conformable to the law of nations, nor to the positive stipulations of existing treaties." Under these circumstances, his majesty had thought fit to augment his naval and military force. On moving the address, an animated debate ensued, in which the abilities of Mr. Fox were resplendent. He was ably supported by Sheridan, Erskine, Whitbread, Grey, Courtenay, Francis, and Adam. On a division, the amendment, "that an inquiry should be made into the facts alleged in the king's speech," was negatived by 290 to 50. In the lords, the address was carried without a division, but not without opposition from the duke of Norfolk and lords Lansdowne, Rawdon, and Stanhope. In consequence of the late alarms, several seceded from the whig party, and acquired the name of ALARMISTS. Among them, in the lower house, were Burke, Windham, Anstruther, and sir Gilbert Elliot. In the upper, the prince of Wales, the duke of Portland, and lords Fitzwilliam, Spencer, and Loughborough, who had succeeded Thurlow in the chancellorship. Mr. Pitt was not present during the debate on the address, he having accepted the wardenship of the Cinque Ports, and had not yet been re-elected.

18. At Guildhall, before lord Kenyon, Thomas Paine was found guilty of a libel contained in his "Rights of Man."

19. ALIEN ACT.—Lord Grenville introduced a bill for placing aliens under strict supervision, as well as to confine those who received temporary assistance to certain districts, suffering them to remove only with passports. The debate upon this subject was only remarkable from presenting Mr. Burke in a new character, that of parliamentary tragedian. The orator, to heighten the effect of one of his rhapsodies, threw a Sheffield dagger on the floor of the house, which he had brought with him to the house, and carefully kept concealed till the critical moment of exhibition. The bill of course passed, as did two others, to interdict the circulation of French assignats, and restrain the exportation of naval stores and ammunition.

26. Trial of Louis XVI. began at the bar of the national convention; M. Barrere, president.

27. M. Chauvelin, the French minister in London, addressed a note to lord Grenville, demanding an explanation of the intentions of the British government towards France; and at the same time endeavouring to set aside the false interpretation which was given to the decree of the national convention of November 19, for encouraging insurrections in other countries. Lord Grenville acknowledged, on the 31st instant, the receipt of the note of M. Chauvelin, "styling himself minister plenipotentiary from France." His lordship said, if France was desirous of maintaining peace with Britain, she must renounce her views of aggrandizement. This correspondence continued into the ensuing year. Previously to this, on the 2nd inst. M. Maret had a private interview with Mr. Pitt, from which it appeared the English minister was less disposed to war than the English aristocracy and a majority of the council, headed by lord Hawkesbury.

CONSTITUENT, OR FIRST NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.—The states-general of France, which met in 1789, was composed of the three orders of the clergy, nobles, and tiers-état, amounting together to 1128 persons. Lacretelle has given an analysis of these orders, and of the parts they took in the first national assembly, into which the states-general resolved itself.

COMMERCE, SHIPPING, FISHERIES.

Besides the general peace, the settlement of the ministry, and the application of many recent inventions to manufacturing industry, other causes helped to give an impulse to commercial activity. One of these was a succession of favourable harvests, and consequent low price of provisions. During the first eight years of Mr. Pitt's administration the average price of wheat at Windsor market was 49*s.* per quarter. The average price during the long and prosperous reign of George III was 3*s.* The vast territorial acquisitions of the East India Company, and a better system of colonial government, not only afforded a wide field for adventurous individuals, whose gains enriched the country, but threw open many new and extensive markets for English products. In consequence, the shipping employed in the India trade more than doubled; and the quantity of British manufactures annually exported to the East, which in 1774 amounted only to 807,240*l.*, had increased, in 1792, to 1,921,955*l.* The fisheries were vigorously promoted; besides those of Greenland and Newfoundland, the South whale fishery was opened. The attention of the legislature to the progress of commerce is shown by its fiscal regulations, and the various statutes passed for advancing the true interests of the people. During the ten sessions which ended with that of 1793, parliament passed 1934 statutes; of these there were 625 private, and 1369 public acts: 29 were for improving manufactures, and 114 for commercial purposes.

The commercial progress of the country headed by eight years of peace subsequently. An American war will appear late chief-judge joined statement of the ton his 83rd year.

ROADS AND TRAVELLING.

The essentials of commerce are money, to represent the value of commodities; weights and measures, their quantities; and roads to facilitate their conveyance. The last are more important than the preceding; they are almost the first step in social improvement, without which there can be neither security nor traffic. It is only the sea-coast and the banks of rivers that can be peopled till roads have been opened into the interior, by whose aid the forest is cleared, and a way made for the transit of the produce of industry. Agriculture has this relation to commerce that its basis is interchange. It consists in the reciprocation of superabundances with deficiencies, the excessive moisture of one district being made to correct the aridity of another; the soils and manures that are unsuitable or redundant in one description of lands may fertilize others, and both be improved. The Romans always began the task of civilization by opening new communications: their object, however, was neither commerce nor agriculture, but the lust of dominion.

The labours of this extraordinary people are remarkable for two oversights that have very much excited the astonishment of posterity. Ignorant of the true principles of hydrostatics, they constructed vast and expensive aqueducts for the conveyance of water; whereas by a knowledge that water will rise to its level, and the use of water-pipes, they might have made that necessary element convey itself. In the structure of carriages, they were unacquainted with the movable joint, by which the two first wheels of a four-wheeled vehicle may alter their parallel position to follow the curvature of the road. Hence the great Roman ways could not conveniently, owing to the immovable parallelism of the axles of their large carriages, deviate from straight lines, so as to pass through the adjacent towns and villages.

The infancy of road-making, like that of navigation, must be sought in the infancy of nations. A canoe, hollowed out of the trunk of a tree, was the beginning of ship-building; and an Indian's trail, by which an untutored tribe, wend their way, in single file, through forest or grassy glade of boundless extent, is the first germ of a road. Conveyance by a quadruped, which rendered necessary the widening of the trail into a sort of bridle-path, formed most likely the second step in the improvement of itinerancy. Next came the use of carriages; a sledge, perhaps, first; after that, the cart, or sledge, raised on two wheels, connected by an axle. Then came the double cart, or waggon of four wheels, by which two parallel and transverse axes were connected by a fixed longitudinal one. In principle, no improvement beyond this has been made in the construction of carriages, save that just alluded to, of the movable joint, which at once, by the facilities it afforded for turning curved lines, dispensed with the necessity of rectilinear roads for large vehicles.

The first effort of English legislation to improve what may be termed the natural roads of the kingdom was in the reign of Edward I. In 1285 an act passed for widening the highways from one market-town to another; but this was intended rather to prevent robbery than to facilitate travelling. The roads of particular districts were amended by several laws of Henry VIII. In the reign of Philip and Mary a general act passed for the mending of highways, "being," says the law, "both very noisome and tedious to travel on, and dangerous to passengers and carriages." Under this statute surveyors were to be appointed, and every parish, by four days' labour of its people, was compelled to repair its own roads. This was a very efficient measure, till the vast extent of population and trade in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. and II. rendered necessary a more general system, especially in the vicinity of the metropolis and large towns. This gave rise to turnpikes in the reign of Charles II., by which those who enjoyed the benefits of safe and easy travelling contributed the necessary expense, in the payment of tolls, levied at toll-gates called turnpikes. It was a salutary and just innovation, but long unpopular, and was not generally introduced through the kingdom till the peace of Paris, in 1763.

For nearly 100 years after the first introduction of turnpikes, they do not appear to have been generally available for travelling, or the conveyance of merchandize. Down to the middle of last century, a great part of the internal trade of the island was carried on by pack-horses, the roads not being passable for a cart, or other wheeled carriage. This the writer knows from tradition to have been the case in the counties of York and Lancaster. A line of horses, the first having a bell, conveyed through long winding lanes a large part of the woollen manufactures of the West-Riding of Yorkshire. A gentleman of Manchester, who realised a sufficient fortune to enable him to keep a carriage, when not half a dozen were kept in the town, carried on his business in this way. He sent the manufactures of the place into Nottinghamshire, Lincolnshire, Cambridgeshire, and the intervening counties; and principally took in exchange feathers from Lincolnshire, and malt from Cambridgeshire and Nottinghamshire. All his commodities were conveyed on pack-horses, and he was from home the greater part of every year, performing his journeys entirely on horseback. His balances were received in guineas, and were carried with him in his saddle-bags. In Lincolnshire he travelled chiefly along bridle-ways through fields, where frequent gibbets warned him of his perils, and where flocks of wild-fowl, darkened the air (Walker's Original, 161). It is almost within the memory of the existing generation when there was no carriage-road between Horsham and London; the only means of reaching London, thirty-six miles distant, was either by going on foot or on horseback, the latter not being practicable at all seasons of the year, nor in every state of the weather. In Scotland, about the same period, intercourse and business were similarly conducted. Oatmeal, coals, turf, and even straw and hay, were carried, not by carts or waggons, but on horseback (McCulloch's Com. Dict., 915). But in carrying goods between distant places a cart was used, as all that a horse could carry on his back was not sufficient to defray the cost of a long journey. The time requisite to perform the journey seems now incredible. The common carrier, says the authority just quoted, from Selkirk to Edinburgh, thirty-eight miles distant, required a fortnight for his journey between the two places in going and returning.

The intelligent Arthur Young, who travelled through the southern and northern counties of England in 1770-2, often adverts to the state of the common roads. He speaks well of some in Wiltshire, and of the great north one to Barnet; and of the Kentish turnpike. In Norfolk, he says, where the roads are the boast of the inhabitants, they have not "one mile of excellent road in the whole county." (Six weeks' Tour in the Southern Counties, 320). In the muddy road from Bury to Sudbury in Suffolk, he was forced to move "as slow, as in any unimproved lane in Wales." The grips he found cut across for carrying off the water must, by the intolerable jolting they occasioned, have augmented the discomforts of travelling. In the north, he found matters, as might be expected, still worse. At Castle Howard he was near being "swallowed up in a slough." From Richmond to Darlington the roads were execrably bad, broken into holes, like an old pavement, sufficient to "dislocate the bones." "Yet," he says, "the people all drink tea" (Six Months' Tour through the North of England, ii. 254). At one spot he arrived at a cross-road "fronted nine ways at once, without a single directing-post" (Ibid. iv. 423). As to the Lancashire ways, he cautions people to shun them as they would the devil. The description he gives of the turnpike-road from Wigan to Preston (proud Preston, as it was formerly called, as being the exclusive abode of gentry) is frightful enough! "I know not," says he, "in the whole range of language terms sufficiently expressive to describe this infernal road. To look over a map, and perceive that it is a principal one, not only to some towns, but even whole counties, one would naturally conclude it to be at least decent; but let me most seriously caution all travellers who may accidentally purpose to travel this terrible country to avoid it as they would the devil, for a thousand to one but they break their necks or their limbs by everthrows or breakings down. They will here meet with ruts, which I actually measured, four feet deep, and floating with mud only from a wet summer;—what, therefore, must it be after a winter? The only mending it in places receives, is the tumbling in some loose stones, which serve no other purpose but jolting a carriage in the most intolerable manner. These are not merely opinions, but facts, for I actually passed three carts broken down in these eighteen miles of execrable memory" (Northern Tour, iv. 431).

Accustomed to the smooth and level roads of the present day, we can form no idea of the delays and dangers of former tourists. The anecdote related of the poet Cowley in 1665 seems almost incredible. He had retired into the country, to Chertsey, and thence invited Sprat to enjoy the pleasures of St. Anne's Hill, telling him, "that he might sleep the first night at Hampton Town:" thus spending two days in the performance of a journey of twenty-two miles, in the neighbourhood of London.

Our surprise at such relations is lessened, upon reflecting on the length of time consumed in stage-coach travelling. Forty years later, namely, in 1706, the stage-coach from York to London was four days on the road. The journey is now performed in about twenty hours. In 1763 there was only a coach once a month from Edinburgh to London; and it took from twelve to fourteen days to perform the journey. Now, six or seven coaches start daily from one capital to the other, and perform the journey in from forty-five to forty-eight hours. Even this is in rapid progress of being eclipsed, by the miracles of railway travelling, but of which a notice belongs to a subsequent period.

The strenuous efforts of the legislature to improve not only the inter-communications of the kingdom, but also to effect other local amendments, will appear from the following classification of the number of acts of parliament passed for these purposes, in the interval from 1784 to 1792, which is the period more immediately claiming attention:—

There is not only now an annual supply, but Ireland has, upon an average, exported latterly 300,000 barrels of wheat, and 500,000 barrels of oats. (Annual Register for 1792, p. 106.)

GEORGE III. A.D. 1793 to 1803.

THE preceding portion of the current reign exhibited the progress of the country during eight years of peace; the present embraces nine years of war, to the conclusion of the Treaty of Amiens, in 1802. Although not a lengthened term, it is the most interesting and important in history, demonstrating by the mass of extraordinary events crowded into its brief space, that whatever may have been the influence of civilization in diffusing luxury and enjoyment, it has had no tendency to lessen the activity, diversity, and might, when called into exertion, of the human intellect and passions. The French Revolution brought forth giants—giants in speculation and practice—in politics and war—in morals, patriotism, and crimes.

The first and prominent event of this remarkable period is the commencement of the war of 1793, and the novel principles in which it originated. Unlike former wars, it did not originate in the personal quarrels of princes, like those of the Edwards and Henries; nor in religious animosities, like those of Henry VIII. and Elizabeth; nor in territorial cupidity, like those of William III. and queen Anne; nor in the interests of a petty electorate, like those of George I. and II.; nor in colonial disputes, like the first war of the present sovereign. Different from these, the revolutionary contest had neither the passions of monarchs, nor the restless ambition of the Bourbons, for its object; but took its rise from the hitherto unimagined ground of OPINION—an opinion of contingent danger from the acts, chiefly internal, of a neighbouring state.

As the primary cause was moral, it might have been supposed that moral precautions, without actual hostilities, were alone needed. A powerful kingdom had fallen into anarchy, in an effort to free herself from great social and political disorders; what could be more politic than that other nations, without the risk of experiment, should quietly profit by her example? If France had lost more than she had gained by the destruction of her monarchy, her church, and aristocracy, it was doubtless a consequence susceptible of proof, and public opinion needed only to be enlightened on the tendency of her errors. Unfortunately, governments were not inclined to derive this gratuitous lesson. A conflagration had burst forth, and they threw brands into the burning. Already apprehensive and excited by the emigration of a degenerate nobility, by famine, and the counter-revolutionary plots of the court, the rage of the French kindled into fury at the threatened intervention of foreigners in their affairs. By the invasion of the first coalition, in 1792, and its vain denunciations of vengeance, every evil was precipitated, an unconquerable power elicited, and the death of the king and massacre of the royalists provoked.

Except the merit of being later in the field, England evinced neither more wisdom nor folly than the continental despots. Like them, she was not content to observe a moral quarantine pending the delirium of her neighbour, be a spectator of her convulsions, and profit by the lessons they afforded. Urged by various considerations, she mingled in the fray, first as an accessory, next as principal, and lastly, single-handed. The classes and interests which mainly produced this determination in public policy may perhaps be described under the following category:—

The first and most influential were doubtless the aristocratic orders of the community. Foremost among these may be classed the king himself. Although George III. was not remarkable for shining abilities, he always manifested a shrewd sense of his own interests, and seemed conscious of the influence likely to be wrought on the status of his order by the progress of the French Revolution. "If a stop," said he, "be not put to French principles, there will not be a king left in Europe in a few years*." A like apprehension of real or imaginary danger influenced the peerage, the church, corporations, and the legal and proprietary classes. The only noblemen who openly defended the Revolution were the eccentric earls Stanhope and Lauderdale; the rest were alarmists in different degrees, though they did not openly pass over to the ministerial standard, like Burke and Windham, and the lords Portland, Spencer, Fitzwilliam, Loughborough, and other peers and commoners, who acquired that distinctive appellation. In neither house of parliament was there a valid opposition to the war. The resolutions brought forward by Mr. Fox (see Feb. 18, 1793) embraced the sentiments of his party in both houses; but, like the motions generally emanating from the same quarter, they rather impugned the minister than his measures: for though they disclaimed the right of one country to interfere with another on account of its internal government—a sentiment from which the chiefs of their opponents did not openly dissent—they did not specifically deny the absence of adequate ground for hostilities.

The second class, who viewed the rupture of amicable relations with France favourably, were the religious sectaries. In the view of these, the French were an infidel nation, with whose course were associated atheism and licentiousness; and the war was a holy enterprise for the re-establishment of religion, morality, and social order. The influence of this party was not derived from wealth or intellectual pre-eminence, but from numbers, and an assumption of exemplary purity of motive and conduct. They were mostly under the guidance of Mr. Wilberforce, who, though opposed to the commencement of the war, was prevented, by the management of Mr. Pitt, from making a public declaration of his sentiments in parliament, and after hostilities had continued a year or two, he openly expressed himself convinced of their necessity.

The third, and by far the most numerous class, were those whose feelings were wrought on by the excesses of the Revolution. Without the aid of these, war would have been impossible: they were the bulk of the nation—the old and young of both sexes—who could feel better than reason. Inflamed by the writings of Mr. Burke, and the French emigrants, who now inundated the country, they read with horror the details of the Parisian insurrections, of the insults offered to the royal family, and of the trial and treatment of Louis XVI. They beheld the national frenzy, the blood and desolation, but not their causes or extenuation. They did not reflect that the crimes of a populace, ignorant, excited, often maddened by hunger, and long oppressed, were not the crimes, nor wishes of the nation: that a terrible danger menaced France; that brute force could only be resisted by the aid of brute force; that a league of kings—themselves tyrants—had combined to dictate to France her social institutions, and that their intervention was solicited, encouraged, and promoted by domestic treason. History has revealed these truths, and placed them beyond dispute. It is now perfectly understood that nothing would satisfy the discomfited royalists of France, save the restoration of the ancient despotism; and that Louis himself, in violation of his professions, his engagements, and his oaths, was acting in concert with a rabid coalition who projected the invasion, perhaps the desolation and dismemberment of his kingdom*.

France could not have any wish to become a second Poland, nor Paris an Ismael. Had her emergencies been known,—the plots internal and external against her liberties and nationality,—it is probable the British people would have been more tolerant of her offences, and less disposed to resent them by hostilities. As it was, they were ignorant, if not duped. Neither does the government appear to have been obnoxious to serious reproaches, unless it were because it was not wiser and more just than the community. It went with the torrent, which at the moment, perhaps, it was vain to resist. That the war was popular at the beginning is shown by the "Events and Occurrences" of the period—by the absence of petitions and remonstrances against it—by the acquiescence of all classes and interests, except a few revolutionary zealots, who were only as dust in the balance in the determination of this great public question.

On the part of the government, the war was neither foreseen nor premeditated. This appears from the tenor of the king's speeches to parliament, and those of his minister. In the summer of 1792, towards the close of the session, Mr. Pitt said in the House of Commons, "England had never a fairer prospect of a long continuance of peace. I think we may confidently reckon on peace for TEN YEARS†." He looked upon the existing dispute with France about the opening of the Scheldt, and other matters, as nothing more than an affair of the violation of treaties, upon which he reasoned in the pompous commonplace of an old Aix-la-Chapelle plenipotentiary. Mr. Burke was not more prescient of the results of the Revolution: he considered France self-extinguished (Feb. 9, 1790), and advocated a reduction in our peace-establishment.

That peace would have been better than war, the profitless results of the contest demonstrated. It averted no evil, and attained no good that might not have been attained without it. Nevertheless, hostilities seemed the unavoidable result of circumstances. Had Mr. Pitt refused to go to war, he would have been driven from power by the united voice of king and people, and his successor, whether whig or tory, would have been compelled to pursue the course of policy which was only reluctantly followed by that celebrated statesman. On the other hand, had England been more pacifically inclined than she was, she might a little later have been forced into the contest by the altered tone, the foreign intermeddling, and extravagance of the French government.

France was no longer the same after the retreat of the duke of Brunswick, and the successful resistance of 1792. The national energies had been evoked, foreigners had been everywhere driven from her frontiers; she was intoxicated by her triumphs, and sudden escape from the thrall of the coalition. Republicanism had become the faith—almost the fanatic faith—of the nation; and the zeal of the French in its propagation was hardly less than that of the followers of Mahomet. Equality was esteemed a universal right ; and it was felt as an obligation of the prevailing cosmopolitanism, that the whole family of man ought to share in its blessings*.

"All or nothing" (Lafayette's Memoirs, iii., 252) was the constant cry of the emigrants, headed by the king's brothers Monsieur and the Count d'Artois, the former afterwards Louis XVIII., and the latter Charles X.

While the spirit of propagandism prevailed, peace was hardly compatible with security. England must become either republican or hostile ; monarchy could not co-exist with the proselyting zeal of her neighbour, seconded as it was by some active, though not very numerous, converts in this country.

The Revolution solved important political problems, and many moral ones. France went rapidly through every phase of the social cycle. From despotism she fell into the depths of democracy. After exhibiting in this abyss the strangest feats of wildness, energy, and wonderment, she again merged, divested of part of the dross and pollution that had accompanied her fall, into the quieter regions of aristocracy. Theories which philosophers had only propounded in their closets were boldly tried, and their applicability to human affairs tested. It was a plunge in the dark, in which no one could boast superior light ; for all the extremes of the Revolution seem to have been inevitable issues. The old fabric of the monarchy once assailed, no intermediate resting-place could be found. The royalists would surrender nothing ; they appealed to physical force, and the aid of the masses was necessary to resist them. The multitude conquered ; but armed, without knowledge or experience, they could neither govern nor be governed. Partly by stratagem, partly by force, their weapons were got from them, order was re-established, and France reaped some of the rewards of her unparalleled trial†.

It is only the leading points of this extraordinary movement, and of the war it produced, that can be included in this introductory summary ; the detail and filling-up must be sought in the "Occurrences."

The meeting of the CONVENTION, towards the close of 1792, has been already described (p. 538). It was chosen on the basis of universal suffrage ; and had not its acts been influenced by the municipality and clubs of Paris, they would have been perhaps more truly the expression of the national will than those of any legislature that ever assembled. It began its mission with the formal deposition of the monarchy ; it was the first year of the Republic, 1789 being the first year of liberty. Next followed the trial and execution of the king. Vigorous measures were adopted to defend the country against the combined powers ; the revolutionary tribunal and committee of public safety were established. Fierce contests next arose between the Gironde deputies and the Jacobins ; the former were deemed too tame for the crisis, and, the latter triumphing over them, they were sent to the scaffold. The safety of the republic became the supreme law. The nation was summoned to rise en masse to meet the invaders, and one million of republicans were assembled on the frontiers. This was the commencement of the REIGN OF TERROR. It began about the middle of 1793, and continued through great part of the following year. Its chief agents were Robespierre, Danton, Marat, St. Just, and Couthon, most of whom were young lawyers whose ages averaged about thirty years. They governed by the guillotine, upon the maxims of the deys of Algiers, by beheading all whom they disliked. Draco had only one punishment for offences, and they seem to have adopted the institutions of that sanguinary lawgiver. Generals, deputies, and private persons, without regard to age, sex, or condition, science, virtue, or services, were all made to pass under the axe, if suspected of crimes against the state. "The glory of France," says Madame de Stael, "was decimated in the deaths of Roland, Malesherbes, Bailly*, Lavoisier, Vergniaud, Guadet, and Condorcet." Eighty victims each day were not unusually offered up to the Moloch of anarchy. The Revolution became blind as well as furious. Like Saturn, it began to devour its own children. Hardly were the Brissotins in their graves, than the Jacobins fell upon each other. Robespierre and Danton combined against Hebert and the Cordeliers: these immolated by their joint efforts, Robespierre rose against Danton, and lastly the tyrant himself fell a victim to his confederates in crime,—Tallien, Barrere, Billaud-Varennes, and Bourdon de L'Oise.

* General Lafayette, after assisting the Americans in the establishment of their independence, purposed assisting the Irish volunteers in achieving a similar boon (Memoirs, iii., 212). Lafayette was only a lukewarm type of the zeal of many of the French republicans of 1792-3.

The elect of the clubs having perished by the hands of each other, France began to breathe from internal slaughter. After the fall of Robespierre the executive power was vested in a DIRECTORY of five persons. Four of these were Jacobins; but though of that party, they found no government compatible with its principles of constant insurrection and popular excitement. Jacobinism had addressed itself to the passions, abstract rights, and apparent interests of the people, by which they called forth their energies, and enlisted them in the public cause. Their union was cemented with the blood of a thousand victims; their desperate deeds shutting out the hope of mercy from their enemies, left no alternative but Death or Victory. It is possible their reckless course saved France from the coalition, and was a result which the more wavering and scrupulous policy of the Constitutionals and Girondins would not have accomplished. But their mission fulfilled, their services were no longer desirable. They had swept away the use with the abuse, in church and state, morals and religion. They had proved themselves efficient exterminators of foreign and domestic foes; but the time had arrived when the course of the Revolution ought to be stayed, and the guillotine cease to be the head magistrate of a community, aspiring to be civilized.

The Directory proceeded with caution, but vigour and perseverance. The first point to attain was to annihilate the disturbing influence of the clubs, which, with the aid of the populace, had dictated the proceedings of the Convention†. The meetings of the Jacobins were suppressed, and the attempt at their revival in the Pantheon defeated. The more violent of them were gradually weeded from the municipality of Paris, and from offices of power and trust in the government. Barrere, Billaud-Varennes,

* Considerations on the French Revolution, ii., 121.

† Dumont, in speaking of the influence of the Jacobins and other affiliated societies, says, "the whole of the people were excited by these societies, which soon became rivals of the Assembly. A member, who had no influence with the Assembly, had only to affect exaggerated democracy, and he became a hero among the Jacobins. These societies became hot-houses, in which every venomous plant, that could not be made to grow in the open air, was forced to maturity" (Recollections of Mirabeau, 284). It was from this source Robespierre, Danton, Marat, and other sanguinary spirits, derived their ascendancy.

Collot D'Herbois, Vadier, and others of the party in the Convention were expatriated. Inflammatory journals were suppressed; and to lessen the influence of popular clamour, the galleries in the Convention, for spectators, were reduced. The Jacobins felt their power being undermined: tenacious of life, they tried by repeated insurrections to recover their ascendancy: their last effort was the unsuccessful conspiracy of Babeuf, in 1796. The directorial government persevered in its policy of conciliating the moderate and repressing the anarchists, till its dissolution in 1799, when it was superseded by the consulate.

The Convention dissolved itself in October, 1795, having first established a new constitution, the nature of which, as well as its fierce contest with the Parisian sections, are set forth in the "Occurrences." It had sat three years, during which it had exercised legislative and executive power in a wonderful manner. Its glorious acts and criminal excesses are the theme of history. With a bold hand it had smote into the dust a monarchy which the superstition of fourteen centuries had consecrated. With remorseless energy it destroyed the dominant factions that successively rose in its own bosom. It acknowledged no distinctions, prescription, or privilege, save that of talent and patriotism, to which it opened a boundless career. Standing alone, it defeated the confederated despotisms of Europe, transformed the refuse of cities into conquering heroes, and created exhausted resources out of the spoils of foes and traitors. Its course was dazzling; often marked with fire, blood, and mourning, but it reached the goal; saved France, and raised her to a height of power she had never attained since the days of Charlemagne.

The commencement of 1795 was a favourable moment for England withdrawing from a hopeless contest. The object of the war was unattained and unattainable. The Bourbon cause was hopeless, and the "march to Paris" had proved a dear-bought illusion. France, in the language of Mr. Pitt, had become "an armed nation." It was vain to expect that mercenary legions would triumph over a powerful and enthusiastic people. Defeated ourselves in Holland, the Netherlands severed from Austria, Savoy from Sardinia; and peace concluded by the republic with Prussia, Spain, and Tuscany, what could be hoped from perseverance under so many disasters? The destruction of the Toulon fleet, the acquisition of Corsica and Guadeloupe, and the naval victory of lord Howe, would not counterbalance the loss of so many allies and rich provinces: moreover, the spirit of the people in the two countries had changed. Anarchy had subsided in France after the dispersion of the Terrorists, and a government of apparent stability had been established. With the restoration of order and humanity the hostile feelings of the English had abated: they had ceased to be apprehensive that a spirit of insubordination would be diffused by her infectious example, or rank and property be endangered.

The war itself had brought many domestic evils, besides increased taxation, and a vast addition to the public expenditure. The liberties of the people had been abridged by the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act—by inundating the country with spies and informers—and by arbitrary and vindictive prosecutions. The irregular trials and severe punishments inflicted on the Scotch reformers, in 1793, and the attempt to crush at one blow those of England in the following year, excited general disgust and indignation. Such was the increase of popular discontents that the king was assailed in his carriage, and his life endangered, on the opening of parliament, in 1795. This violence, and the activity of the reform societies, gave rise to new laws for the better preservation of his majesty's person, and the prevention of public meetings for political purposes. The minister, however, was tenacious of his purpose: with the loss of allies, and the loss of popularity, he still clung to the delusive hope that the fiscal resources of the enemy would be exhausted; just as if a revolutionary government, with a devoted population of 25 millions, a fertile soil and fine climate, reinforced by conquests that had added one-fourth to its means, could ever want the sinews of war!

It was a war against principles, but only principles on one side. Democratic excesses were sought to be punished, but not the crimes of cabinets. Commiseration was felt for the death of a monarch, but none for the extinction of a nation. In 1791 the Poles reformed their government, and established a free constitution. In the following year Russia, with the concurrence of Austria and Prussia, overran their country, and forcibly put down their constitution. Neither a democratic republic in France, nor a constitutional monarchy in Poland, would satisfy the caprice of regal despots. In 1793 Poland was partly dismembered: in 1794 her name, in lieu of that of France, as Mr. Burke had announced, was expunged from the map of Europe. The British government was an unmoved spectator of the annihilation of a member of the "great European family," neither expressing indignation at its injustice, nor alarm for the loss of that balance of power which, for a century preceding, it had been almost the exclusive object of her foreign policy to maintain.

In 1795 the professed object of the war against France changed; it was no longer against her form of government, her irreligion, nor her levelling doctrines; but against her ambition and territorial aggrandizement,—evils which the war itself had created. The year 1797 seems to have been its most disastrous epoch.

By the victories of General Buonaparte the emperor was compelled, for the safety of Vienna, to conclude the treaty of Campo Formio, which severed Belgium and Italy from the empire, and left England singly to contend with the gigantic power of the republic. Intoxicated by success, the Directory threatened to invade England, assembled an army on the opposite coast, called the Army of England, and actually sought to raise a loan on the credit of British spoils. Public credit became affected; the funds fell; there was a run on the northern banks, which extended to the Bank of England, already drained of specie by heavy remittances to the Continent, and it was compelled, in obedience to an Order in Council, to stop payment in coin. This was in February. Scarcely had the public apprehensions on this subject began to subside, than a series of mutinies broke out in the fleets at the Nore and Portsmouth, which continued two months, and at one time assumed so alarming an aspect, as to threaten the safety of the navy, either by the sinking of the ships, or their surrender to the enemy by their rebellious crews. These disorders being quelled by a union of firmness and concession, public attention was next called to the critical state of Ireland. Societies had there been generally established of an opposite but alike dangerous description—the United Irishmen, seeking the redress of wrongs by foreign intervention, and the Orangemen, to uphold a system of injustice by irritating outrages, and persecution. The violence of both had its natural vent in a bloody civil war, which burst forth in the following year. Out of this calamity arose the common good to both king-demands of the TRANSATLANTIC UNION; which, after much delay and negotiating in the reconciliation or purchase of existing interests, was finally consummated in the last year of the century.

Though the fortunes of the country were alarmingly depressed in 1797, it rapidly emerged from the nadir of adversity. One favourable circumstance of that year was the low price of bread, wheat being one-third or one-fourth less in price than the average of the two preceding years. Public difficulties tended to unite the people by lessening the asperity of factions. Moreover, the national spirit had been roused by the arrogant conduct of the French Directory, who had dismissed Lord Malmesbury, sent on a pacific mission to the republic, with a haughtiness akin to that evinced by Lord Grenville in the dismissal of M. Chauvelin in 1793. After the victory of Camperdown all uneasiness ceased, as to the spirit of British seamen. The sailing of the grand Toulon armament, under Napoleon Buonaparte, to Egypt in May 1798, removed any apprehension as to a descent on this kingdom. A few months after, this powerful fleet was destroyed in gallant style by Admiral Nelson, in the bay of Aboukir. This victory had an electric effect on the spirits of the people, momentarily depressed by the issue of the Ostend expedition. It also roused the spirits of the continental states opposed to the power of France, which had begun to be unpopular from the invasion of Switzerland, and the rapacity exercised in Italy and the Netherlands.

The year 1799 was pregnant with important events. At home it commenced with the imposition of a tax of ten per cent. on all incomes above 200*l.*, with a diminishing ratio on incomes below that sum, and not less than 60*l.* On the Continent, aided by English subsidies, a THIRD COALITION (that of Pilnitz being the first), not less formidable than the second, was formed against the French Republic. Russia had taken the place of Prussia in the new confederacy, and Naples and Turkey of Sardinia and Tuscany. Except in Holland, where a combined English and Russian force failed in an effort to restore the Stadtholder, the allies were signally successful; and even in Holland the Dutch fleet in the Texel fell into the hands of the English. The expedition, however, was very disastrous to the British, who were compelled to sign a humiliating convention, besides suffering severely from the attacks of the enemy, the severity of the weather, and the hostility of the inhabitants, whom they had professedly come to aid in throwing off the republican yoke. From Italy the French were driven by the victories of Marshal Suvarof, aided by the counter-revolution effected in the kingdom of Naples and the dominions of the Pope. Amidst these reverses General Buonaparte landed in France, from the conquest of Egypt, and was received as the saviour of the country. From his great and varied talents he was looked upon as peculiarly fitted to retrieve the affairs of the republic, which had suffered in his absence through the incapacity of the Directory, unable at once to cope with the coalition on the frontier, and resist in the interior the machinations of royalists and Lordships. A revolution followed in November, of an extraordinary character described in the "Events") and by which Buonaparte began his reign as Consul of the republic.

Immediately after his elevation to the consular chair, he was imprisoned on the 14th, communication to the King of England for a pacific overture not meeting a favourable reception, he began his reign May 22 following. He had attempted to join the emigrants for opening the campaign of 1800. The vine, for his death caused a second excitement in Europe disproporthe safety of his capital. England was again left single on the battle-field undismayed, but weary of hostilities. This time her enemies had multiplied; the emperor Paul of Russia had not only capriciously withdrawn from the coalition, but revived the armed neutrality of the northern powers in defence of maritime rights. It was speedily dissolved by his sudden death and the cannon of Admiral Nelson.

The spirits of the nation rose with its difficulties. Without an enemy on the Continent, the First Consul in 1801 revived the threat of an invasion of England. It proved, like all similar threats, an idle vaunt, but served to call forth the energies of the people in a proud array of defenders. The splendid victories of Alexandria and Copenhagen, the one a land and the other a naval triumph, gave signal lustre to the British arms in the last year of hostilities. The war had now become without an adequate object. Invasion was too hazardous an experiment even for the adventurous mind of Buonaparte. England was undisputed master at sea, France on land; neither belligerent could act offensively towards the other: like the man cased in armour, they could neither injure nor be injured. Under these circumstances peace became the natural wish of both nations.

Preparatory to this a change of great importance had occurred in the councils of Britain. Mr. Pitt, unable to redeem his pledge to the Irish, to carry, as a condition of the Union, catholic emancipation, had resigned, on that popular ground, the premiership, in which he was succeeded by Mr. Addington. One great obstacle to a pacific negotiation was thereby removed. Preliminaries of peace were signed between England and France, October 1, 1801, but a definitive treaty was not concluded till the spring of the following year. France seized the opportunity afforded by the intervening armistice of pursuing, with restless activity, various ambitious objects. An expedition was fitted out for the recovery of St. Domingo and Guadeloupe; the last object was promptly attained, and slavery re-established. Louisiana was ceded to France by Spain, and soon after sold to the American States. Parma was annexed to France, and the First Consul procured himself to be made president of the Cisalpine Republic. These secret treaties and annexations produced jealousies, but did not suspend the negotiations at Amiens.

During the two last years of the war England had been visited by an intense scarcity, occasioned by the deficient harvests of 1799 and 1800. In March, 1801, the quartern loaf of 4lb. 5½ oz. rose to 1s. 10½d., but the harvest of that year, being unusually abundant, it fell in November to 10½d. (Annual Register, xliii. 166.) While the dearth lasted, parliament tried to economize the national consumption by legislation; prohibiting the use of other than brown bread, and of bread that had not been baked twenty-four hours. The economical wisdom of the judges was not less preposterous than that of the legislature; for they fostered popular prejudices against a useful class of middle-men, by severely punishing (as will be remembered in the "Occurrences" of the year) the reasonable speculative union of firmness and capitalists. The sufferings of the people had the effect of critical state of Ireland useful statistical inquiries into the national resources; an opposite but alike desired time passed, in 1800, for ascertaining the population, redress of wrongs by committee made a useful report on the nature and a system of injustice binds of the kingdom. of both had its natural suspense the definitive Treaty of Amiens was signed, following year. Out of hand gave up all her colonial acquisitions, except concluded by the English in the East Indies, nor by the French on the Continent.
 † existing treaties were not disturbed, neither those

Thus terminated the first revolutionary war. During nine years a dreadful experiment had been made,—by which rulers learnt the danger of tyranny—the people that of anarchy, and statesmen the risk of one nation interfering in the internal affairs of another. Like most wars in which England had been engaged, it was unnecessarily protracted. Its commencement was perhaps unavoidable, in the existing spirit of the people; but its long continuance was voluntary. After the close of 1794, as before observed, the chief obstacles to peace had disappeared, and had it been then concluded Europe would have escaped dire calamities. It was only after the establishment of the Directory that the French became intoxicated with the love of conquest; that the illusions of republican liberty were exchanged for the illusions of military glory; that the aim of making one nation free was perverted to that of making other people slaves. It was this change of direction in the national feeling of France that raised from obscurity to the chief magistracy a soldier of vast genius, whose ambition was insatiable, and element desolation. By the elevation to the supreme power of Napoleon Buonaparte, the Revolution seemed to be closed. It was begun and finished by the military; by their aid the Bastille was taken, in 1789; by their subsequent desertion of the populace, siding first with the Convention, next the Directory, and, lastly, the Consulate, the democracy was overpowered, and order and internal quiet re-established.

EVENTS AND OCCURRENCES.

A.D. 1793. Jan. Ireland much disturbed by the outrages of the Defenders, who in large bodies attack the houses of Protestants, and plunder them of their arms.

The empress of Russia assigned portions of land in the Crimea to French emigrants.

10. The common council of London offered a bounty of 40s. for every able seaman, and 20s. for every ordinary seaman, above the bounty granted by Government.

Mr. Silva and his maid-servant murdered at Chelsea: his nephew, who committed suicide a few days after, by swallowing arsenic, was strongly suspected.

16. TRIAL OF LOUIS XVI.—This extraordinary proceeding was nearly concluded at the end of last year. The charges upon which the king had been arraigned were, that he "had been guilty of a conspiracy against liberty, and of attempts against the general safety of the state." On the 16th inst. the Convention met to determine the punishment Louis was to suffer. After a long deliberation, the president announced to the assembly that of 721 votes, 366 were for death, 319 for imprisonment during the war, two for perpetual imprisonment, eight for a suspension of his execution after sentence, till after the expulsion of the Bourbons; 23 were for not putting him to death, unless the French territory was invaded by any foreign power; and one was for death, but with commutation of punishment. Barrere the president then took off his hat, and said, "In consequence of this I declare, that the punishment pronounced by the National Convention against Louis Caput is—DEATH." The duke of Orleans, cousin of the king, voted for death, as did Sieyes. "sans phrase," an expression of the abbé that became proverbial. Thomas Paine made an ingenious speech in favour of banishment, during which he was interrupted by Marat, who said he was "a quaker." An effort was made to delay the execution of the sentence, but this appeal was negatived on the 19th inst. by 380 to 310 voices after a protracted sitting of thirty-six hours.

18. Lord George Gordon having suffered five years' imprisonment for libels, appeared to offer bail for his good behaviour. He wore a long beard, after the Jewish fashion, and informed the court he had entered into the "holy covenant of the circumcision." Bail objected to by the attorney-general, and his Lordship remanded.

21. Louis XVI., in the 39th year of his age, beheaded. He began his reign May 10, 1774; was driven from the Tuileries August 10, 1792; imprisoned on the 14th, and dethroned Sept. 22 following. He had reigned 18 years and three months. The failure of his attempt to join the emigrants was a misfortune, for his death caused a revengeful excitement in Europe disproportionate tionate to the occasion, and only atoned for crimes of which he was guiltless,—the ambition of Louis XIV. and the profligacy of the regency and succeeding reign. He was weak, but better instructed than some of his predecessors, and in good times would have been reckoned a good prince. Lafayette says (Memoirs iii.) he neither knew how to get rid of a bad minister, nor keep a good one.

24. M. Chauvelin ordered to leave the kingdom within eight days. Persons connected with public establishments, and of rank and opulence, rejoiced at the abrupt dismissal of the French minister.

25. Lord Auckland, the British ambassador at the Hague, presented a memorial to the states-general severely reprehending the French convention.

27. The court goes into mourning for Louis XVI., which was generally done in London.

28. WAR WITH FRANCE.—A royal message delivered to parliament, informing them that the king had determined to augment his forces “for supporting his allies, and for opposing views of aggrandisement and ambition on the part of France, at all times dangerous to the interests of Europe, but peculiarly so when connected with the propagation of principles subversive of the peace and order of all civil society.” Upon this message an animated debate ensued; on one side were arrayed the delinquencies of France in the execution of Louis XVI. and the restless ambition of her rulers; on the other, those of the allies in the Brunswick manifesto, and dismemberment of Poland.

30. Citizen Maret arrived in London with fresh proposals to avert hostilities, but was forthwith ordered to quit the kingdom.

Feb. 1. The French convention having issued a declaration setting forth the grounds of hostilities, declared war against England and Holland.

2. An order of council directing all aliens to reside within 50 miles of Cornhill, and ten miles distant from the sea coasts and dock-yards.

5. An embargo on French vessels.

8. The empress of Russia interdicted all intercourse between her subjects and France.

11. A message from the king announced the declaration of war by France. Next day the message was debated. The ostensible grounds of war were alleged to be the opening of the Scheldt, the exclusive navigation of which had been guaranteed to the Dutch by treaty; second, the fraternizing decree of November 19th; and third, the danger to Europe from the progress of the French arms. The restoration of monarchy in France was the declared aim of the allies; and was alleged to be, though not avowed, that of the English ministers.

12. The common council of London unanimously agreed to address the king, assuring him of their loyalty and support.

13. Sir John Scott appointed attorney-general, and John Mitford, esq., solicitor-general.

15. Plan of a new constitution presented to the French convention, drawn up by Condorcet, and founded on pure republican principles; it was deemed impracticable by all parties, and laid aside, in consequence of which the executive authority continued vested in the convention.

17. Dumourier invaded Holland.

18. RESOLUTIONS OF THE OPPOSITION.

—Mr. Fox brought forward five resolutions stating the specific grounds on which the opposition differed from ministers as to the necessity of war. 1. That England was not justified in going to war with France on account of her internal affairs. 2. That the complaints against France might have been obviated by further negotiation. 3. That ministers had never distinctly stated the terms on which they would be disposed to persevere in a system of neutrality. 4. That the rights of independent nations, and the tranquillity of Europe, had been supremely neglected by ministers in regard to Poland. 5. That it is the duty of ministers not to form any engagements which may be an obstacle to a separate peace with France, or which may imply that England is acting in concert with other powers, for the unjustifiable object of dictating a form of government to France. A vehement debate ensued on these propositions. On the side of Fox were Grey, Sheridan, Whitbread, Jekyll, Adams, Lambton, Smith, and Maitland; on the side of Pitt were Burke, Jenkinson, Dundas, Powys, Hill, Basset, Cornwall, Houghton, and Windham. The House divided on the previous question—ayes 270; noes 44. Resolutions lost by a majority of 226. In the lords, the war policy of ministers was chiefly supported by lords Grenville, Darnley, Carlisle, Porchester, Kinnoul, Stormont, and Loughborough; and opposed by Stanhope, Lansdowne, Derby, and Lauderdale.

23. Mr. Holland sentenced to pay a fine of 100*l.* and be imprisoned one year, for publishing Paine's “Address to the Addressers.”

24. Daniel Isaac Eaton tried, but acquitted, for a libel called “Hog's-wash; or Politics for the People.”

26. Three battalions of guards having been first reviewed by the king, embarked at Greenwich for Holland.

Mar. 1. A proclamation for a general fast to be observed in England on the 18th, and in Scotland on the 19th inst. Also a proclamation offering a pardon to all deserters.

The French under general Miranda compelled to raise the siege of Mâestricht.

3. Prince of Saxe Cobourg defeated the French with the loss of 5000 men, under General Valence.

4. The French republic declared war against Spain.

15. Sir John Scott introduced his "Traitorous Correspondence Bill," which prohibited not only the usual intercourse with an enemy (denominated high treason), but also the purchasing lands in France, or investing capital in French funds, and other novelties. It was modified before passed into a law.

17. Dumourier defeated with great loss by the prince of Cobourg; the Austrians in consequence recovered the whole of the Netherlands.

19. DEATH OF MANSFIELD.—This eminent judge was in his 89th year, and had only retired in 1788 from the court of King's-bench, where he had uprightly presided 32 years. He was born at Perth, but was educated and had lived in England since three years of age. His taste was classical; he was fond of letters, an elegant and adroit speaker, and subtle in argument. Dunning used to say of him, that when wrong, the faults of his reasoning were not easily detected, and when right he was wholly irresistible. Too timid for a shining statesman, or even liberal one, his chief field of distinction was in judicial administration. By improvements in practice, and unusual promptitude of decision, he kept his court free of arrears; and though during the American war the number of causes annually disposed of averaged 800, hardly one of his decisions was reversed (Law Mag. v. 73). He looked more to justice than strict law in his adjudications, and except in libel cases, he inclined to a liberal interpretation of legal dicta, and their adaptation to existing usage. The growth of commerce brought before him many novel and intricate questions of mercantile rights: these he tried to settle upon general principles; and to him the country is mainly indebted for its commercial law, especially the part of it bearing on contracts and bills of exchange. This celebrated judge left no issue. The bulk of his fortune, which was very considerable, comprising upwards of 25,000*l.* a year on mortgages, besides property otherwise invested, descended with his title, to his nephew, lord Stormont. Mansfield was favourable to religious liberty, and was among the sufferers by the No Popery riots: he refused to receive, though offered, any public compensation for the destruction of his house and furniture.

20. A Liverpool privateer under sail overset and sunk in the Mersey by a gust of wind, owing to her guns being on the lee-side.

25. A treaty of commerce concluded with Russia for six years by lord Grenville.

27. Dumourier in a conference with the Austrian colonel Mack, at Ath, forms a design to march on Paris, to re-establish the constitutional monarchy of 1791.

30. Ostend taken possession of by the English, under general Macbride.

A bill passed the Irish house of commons for admitting Roman Catholics to the elective franchise.

FRENCH DECREES.—In the course of this month, a revolutionary tribunal was established at Paris, for the trial of political offences; it consisted of six judges chosen from the convention, and became an instrument of blood. The convention finding the ties of property loosened by the confiscation of regal, ecclesiastical, and hereditary property, passed a decree denouncing the punishment of death against any one who should propose an Agrarian law, or attempt to injure territorial, commercial, or personal property. Another decree of the 29th inst. punished with death all who wrote in favour of monarchy.

Apr. 1. Dumourier arrests the deputies sent to arrest him, and delivers them up to the Austrians as hostages for the safety of the Bourbons.

2. Le Brun, the French minister, applied to lord Grenville for a passport for a person invested with full powers to treat for peace: to this application no answer was returned.

4. The French army indignant at the treachery of Dumourier, he had a narrow escape to the Austrians, accompanied by general Valence and young Egalité (Philip present king of France), son of the duke of Orleans. Next day Dumourier issued a proclamation to the French army, recapitulating his services; it was accompanied by a manifesto from prince Cobourg, renouncing all views of conquest and limiting his intervention to the establishment of the constitution of 1791.

7. Committee of Public Safety established at Paris to prevent conspiracy and insurrection.

8. A grand council held at Antwerp, at which were present the duke of York, count Mettermich, prince Cobourg, lord Auckland, and the Prussian and Spanish ministers. Here the plan of operations was changed, and the promises in Cobourg's manifesto of the 5th inst. rescinded.

12. Richard Phillips, afterwards sheriff of London, the printer of the Leicester Herald, convicted at the Leicester sessions of selling Paine's Rights of Man, was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment.

The Bank of England began to issue 5*l.* notes.

15. Died at his apartments, New Inn, aged 59, Forster Powell, the celebrated pedestrian. He was a native of Horsforth near Leeds, and had been articled to an attorney. His favourite walking journey was from London to York and back, which he performed four times, each in less than six days, though the severe exertion of the last, in 1792, is supposed to have hastened his death.

25. COMMERCIAL CREDIT BILL.—The spirit of commercial speculation, and the vast extension of paper currency, having produced great mercantile embarrassments, Mr. Pitt moved for a select committee to take the subject into consideration. From its report the minister moved for an issue of five millions of exchequer bills, to be advanced, under certain regulations, to those who should apply for such assistance, and give security for the repayment of them, at a fixed time.

29. A French privateer, with her prize, the Spanish register ship "San Jago," was captured, having on board 694 cases of silver, each containing 3000 dollars; 33 cases of gold, besides plate and jewels value 500,000*l.*; 16 cases of silver in bars; 2,262 quintals of bark, exclusive of other valuables. The cargo had been two years in collecting in South America, and was supposed to be worth upwards of 1,200,000*l.*

May 6. PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.—Mr. Charles Grey brought forward his celebrated motion for a reform in the national representation. Numerous petitions had been previously presented to the house in favour of this measure. That from Sheffield was signed by 8,000 names; from Norwich by 3,700; from Birmingham by 2,700; from Huddersfield by 1000; from London and Westminster by 6000; but the most remarkable one was from the Society of the Friends of the People, presented by Mr. Grey himself. It occupied fully half an hour in the reading, and excited a strong sensation by the ability it evinced, and the elaborate analysis it gave of the incongruities in the parliamentary system. The prayer of this petition was to remove these incongruities, restore triennial parliaments, and lessen the expenses of elections. Among the facts stated and offered to be proved, were, that 71 peers, by direct nomination or influence, returned 163 members, and 91 commoners 139 members: thus in England and Wales only (exclusive of the 45 for Scotland) 302 members, being a decided majority of the commons, were returned by 162 individuals (Ann. Reg. xxxv. 96). These disclosures made a deep impression, and continued to work on the public mind. Till at length the honourable mover, thirty-seven years after, was enabled, seconded by the general voice, and in the high station of premier, to remove the more revolting discrepancies. But the alarm occasioned by the disturbing aspect of the French revolution prevented any immediate effect, and the motion for a committee of inquiry, opposed by Pitt, Jenkinson, Windham, and Burke, was negatived by 282 to 41 voices.

8. James Ridgway and H. D. Symonds, booksellers, were brought into the court of King's-bench to receive judgment for selling Paine's works, and the "Jockey Club." They were fined and severally sentenced to four years' imprisonment in Newgate.

The French defeated near St. Amand, and general Dampierre mortally wounded; in this battle the British under the duke of York severely suffered.

13. Robert Mackreth, M.P., sentenced to pay a fine of 100*l.* and to six weeks' imprisonment, for challenging the solicitor-general (Scott) to fight a duel.

23. The French defeated, and the allies enabled to lay siege to Valenciennes.

27. John Frost tried before lord Kenyon, and found guilty of uttering seditious expressions at the Percy coffee-house, Rathbone place. The seditious words were, "I am for equality; I see no reason why one man should be greater than another; I would have no king, and the constitution of the country is a bad one." Mr. Frost was sentenced to be struck off the roll of attorneys, to be imprisoned six months, to stand in the pillory, and give security for his good behaviour.

31. On the motion of sir John Sinclair, an address to the king was agreed to, for the establishment of a Board of Agriculture.

The Neapolitan ambassador, who had just arrived at his hotel in Jermyn street, put an end to his existence by a pistol.

GIRONDINS AND JACOBINS.—The contest between the two republican parties which divided the convention, the Brissotins or Girondins, and the Mountain or Jacobins, had now reached a crisis. The former as the most moderate, fell into suspicion among the people, excited by the inflammatory publications of their opponents. Up to the 31st inst. the successive sittings of the convention had exhibited a sad spectacle of violence and tumult. Early on the morning of that day the tocsin was sounded, the général beaten, and the alarm gun fired. Deputations appeared at the bar of the convention demanding, among other things, the arrest of the ministers Claviere and La Brun, and of the principal Girondins, Barrère, who had with great address oscillated between the factions, now took a decided part with the Jacobins, and in the name of the Committee of Public Safety proposed that the accused deputies should be suspended from their functions. Next day the tumults were renewed; the hall of the assembly was surrounded with an armed multitude, and cannon planted in the avenues. The convention being no longer free in its deliberations, the president and some of the members attempted to make their escape and separate; but Henriot, at the head of the Parisian guards, threatened them with a discharge of musketry if they did not return. So coerced, a decree passed for the arrest of Brissot, and other deputies of the Gironde party. By this triumph all power became vested in the Jacobins, directed by Robespierre, Danton, and Marat. Within about a month after, a constitution was promulgated, consisting of 124 articles, recognizing, in full extravagance, the doctrine of equality. Population was made the sole basis of representation, the election of members annual, and the suffrage universal. But the constitution of 1793 was never acted upon, it was suspended during the revolutionary crisis, the better to enable the convention to adopt the energetic measures essential to the safety of the republic.

June 5. Daniel Eaton found guilty of publishing, but without criminal intention, Paine's Rights of Man.

12. Saumier taken by the royalists of La Vendée; soon after Angers.

Colonel Dundas and R. Dundas, son of the secretary, stopped near Dartford by eight footpads; Mr. Dundas shot one of the robbers, who then opened the chaise-door and discharged a pistol into the body of colonel Dundas; they next plundered the two gentlemen and went off, carrying along with them their wounded companion.

14. Dumourier apprised lord Grenville of his arrival in London: he was ordered to quit the kingdom in 48 hours. Dumourier had thought of acting the part of general Monk, by restoring the monarchy; but the army being faithful to the revolution, he failed in his enterprise. He had been a soldier of fortune all his life; possessed brilliant talents, but was dissolute, volatile, and unprincipled; resembling in many points our own clever sir Walter Raleigh.

20. The royalists make an unsuccessful attack upon Nantes; they crossed the Loire, and under Stoffet and Larochejacquelin retreated through Brittany to the sea-coast, expecting succours from England.

The society of arts granted their gold medal to Mr. Barber of Barnstable, for growing the greatest quantity of potatoes for sheep.

July 2. Duke of Portland installed chancellor of the University of Oxford with great pomp.

10. A bill passed the Irish parliament against unlawful assemblies and conventions.

13. Jean Paul Marat, a ferocious leader of the Jacobins, assassinated in a bathing machine, by Charlotte Corday, who came to Paris purposely to execute this deed. She denied having any accomplice; declared herself a true republican, and expressed great satisfaction in having rid her country of "its most dangerous enemy." Marat was of doubtful courage, vain, and cynical; like several of the phrenzied demagogues of the period, he had been in the service of the noblesse, and held the post of veterinary-surgeon to the count d'Artois. His natural enthusiasm, inflamed by the course of the revolution, rose to delirium, and he set up a journal entitled the "People's Friend," in which with wolfish fury he inculcated murder, revolt, and pillage. "Give me," said he, "280 Neapolitans, the knife in their right hand, in their left a guine to serve for a buckler, and with these I will traverse France and complete the revolution." He wrote and spoke with facility, in a diffuse, bold, and incoherent manner. He was in his 49th year, and very diminutive in stature. Charlotte Corday, proud of what she deemed a patriotic mission, met her death with unshrinking fortitude.

22. Mentz surrendered to the Prussians.

Lyons, Marseilles, and Toulon, entered into a league to dissolve the convention; several of the accused Brissotians making their escape to different parts of the country, tried to raise commotions.

26. Valenciennes surrendered to the allies, commanded by the duke of York.

Aug. 1. A decree passed the convention for the arrest of all foreigners, subjects of powers at war with the republic.

4. A meeting of political delegates at Edinburgh, for obtaining universal suffrage and annual parliaments; they dated their resolutions in the first year of the "British convention," established committees of organization, secrecy and finance; and instituted primary and provincial assemblies, after the model of the French.

15. LEVÉE EN MASSE.—The Committee of Public Safety had made such energetic exertions, that the French had now fourteen armies in the field, and 1,022,902 men actually embodied. On the 15th Barrère introduced a project for a levée en masse; it allowed of no substitutes, and was the origin of that formidable instrument of military power, the conscription.

18. French defeated at Lincelles by the British under general Lake.

21. Lyons besieged by the republicans.

22. London surrendered to Lord Hood.

30. SCOTCH REFORMERS.—The trials of Muir and Palmer excited a strong interest in Scotland, from their talents and respectability, Mr. Muir being a promising young advocate at the Scottish bar, and Mr. Palmer a unitarian minister of Dundee. The weightiest charge against Muir was that of lending a copy of Paine's Rights of Man to a person who "begged a reading of that popular book." He was tried on the 30th, and sentenced to fourteen years' transportation. Mr. Palmer was tried at Perth, on the 17th of the ensuing month; he was charged with publishing a seditious address, and sentenced to seven years' transportation. At the close of December, Dr. Skiving and Messrs. Margat and Gerald were apprehended at a meeting of the reform delegates at Edinburgh, and tried on similar charges of seditious practices, and sentenced to fourteen years' transportation. These severe sentences, inflicted under an old Scottish statute, on the vague charge of sowing discord between the king and people, caused general astonishment. In the conduct of the trials there were great irregularities, not to say injustice; the Scottish judges being more of political partisans than impartial umpires; the chief witnesses against the accused were government spies; and the juries were selected from a political association of Life-Fortune-Men—of goldsmiths' hall.

Sept. 1. A marble bust of John Milton the poet, by Bacon, erected in Cripplegate church.

2. Board of agriculture instituted surveys into the state of agriculture in Britain.

8. The French having collected a powerful force, compelled the English to raise the siege of Dunkirk with precipitation, leaving behind them their battering train. Houchard being denounced before the Committee of Public Safety, for not cutting off the retreat of the British, lost his head; generals Castine and Luckner met the same fate.

20. NEW FRENCH CALENDAR.—By this the year was divided into twelve months of 30 days each, all denominated from some occurrence of the season, and to complete the year five supplemental days were added, absurdly termed sans culotides. The subdivisions of the months were into three decades, the first days of which were festivals or days of rest, intended apparently to obliterate the memory of the Christian sabbath. A few days after, the municipal authorities of Paris appeared in the convention, attended by the bishop and clergy, decorated with caps of liberty, who publicly renounced their offices of Christian pastors.

The bishop of Moulins threw down his mitre and preached the doctrine, that "Death is an eternal sleep." Various allegorical creations, such as Liberty and Equality, were deified, and a young woman was enshrined as the Goddess of Reason on the altar of Notre Dame, to receive, in place of Jesus Christ, the crossings and genuflections of the multitude.

30. A furious riot at Bristol, owing to the erection of a new toll-gate on the bridge; the military being called in, twelve persons were killed and fifty wounded; the riot still continuing, the Bristolians agreed to raise the money necessary to complete the bridge, by other means than a toll.

Oct. 8. Lyons, after a two months' siege, surrendered to the republicans, and there are few examples, even in civil war, of more vindictive cruelty. The guillotine being deemed too slow an engine of destruction, crowds were driven into the Rhone, or butchered in the squares, by discharges of grape-shot. Barrère sent a flaming account to the convention, which decreed that the walls and public buildings of the city should be razed, and Lyons henceforth called La Ville Affranchir.

12. St. Domingo placed itself under the protection of the English, who took possession of Nicola Mole.

13. The Austrians under Wurmser defeated the French under Isenbert at Landau; Isenbert was charged with treachery, and shot.

26. The late queen of France, after a mock trial before the revolutionary tribunal, was beheaded, and her body interred in the same manner with that of her husband, in a grave filled with quick lime. Maria Antoinette possessed both talents and virtues; but proud, indiscreet, vindictive, rash, and petulant, she had exercised a political influence that hastened the fall of the monarchy. It is related of her, that when laid on the fatal block, she turned her head aside to take a last look at the Tuileries. This accomplished woman, a model of grace and beauty, was in her 38th year, and sister of Leopold II. late emperor of Germany.

29. Brissot and 21 other deputies of the Gironde brought before the revolutionary tribunal. They were found guilty of exciting the rebellion of the Federalists against the convention in the south. They were next day beheaded, with the exception of Valaise, who stabbed himself when sentence was pronounced. On the scaffold they evinced neither weakness nor apostasy, but died heroically in the republican faith. They were the true representatives of liberty, men of enlightened minds, of patriotic sentiments and moderate principles, but who necessarily gave way to those men of violence, who, rising out of the molten lead of the revolution, were perhaps better fitted by their furious fanaticism and disregard of ordinary feelings, to carry the republic through the dangers that threatened her existence.

Nov. 6. Philip Egalité, the duke of Orleans, beheaded, unpitied by any one. He was in his forty-sixth year, and met death with great seeming indifference. By a remarkable series of events, his son Louis Philip has quietly taken possession of that throne which was the object of his weak and profligate ambition.

8. The celebrated Madame Roland was involved in the fate of the Gironde, and fell beneath the axe of the guillotine. This able and accomplished woman died with Roman fortitude, exclaiming on the scaffold, "O liberty! how many crimes are committed in thy name." Her husband, the late popular minister, who was among the proscribed Brissotins, on learning the fate of his wife, put an end to his existence near Rouen. Petion, another Girondin, whose republicanism was proof against the fascinations of the queen of France, in the return from Varennes, (Campan's Memoirs, ii. 150.) also perished violently; he was found in the fields half devoured by wolves, and is supposed to have expired of hunger.

12. Bailly, late mayor of Paris, beheaded. He was a man of science, virtue, and patriotism, and president of the Constituent Assembly, and the first to take the famous oath which Mounier dictated in the tennis court,—"never to separate till they had obtained a free constitution."

15. Lotteries suppressed in France.

21. The French army of the Moselle, commanded by Hoche, defeated the Austrians under Wurmser.

26. Robinson the bookseller, of Paternoster-row, received judgment for selling Paine's writings.

27. Rev. Mr. Winterbotham, a dissenting minister, tried at the Devon assizes for preaching two seditious sermons, and sentenced to four years' imprisonment, exclusive of fines and securities.

Dec. 1. By order of the commune of Paris, all the churches were shut; this extravagance excited such public marks of abhorrence, that it was speedily reversed, and the freedom of religious worship restored.

Barnave, a young and eloquent advocate, with four other members of the convention, was guillotined. Barnave, like the Lameths, Dupont, and others, gave an impulse to the revolution and then deserted it; both him and the Lameths, M. Thiers says, did "what they reproached Mirabeau for doing—they secretly lent their aid to the throne, and reconciled themselves with the court."

Mansel, who defended the late king with zeal and talent, fell a victim to Jacobin rage and apprehension.

5. The duke of Sussex married at the parish church of St. George Hanover square, to lady Augusta Murray, daughter of the countess of Dunmore. This marriage was annulled at the suit of the king.

19. EVACUATION OF TOULON. — This town being no longer defensible against the superior force of the enemy, it was evacuated, and upwards of 14,000 of the inhabitants took shelter on board the British ships. Sir Sidney Smith set fire to the arsenals, which, together with an immense quantity of naval stores, and fifteen ships of the line, were consumed. It inflicted a severe blow on the French navy, and inculcated in no small degree the federalists, who, to oppose the rival party of the Jacobins, had called to their aid a foreign and hostile power. Dugommier entered Toulon on the 19th, after a bombardment of twelve hours; the artillery was commanded by Napoleon Buonaparte, who had evinced great zeal and ability.

Muir and Palmer, the Scottish reformers, arrived in a revenue cutter from Leith. An order was immediately sent down to place them on board separate hulks at Woolwich. They were put in irons, and assisted in the common labour on the banks of the river.

20. The first ambassador from the Porte made his public entry into London.

Nearly 2000 persons died this year in Philadelphia of the yellow fever.

FRANCE.—The year closed, leaving the power of France more formidable than at the commencement. Except the destruction of her navy at Toulon, she had sustained no important reverses; while the Imperialists were driven beyond the Rhine, the Prussians compelled to retire to Mentz, and the English to raise the siege of Dunkirk. Internally her power had become more consolidated by the fall of the Girondins, the defeat of their adherents in the south, and of the royalists in La Vendée. All authority was concentrated in the Jacobins, who with much popular address inspired the people with intense enthusiasm; they crowded en masse to the armies, forming an impassable cordon of armed republicans round the frontier. The winter was spent in energetic preparations for the ensuing campaign, and in organizing the vast physical forces that had been roused into action.

POLAND.—The courts of Russia and Prussia determined on a further partition, on the pretext of the growing jacobinical party in Poland. It was in vain the diet protested against this second dismemberment of their country, and implored the assistance of the other European powers. It was obliged to negotiate with its spoilers, and surrender to Prussia territories occupied by 1,136,000 inhabitants, and to Russia, as much as contained 3,500,000.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—Mrs. Griffiths, author of the “Letters between Henry and Frances.” Aged 36. W. Austin, M.D., whose professional practice is said to have been 4000*l.* a year. The earl of Barrymore, by the accidental discharge of his musket, while stepping into his gig. William Hudson, author of the “Flora Anglica” In Newgate, where he had many years been confined for libel, lord George Gordon, known for his share in the anti-Catholic riots of 1780. Richard Tickell, commissioner of the stamp-office, and author of the “Carnival of Venice,” &c. William Robertson, D.D. 73, the celebrated modern historian. John Hunter, surgeon-general to the army, 65, an eminent anatomist and writer on medical subjects.

A.D. 1794. PUBLIC OPINION.—A portion of the British community still continued warm admirers of the French revolution, as a means of diffusing general liberty, and attributed the enormities by which it was disgraced to the aggression of the coalesced powers. But a much more considerable portion (Ann. Reg. xxxvi. 178) viewed with alarm and detestation the establishment of a republic in France; considering its existence incompatible with internal peace and the safety of the constitution. In this view doubtless the government coincided, though the re-establishment of the French monarchy was not one of the avowed objects of hostilities. Meanwhile, to counteract the schemes of the disaffected, a system of extreme watchfulness and coercion was introduced. Spies were actively at work throughout the kingdom, and a series of relentless and crushing persecutions instituted against persons who made themselves conspicuous as political partisans, or the disseminators of seditious writings and speeches. Among the victims which signalized the commencement of the first month of the new year, were the conviction of Skirving and Margarot at Edinburgh, and of Hamilton Rowan at Dublin.

Jan. 1. The French convention abolished flogging in the army and navy, and substituted other punishments less derogatory to freemen. The armies having in several instances been betrayed by their officers, another decree declared that every general convicted of treason should be executed at the head of the troops he had attempted to betray.

16. Died in his 68th year, EDWARD GIBSON, the celebrated Roman historian. This eminent person had left his favourite retirement at Lausanne, partly on account of the French revolution, whose progress he viewed with uneasiness and aversion. It was as a man of letters Mr. Gibbon derived his chief distinction; as a politician and public man, he was servile and aristocratical. A member of parliament during lord North's disastrous administration, he wore the ministerial yoke on the lowest terms of promotion or emolument, and never seemed to ascend to the dignity of patriotism, or even of principle.

17. A motion made but negatived in the assembly of New York, to abolish the use of the titles of excellency, honourable, and esquire, as inconsistent with the “plainness of republican manners.”

21. PARLIAMENT met. In the royal speech hopes were held out that the resources of France would be speedily exhausted. An augmentation of the navy to 85,000, was unanimously agreed to. In recommending the augmentation of the regular army to 60,000 men, Mr. Pitt said “France had been converted into an armed nation:” an expression much commented upon.

Feb. 2. On bringing forward the supplies, Mr. Pitt stated the interior strength of the kingdom at 140,000 men, and the foreign troops in British pay at 40,000. The total supply for the year was estimated at 20 millions; the ways and means included some new taxes, and a loan of 11 millions. The double taxation to which Roman Catholics had long been subjected was abolished.

3. Their majesties going to the Haymarket theatre, the rush was so great that fifteen persons were trampled to death.

4. The severe sentences passed on Muir and Palmer brought under the notice of the house of commons, and a motion made to assimilate the law of sedition in Scotland to that of England. Negatived by 126 to 31.

13. Canal of Merthyr Tydvil opened.

17. Lord Lansdowne made a pacific motion in the lords, in which he strongly deprecated the folly of “making war against principles.” Negatived by 103 to 13.

Slavery abolished in the French West India islands. To attest the sincerity of their aspirations for universal liberty, without distinction of colour or clime, there were admitted to seats in the convention three deputies from St. Domingo as representatives of that colony, two of whom were mulattoes and one a negro.

A scarcity prevailing in France, a maximum was fixed to the prices of the necessities of life. It was applauded by the Jacobins, either from a mistaken opinion, or love of popularity, as setting bounds to avarice and monopoly (Ann. Reg. xxxvi. 110.)

Mar. Measures introduced for augmenting the militia, and for raising volunteers and voluntary subscriptions for the war.

13. Mr. Gerald convicted of sedition, and sentenced to be transported for 14 years.

23. Martinique surrendered to the British forces commanded by sir Charles Grey.

25. Hebert, Anacharsis Cloots, and 18 others, fell victims to Robespierre. They were the chiefs of the Cordeleur Club, the most wild of the revolutionary fanatics, advocating not only extreme equality, but an Agrarian law, and the abolition of Christianity.

28. J. B. V. Guillotine, M.D., beheaded at Lyons. He was the inventor or reviver of the guillotine by which he suffered, and which he said he had produced to the world from motives of humanity alone.

An action being brought against a reviewer, it was decided that fair criticism is allowable, provided it does not travel into matter irrelevant and personally injurious to an author.

DEATH OF CONDORCET.—This eminent person was among the proscribed Brissotins, and for nine months had been trying to escape from the creatures of Robespierre; but falling into their hands, he terminated his existence by poison. He was the author of many scientific and literary works of distinguished ability. Like several of his colleagues in the first scenes of the revolution, he relied too exclusively on the power of reason undisturbed by human passions. He was in his 51st year. Condorcet was as intolerant in his philosophy as some bigots in their religion; and being naturally timid, madame Roland said, "he ought only to have been employed to write, not to act."

Apr. 2. Mr. Walker, of Manchester, tried for high treason, and acquitted.

EXECUTION OF DANTON.—This reckless demagogue, who had joined in the destruction of the Cordeliers, soon himself fell a victim to the jealousy of Robespierre. In his fate was involved that of Camille Desmoulins, a man of spirit and ability; Séchelles, the president of the convention on the overthrow of the Girondins; general Westerman, who commanded the popular insurrection, August 10, 1792; Gobat, the Parisian bishop who had renounced his religion; La Croix, Fabre d'Eglantine, Chabot, an ex-capuchin, and some others. The charge against them was an attempt to restore the monarchy. Their real aim was probably to subvert a rival faction, or mitigate the excessive severity of the reign of terror. Danton was in his thirty-fourth year; of athletic form, of undoubted courage, a powerful orator, and of a generous but capricious nature. He was by profession an advocate; profligate and unprincipled, like Mirabeau; and, like him, had taken the money of the court (Lafayette's Memoirs) while ostensibly devoted to the people. The only weakness Danton betrayed was an abortive attempt to conciliate his gloomy and relentless destroyer. This error he redeemed by his subsequent demeanour. Being questioned on his trial, according to the usual forms, respecting his name and abode,—"My name," said he, "will live in history, but my abode will soon be nowhere." He foretold the destruction of his enemies in six months. Only three hours elapsed between the conviction of Danton and his associates and their decapitation.

4. Kosciusko, having placed himself at the head of the Polish insurrectionists, defeated 6000 Russians.

14. Tumults at the Edinburgh theatre; some of the audience refusing to stand while "God Save the King" was being sung.

17. The common-council of London open a subscription for raising a defensive force for the city, to be called the "Loyal London Volunteers."

18. Died, in his 81st year, Charles Pratt, earl CAMDEN, lord-president of the council. Bating some political inconsistencies, he was a constitutional and respectable lawyer and statesman. He had acquired a popularity, which he had almost survived, by his opposition to general warrants in the affair of Wilkes, and to American taxation.

27. Died, at Calcutta, aged 48, sir WILLIAM JONES, one of the judges of the supreme court of judicature; a gentleman highly esteemed for his liberal sentiments, amiable qualities, and varied literary attainments.

28. The subsidy-treaties with Prussia and other powers debated in the house of commons.

May 2. A reward of 1000*l.* offered for the apprehension of Hamilton Rowan, who had escaped from the imprisonment to which he had been condemned for seditious practices.

7. At the instigation of Robespierre, the convention passed a decree, recognising the existence of a Supreme Being, and the immortality of the soul.

11. Elizabeth, sister of Louis XVI., beheaded on a charge of attempting to effect a counter-revolution. She was thirty years old, and met death with resignation, along with 24 other victims, not one of whom she knew.

A message from the king to parliament announced the existence of seditious societies. Several members of the Society for Constitutional Information and of the London Corresponding Society were apprehended on a charge of high treason, and committed to the Tower. Among the arrests were Thomas Hardy and Daniel Adams, secretaries to political societies; John Horne Tooke; Mr. Stone, a coal-merchant; rev. Jeremiah Joyce, private secretary to earl Stanhope; John Augustus Bonney, an attorney; and Messrs. Thellwall, Richter, and Lovatt.

23 Habeas-corpus Act suspended.

26. The convention, on the suggestion of Barrère, decreed that no quarter should be given to British and Hanoverian troops; but the French armies refused to execute it.

30. Resolutions moved in parliament, by the duke of Bedford and Mr. Fox, expressive of a wish for peace.

June 1. Lord Howe obtained a great victory, in the Bay of Biscay, over the French fleet of 26 sail of the line, which the British engaged with 23 sail. Several ships were captured; one of which sunk almost immediately, one being taken possession of. Le Jacobin went down, and not a man of her crew, who cheered in sinking, was saved. In the captured ships alone, the killed and wounded amounted to 1270. The total loss of the British was 904.

8. Corsica united to England.

13. London illuminated three nights, in celebration of Howe's victory. The mob broke the windows of several persons, particularly lord Stanhope, for refusing to illuminate.

18. Mr. Pelham erected a mausoleum near Brocklesby, in Lincolnshire, to the memory of his wife, which cost 30,000*l*.

26. Battle of Fleurus, in which Jourdan completely defeated the allies, under Co-bourg, forcing them to retreat to Halle, 30 miles distant. Brussels and Charleroi were the immediate fruits of this victory. At this battle the French made the new art of aerostation auxiliary to their military triumphs: general Morlot ascending in a balloon, whence he could perceive the slightest movements of the imperialists, which he instantly telegraphed.

A war of extermination began against the Maroons, in the island of Jamaica. Blood-hounds and Spanish chasseurs were employed against them by the governor, lord Balcarras.

July 8. Earl Moira, after forcing his way through the enemy, joined the duke of York in Flanders, with a reinforcement of 10,000 men.

13. Terrible fire in Ratcliffe-highway: the bakehouse of alderman Curtis, and upwards of 600 houses, consumed.

15. Moreau compelled the imperialists to recross the Rhine, and the Prussians to retreat to Mentz.

25. The adventurous Frederick Baron Trenck, so well known for the cruel imprisonment he suffered at the instance of Frederick II. of Prussia, beheaded at Paris. The baron was in his 68th year, and one of the 1200 victims of the reign of terror, sacrificed on the vague charge of conspiracy.

27. FALL OF ROBESPIERRE.—The destruction of so many of the revolutionists, eminent for abilities and their services to the republic, paved the way for the destruction of Robespierre himself. Every victim he sacrificed only served to multiply his objects of suspicion and vengeance. By a decree he had procured to be passed, of the 9th of June, the members of the convention were made liable to be brought before the revolutionary tribunal on the accusation of the Committee of Public Safety. Tallien, Bourdon de l'Oise, Barrère, Fréron, Fouché, and other deputies, who had heretofore been the accomplices of Robespierre, but who were suspected of peculation in their provincial missions, became apprehensive of exposure by the dictator, who was himself totally free from pecuniary corruption. They communicated their fears to the convention, who passed a counter-decree, re-establishing the inviolability of the deputies. Finding his power on the decline, Robespierre tried to sustain his popularity by bringing forward useful measures: one for the speedy payment of prize-money; a second to prevent the importation of forged assignats; a third to reward military merit; and a fourth for the relief of the poor and the prevention of mendicancy. These artifices did not arrest the progress of the party which had begun to be formed against him in the convention, and consisting of some of its most able and resolute members. On the 27th inst. his arbitrary and murderous proceedings were openly denounced by Tallien, supported by Billaud-Varennes and Barrère. Robespierre and his partisans, after vainly trying to obtain a hearing, withdrew to the Hotel-de-Ville. Their dependence was on the clubs, the sections of Paris, and the national-guard. Meanwhile, the convention evinced the utmost firmness and energy. Decrees were passed, declaring their sitting permanent till justice had been executed on the guilty. Robespierre and his accomplices were declared outlaws and traitors; Barras and Legendre were appointed to command the military in their interest, and deputies were sent to different parts of the capital, to exhort the people to arm and assemble in defence of their representatives. The other party were not idle. Henriot, the right-hand man of Robespierre, and commander of the national-guard, surrounded the convention with his troops. But immediately the decree of outlawry against himself and colleagues became known, his soldiers began to desert, and he himself took refuge in the Hotel-de-Ville. Here, during the night, they were vigorously assaulted by the conventionalists, headed by Bourdon de l'Oise. The Jacobins, finding all lost, attempted to turn their arms against themselves. Robespierre discharged a pistol into his mouth, but with no other effect than to disfigure his face; his brother threw himself out of a window; Couthon stabbed himself, but not mortally; only Robas shot himself dead on the spot. Robespierre; St. Just; Fleuriot, mayor of Paris; Vivres, president of the Jacobin club, and the rest of the criminals, to the number of twenty-one, outlawed by the convention, being identified before the revolutionary tribunal, were in the course of the next evening executed, amidst general acclamations. Robespierre suffered last—a frightful spectacle, covered with clotted blood and dirt, and wounded in two places. He was only in his 34th year, and one of the many prodigies of this extraordinary revolution. Like other men, he must be judged by his acts, not his professed intentions, and these show that he was ferocious, proud, subtle, vindictive, envious, and deceitful. He was, however, disinterested: he was poor, and died so, his whole effects at his death selling only for two hundred and forty livres. Moreover, he was consistent; never flinching from the extreme democracy with which he first allied himself, unless the destruction of the Cordeliers and Dantonists were deviations; and these he immolated with as little scruple as Cromwell did the Presbyterians and Levellers when they stood in the way of his ambition. The glory of preserving to France her nationality he shared with others, but hardly in an equal degree. It was the energetic decrees of Barrere that called into action the masses; equality filled them with enthusiasm, and the military genius of Carnot organised victory. By these the country was saved, the Vendean discomfited, the ill-timed insurrection of the Girondins suppressed, and the destroyers of Poland driven from the frontiers. According to M. Thiers, Robespierre was "an honest fanatic," but beneath the mission which he supposed himself called to fill. After his fall a milder administration was attempted, conciliation was substituted in place of terror, the meetings of the Jacobin club were suspended, and the revolutionary tribunal remodelled. The Jacobins had obtained an ascendancy by courting the multitude, and precautions were sought to be taken against the recurrence of a like domination, by the circumscription of popular immunities.

Aug. 1. The government loan, for the relief of commercial credit, appears to have answered its purpose; 2,202,000*l.* were advanced, and the public realized a profit of 4,348*l.*, after defraying the expenses of the commission.

The Spaniards defeated both on the eastern and western Pyrenees by the French.

15. A young man being killed in trying to escape from a recruiting-house in the vicinity of Charing-cross, the mob rose to demolish it.

17. Telegraph invented by the French.

30. French retake Condé and Valenciennes.

Sept. 3. Robert Watt tried at Edinburgh for treason, found guilty, and in the ensuing month was executed. Watt had been a government spy, in confidential communication with secretary Dundas and the lord-advocate, who thought fit to abandon him to his fate. David Downie, another spy, was convicted, but pardoned.

15. Duke of York compelled to retreat across the Maese and Waal, before the superior force of general Pichegru, amounting to 80,000. Breda, Bois-le-Duc, Maestricht, and Nimeguen, successively yielded to the republicans.

20. At Shrewsbury assizes two young gentlemen recovered an estate worth 150,000*l.*, which had been possessed by a Mrs. Lloyd for 20 years.

27. DART PLOT.—Le Maitre, apprentice to a watchmaker, and two others, apprehended on charge of a design to kill the king. It was deposed, by the informer Upton, that an instrument was to have been constructed in the form of a walking-stick, through which a poisoned arrow was to have been blown at his majesty by Le Maitre. The evidence, however, was found not more consistent and probable than that of Titus Oates; and, after a long imprisonment, the accused were discharged.

29. Pichegru crossed the Roer, and, after severe fighting, forced the Austrians, under Clairfait, to retreat with the loss of 13,000 men.

General Massena completely defeated the Austrians and Sardinians in Piedmont.

15. A surgeon and a physician convicted and sentenced to two years' imprisonment in Newgate, for having seditious libels in their possession, with intent to publish them.

17. Engagement between the Spaniards and French. Dugommier was killed by the bursting of a shell in the moment of victory.

23. Coblentz taken by Moreau.

23. STATE TRIALS.—The judges, under a special commission at the Old Bailey, proceeded to arraign the twelve prisoners under a charge of high treason. Mr. Hardy's trial was first entered upon, and the attorney-general, Sir John Scott, occupied nine hours in stating the case for the crown, which he tried to substantiate by the evidence of two government-spies named Taylor and Goshing. The prisoner was ably defended by Erskine and Gibbs; and after an investigation of seven days, pronounced not guilty. Eleven days after, John Horne Tooke was brought to the bar. This gentleman was a political character of long standing, and of high intellectual endowments. He had summoned Mr. Pitt to give evidence, who underwent the ordeal of a searching interrogatory, the object of which was to show that the practices of the reformers in 1794 were precisely of the same import as those of 1780, in which the minister himself had taken part. Mr. Pitt tried to evade a frank confession, on the plea of forgetfulness. Mr. Sheridan was next examined. He gave a straightforward account of the proceedings of the reformers in 1780; upon which Mr. Pitt begged leave to correct his evidence, admitting that he was present at the meetings of delegates from several counties, convened for the attainment of parliamentary reform. The jury deliberated for a few minutes, and returned a verdict of Not Guilty. This verdict, like the former, was received with acclamations. John Thelwall was next put upon his trial, and with the same result,—an acquittal. Here the experiment ended; the crown having no better evidence to bring forward, the remaining were dismissed. The termination of these proceedings was received with satisfaction by many supporters of the government, being viewed as an arbitrary attempt to establish cumulative and constructive treason, and to extend the reign of terror, that had begun at Edinburgh, under a detestable system of espionage, to London. It helped still further to exalt the favourable opinion entertained of the protection afforded by the jury-system in state-prosecutions; though it seems, from the testimony of the last survivor of the accused, confirmed by that of under-sheriff Burchell (Thelwall's Memoirs, by his Widow, p. 434), that some improper practices were resorted to by the council for the crown to obtain juries more subservient to their purposes.

Nov. 4. EXTERMINATION OF POLAND.—General Suvarof, after a desperate resistance, made himself master of Warsaw. Ten hours after resistance had ceased, the massacre was renewed in the suburb of Praga, and upwards of 20,000 Poles were indiscriminately butchered. Poland, in lieu of France, was "blotted out of the map of Europe," by the three partitioning powers completing the dismemberment of the kingdom. The Polish chiefs, Kosciusko and Potocki, were sent prisoners to Petersburg, where they were thrown into dungeons; while king Stanislaus himself soon after died in obscurity, in the same capital.

19. Treaty of commerce concluded between Britain and the United States of America, by which the latter conceded the right of search to the belligerents.

Dec. 6. Lord Abingdon convicted of a libel on Mr. Sermon, an attorney of Gray's-inn, in a parliamentary speech of the noble lord, published by his lordship in a newspaper.

10. Earl Fitzwilliam appointed viceroy of Ireland, his lordship being succeeded by the earl of Mansfield as lord-president of the council. Earl Spencer became first-lord of the admiralty; and the earl of Chatham lord-privy-seal.

30. PARLIAMENT opened by the king, who continued to hold out hopes that the enemies' resources would be soon exhausted. Mr. Wilberforce, an intimate friend of the minister, who had supported him in all his measures, moved an amendment to the address, of a pacific tendency, and was supported by Mr. Banks and sir Richard Hill. Mr. Pitt vindicated the language of the king's speech, which, he said, "did not pledge the house never to make peace with the republican government of France, though he had no idea of a secure peace till the return of the monarchy, which he thought the best form of government for all the nations of Europe." Amendment negatived by 246 to 75.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—Dr. John Russell, author of the "History of Ancient and Modern Europe." At Kinnaird, aged 65, in consequence of a fall down stairs. Mr. Baddeley, the comedian; he left a handsome bequest for his brother-performers at Moulsey. George Colman, patentee of the Haymarket-theatre. Daniel Dancer, one of a family of misers. James Adam, the architect of the Adelphi-terrace and Portland-place.

A.D. 1795. FRANCE AND THE COALITION. The conclusion of the last and the commencement of the present year were signalized by the triumphs of the French arms in every part of Europe, and the dejection with which their successes had impressed most of the members of the coalition. Exclusively of their continual defeats in the field, they had the mortification of knowing that the war was generally unpopular with their subjects, who considered it undertaken to compel France to revert to a monarchical government. Full of this idea the industrious classes throughout Europe reprobated the confederacy against the French republic, and styled it the "war of kings against the people" (Annual Register, xxxvii. 146). In pursuit of their scheme of intervention the allies had been completely baffled by France. The Convention was proud of the pinnacle of glory to which she had been elevated; and, at the close of 1794, they caused to be printed and published a list of their triumphs. Among their conquests were enumerated the Austrian Netherlands and the Seven United Provinces, exclusive of their acquisitions on the Rhine, in Spain, Savoy and Italy. The territories subdued by the republic were the richest and most fertile of the Continent, and computed to contain a population of thirteen millions. In seventeen months they had won twenty-seven pitched battles, besides an innumerable number of inferior actions, in which they had slain 80,000 of their enemies, taken more than 90,000 prisoners; also immense quantities of ammunition and stores, with 3800 pieces of cannon (Belsh. Hist. Geo. III. v. 241). These losses induced many powers to withdraw from the confederacy. The duke of Tuscany was the first who seceded. In the course of 1795, Spain, Sweden, Denmark, and the Swiss Cantons acknowledged the French Republic. Prussia first took the English subsidy, and then made peace with the French. England, Russia, Sardinia, Naples, and the Pope, were the remaining confederates. In Britain the war was becoming rapidly unpopular. Hostilities had from the first been opposed by a large party, who judged our intervention meddling, and libetricide in principle; and this party was now augmented by the secession from government of many who began to despair of a successful issue to the contest, after the defection of our allies, and the victories of the French. Petitions for peace were presented to parliament from the cities of London, Norwich, York and other places, but these were not sufficiently general to produce much effect, and counter-petitions were got up by the partisans of the ministers. Popular discontents were aggravated in the summer by the dearth of provisions, the cruel and illegal practices of crimps for the recruiting service, and the activity of the Corresponding and other political societies.

Jan. 3. Died at Etruria in Staffordshire, in his 64th year, JOSHUA WEDGWOOD, the eminent improver of our earthenware and porcelain manufactures. By his ingenious discoveries and excellent taste, Mr. Wedgwood in a few years turned the current of importation of the finer earthenware into one of exportation. He was the proposer of the Grand Trunk Canal uniting the Mersey and Trent, and subsequently communicating with the Severn. He was liberal to the poor, and of considerable scientific attainments.

10. Pichegru at the head of 70,000 men crossed the Waal, forcing the allies to retreat. Utrecht, Rotterdam, and Dort fell into the hands of the French.

14. Directors of the East India Company prohibited from trading with India in their private capacity.

19. An embargo on Dutch ships.

20. The Stadtholder and his family having made their escape from Holland in an open boat, arrived in London.

Several watchmen and others frozen to death by the severity of the weather.

The lord mayor, aldermen, and livery of London petitioned the house of commons to disclaim any right of interference with the internal government of France.

27. Stadtholderate abolished, and the Batavian republic established under the protection of France. Shortly after the Dutch issued a declaration of the rights of man; but, as an alloy to these advantages, they had to furnish clothing and provisions to their invaders to the amount of 1,400,000*l.*

Feb. 4. A royal message communicated to the house of commons the necessity of a loan for the emperor of Germany. In the discussion that followed, notice was first taken of the misapplication by the king of Prussia of the subsidy granted to him, and which he had employed in effecting his unjust designs on Poland. Mr. Pitt admitted the misapplication of the subsidy by Prussia, but argued that Austria had a deeper interest in the issue of the war. Motion for the loan carried by a great majority.

9. Mr. Gilbert Elliott, the English viceroy, opened the parliament of Corsica.

10. A rapid thaw: the floods, in consequence, did much damage.

A theatre at Madras first opened with the tragedy of "Macbeth."

12. Tuscany made peace with France.

15. Britain concluded a defensive alliance with Russia.

21. Earl Fitzwilliam recalled from the government of Ireland.

23. THE BUDGET. Mr. Pitt brought forward his annual financial statement: 100,000 seamen, and 150,000 landmen, in-under which was voted for the ensuing year. The sum proposed was 18,000,000*l.*, of which the annual capital in the three per cent. was 8,000,000*l.* in the four per cent. was 10,000,000*l.* The expenses incurred by the war which had lasted no more than two years, were calculated at 50,000,000*l.*

20. A public fast day.

21. The regent of Sweden acknowledged the French republic.

The republic concluded a peace with the Vandéens and Chouans.

22. RICHARD BROTHERS, lately a naval lieutenant, apprehended by two king's messengers, and brought before the privy council. Upon examination he was found to be insane; the weak part of the public had been terrified by his pretended prophecies, deduced from the apocalypse, concerning the French revolution and the destruction of London. Brothers styled himself "a nephew of God," and gained a disciple in Mr. Halhead, M.P., who wrote a pamphlet in defence of the veracity of his divine mission.

23. COERCION IN IRELAND. Earl Camden appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland in the room of earl Fitzwilliam. Upon the departure of Fitzwilliam from Dublin on the 25th inst., the citizens appeared in deep mourning. His appointment to the viceroyship last year was anticipated as the prelude to the removal of the few remaining disabilities of the catholics, and with this view his lordship had proposed to "dismiss from office those individuals who had been most conspicuous in opposing emancipation. Amongst them lord chancellor Fitzgibbon, Mr. Beresford, a commissioner of the Irish treasury, and Messrs. Wolfe and Toller, the attorney and solicitor-general. Mr. Beresford was actually dismissed, when a letter arrived from Mr. Pitt, remonstrating against these changes. By the same conveyance earl Fitzwilliam received a dispatch from the duke of Portland, suggesting, for the first time, the doubts of the British cabinet on the expediency of pressing catholic emancipation, and recommending the viceroy to postpone it. This was impossible, Mr. Grattan having already obtained leave to introduce a bill for the removal of catholic disabilities. His excellency replied to his colleagues; he pointed out the danger of retracting; and, with patriotic indignation, refused "to be the person to raise a flame, which nothing but military force could extinguish." (Annual Register, xxvii. 224.) Upon this his lordship was recalled. So soon as this was officially known, the Irish house of commons, on the motion of Mr. Connolly, voted the strongest approval of lord Fitzwilliam's conduct, with the single dissenting voice of Mr. Beresford. Ad-resses followed from all parts of the kingdom, and the people could hardly restrain their indignation at the prospect of coercive measures. A change, however, suddenly came over the legislative part of the nation. Lord Camden reached Dublin on the 31st inst. Less than a fortnight after, a motion of Mr. Grattan's to inquire into the reasons of lord Fitzwilliam's recall was negatived by a considerable majority; and the bill for the relief of catholics subsequently rejected by the same members who had sanctioned its introduction. On this occasion Arthur O'Connor, a young member of the house for the county of Kerry, made an eloquent speech.

24. It appeared at the anniversary of the Royal Humane Society, for the recovery of persons apparently drowned, that the number of persons restored to life amounted to 1169; lives preserved by drags 858; unsuccessful cases 899; total 2926.

April 2. RISING OF THE JACOBINS.—The Girondins after the fall of Robespierre recovered their ascendancy in the convention, and soon after began to avenge themselves on their former opponents. Even some of those deputies who had been instrumental in the overthrow of the dictator, became objects of vengeance, on the charge of participating in his crimes: among them were Barrère, Collot d'Herbois, and Billaud-Varennes. While the trials of these were pending, the mob, incited by the Jacobins, broke into the hall of the convention, calling for bread and the constitution of 1793. The riot, however, was quelled by the armed citizens, and the accused individuals were expatriated to Guiana. Several other members of the Mountain were arrested and imprisoned. A violent insurrection in consequence broke out in the suburb of St. Antoine, which lasted three days, but was ultimately put down by the soldiers of the convention. Disturbances were at the same period created in various parts of France, by the Jacobins on one side, and their rivals on the other, which were not suppressed without bloodshed.

5. Prussia signed a treaty of peace with the French republic, which had thus the satisfaction of being acknowledged by a power that had stood foremost in the confederacy against her. A cessation of hostilities was agreed upon for the north of Germany, which was to be considered neutral ground; and peace was soon afterwards concluded with the landgrave of Hesse and the Elector of Hanover.

8. MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCE OF WALES. The marriage of the prince with the princess Caroline, daughter of the duke of Brunswick, was solemnized with exterior inary magnificence. Considerations of prudence rather than of affection are supposed to have forwarded this union. It appeared, from the inquiries of a parliamentary committee, that the debts of his royal highness amounted to 619,570*l*. Upon which Mr. Pitt proposed that the revenue of the prince should be increased to 125,000*l*., exclusive of the income of the duchy of Cornwall, estimated at 13,000*l*. a year; and that a proportion of this income should be vested in commissioners, for the liquidation of the debts of the prince. The jointure on the princess to be 50,000*l*. per annum.

14. The remains of the British troops embarked at Bremen for England. They had suffered dreadful privations in their retreat through Flanders, from the severity of the weather and hostility of the Dutch, and were reduced to one-fifth of their original number.

20. The Oxford militia, with loaded muskets, proceeded to Seaford, and seized all the motion they could find, and sold it at 4*d*. a lb.; they then seized 2000 sacks of flour at Newhaven, and sold it at their own prices: a detachment of the horse artillery arriving, assisted by the Lancashire fencibles, surrounded the rioters. Some disturbances of less note broke out at Nottingham, Coventry, Nuneaton, Hinkley, and Bedworth.

23. ACQUITTAL OF WARREN HASTINGS.—On this day the trial of Mr. Hastings was terminated, by the sentence of the house of lords. It began Feb. 12, 1788, having lasted seven years, two months, and eleven days, the last being the 149th day on which the court had sat. Mr. Fox and the other managers came into their box at twelve o'clock. The peers entered the hall half an hour afterwards. The mode of proceeding was to put each of the sixteen articles of charge separately, to a question of guilty or not guilty, beginning with the junior baron. Out of 400 peers, only 29 voted. Of these eight, namely, lord chancellor Loughborough, the duke of Norfolk, the earls of Caernarvon, Radnor, Fitzwilliam, Suffolk, Mansfield, and lord Walsingham, voted guilty on some of the charges; but a majority voting not guilty on each charge, the lord chancellor pronounced as follows:—"Warren Hastings, you are acquitted of all the charges of impeachment brought against you by the commons, and of all the matters contained therein" (Ann. Reg. xxxvii. 116). The East India Company paid Mr. Hastings the costs of his trial, amounting to 71,080*l*., and besides conferred upon him a pecuniary donation, and a pension of 5000*l*. a year. Public interest had evaporated in the length of the proceedings, in which party spirit had mingled with the passions of justice.

30. Hon. J. Jackson, who had been convicted of high treason, was brought into the court of King's-bench, Dublin, to receive judgment; upon which he was seized with strong convulsions, and dropping down in the dock, expired. It appeared by an inquest subsequently held on the body that he had taken poison.

May 4. Mr. Brothers, the prophet, confined in Fisher's lunatic asylum, Islington.

REVOLUTIONARY TRIBUNAL.—The members of this terrible instrument of Robespierre's tyranny were called to a severe account. Among the charges brought against them, was that of ordering pregnant women for execution. Such was the mockery of justice, that in one instance they had taken no longer space of time than three hours to try and condemn six individuals (Ann. Reg. xxxvii. 88). The delinquents most execrated were Tallville, the public accuser of the tribunal, and Lebon. The last pleaded his cause for nine successive days before the convention, with as much coolness and resolution as his conscience had been wholly void of offence. He was executed with fifteen others, on the 9th inst.

22. Mungo Park sailed from Portsmouth, for the purpose of exploring the interior of Africa.

26. The Ottoman Porte acknowledged the French republic.

JUNE. IRISH SOCIETIES.—The new policy of ministers towards Ireland gave rise to societies, both for and against the government, of a mischievous character. From this month, the "Society of United Irishmen" began rapidly to disseminate its principles, and enrol amongst its members a great majority of the catholic, and a large proportion of the protestant population. Oaths of secrecy were administered, and a central and graduated system of organization introduced, coupled with the opening of negotiations with the agents of the French government. On the other hand, Orange clubs were instituted; those clubs drove the people to desperation, by a relentless course of vindictiveness, and became the dictators of the government.

7. Luxemburg surrendered to the French, with a garrison of 10,000 men under general Bender; the acquisition of Mentz alone remained to complete the extension of the boundary of France to the Rhine.

EXPEDITION TO QUINORON.—The pacification concluded with the Vendean and Chouan insurgents in February, which produced tranquillity in the disturbed districts, was but of short duration. These people were under the influence of leaders, who maintained a correspondence with the emigrant princes, and were liberally supplied with English gold and paper. In May the Chouans again rose in arms, and early in June 3000 emigrants from England effected a landing in Quiberon Bay, to co-operate with them. After some skirmishes, in which most of the French who had been taken out of English prisons deserted, general Hoche made a nocturnal attack upon the adverse camp, and killed or captured a great part of the emigrant troops. The victors obtained the clothing and equipments of 40,000 men, which had been landed for the use of the numerous bands who were expected to join the Bourbon standard.

9. Died in the Temple in his twelfth year, the only son of Louis XVI. The convention soon after agreed to exchange the sister of this unfortunate prince for the commissioners betrayed by Dumourier to the Austrians, and two French ambassadors to the Ottoman court, who had been seized on neutral ground.

22. The dearth of provisions caused a riot at Birmingham, in which one man was killed by the soldiers.

In consequence of the severity of the cold, so unusual at this season of the year, many thousand sheep newly shorn were killed in different parts of the country; it was computed that in Wiltshire full one-fourth of the flocks was destroyed.

Admiral lord Bridport, with 14 sail of the line and eight frigates, gained a victory off Port L'Orient over the French fleet of 12 ships of the line and 11 frigates, when three ships of the line were captured.

26. Earl Fitzwilliam and Mr. Beresford met near Tyburn, to settle a dispute about places and pensions: just as they had taken their ground at twelve paces' distance, a magistrate interfered, which prevented further proceedings.

A numerous meeting in St. George's Fields, to petition for annual parliaments and universal suffrage: the volunteers of the metropolis were kept in readiness on Kennington common to repress any disposition to riot.

July 7. Flour having risen to 70s. a sack, and the quartern loaf to 1s., the lords of the privy council entered into an engagement, to use in their families only bread of an ordinary quality, to diminish the consumption of flour in their respective establishments, and strongly recommended others to follow their example. The court of common council subscribed 1000*l.* for relieving the poor of the metropolis, and entered into resolutions to carry into effect the recommendation of the privy council.

12. The mob of Westminster attacked the crimping houses; and under an impression that Mr. Pitt countenanced the existing abuses in recruiting, they broke the windows of his house in Downing-street. This had long been a subject of complaint, and a source of tumults in the metropolis. It was remedied by the duke of York, who in the course of the year succeeded lord Amharst as commander-in-chief.

22. Spain made peace with France.

24. Henry Redhead Yorke tried and convicted at the York assizes on a charge of sedition. He was subsequently sentenced to pay a fine of 100*l.* and be imprisoned two years in Dorset goal.

Aug. 22. The French convention decreed that the electors should, in appointing the deputies to the legislative body, choose two-thirds from amongst the members of the present convention; and by another decree it was enacted, that, in default of such election, the convention should fill up the vacancies themselves. These decrees formed a curious contrast to the self-denying ordinance of the Constituent Assembly, which prohibited the re-election of any of its members. The convention was doubtless impressed with the ill effects of the disinterestedness of their predecessors, and deviated into the opposite and less pardonable extreme.

23. NEW FRENCH CONSTITUTION.—The convention adopted the new constitution prepared by their committee, and referred it to the primary assemblies for their acceptance. Its essential parts were, the establishment of a legislative body, consisting of two elective chambers, one of seniors, 250 in number, the other of juniors, 500 in number; one-third of each chamber to be renewed annually. The executive power to be vested in five persons called "The Directors," nominated by the legislative body. One of the directors was to go out yearly and be replaced by the election of another. Public education was provided for; equality of privileges among all citizens declared; religious freedom established, and liberty of speaking and writing fully confirmed.

31. The dearth approaching to famine, that had prevailed during the summer, was remedied by an abundant harvest; in the northern counties the markets were plentifully supplied with the best wheaten flour at 2*s.* 6*d.* per stone of 14 lb.

Sept. 1. Mr. O'Connor and Mr. Griffin found guilty of high treason at Naas in Ireland, and sentenced to be hanged. After sentence, O'Connor made a long speech censuring the abuses of the government.

8. A monument by Flaxman, set up by public subscription at Chichester, to the memory of Collins the poet.

13. Captain Vancouver returned from his voyage of discovery on the north-west coast of America, after an absence of four years.

17. At the Old Bailey the judges declared that gleaming corn is not a custom of strict right, but to be permitted or not at the will of the owner of the ground.

23. The Dutch colony of the Cape of Good Hope taken possession of by the English under general Craig and admiral Elphinstone.

30. French convention decreed the incorporation of the Austrian Netherlands with the republic.

Oct. 4. INSURRECTION OF THE PARISIANS.—The forty-eight sections of Paris, who had usually given the tone to the nation at large, while they unanimously accepted the new constitution, as firmly rejected the law for the re-election of two-thirds of the subsisting convention. The motives of their resistance, as well as the parties who organized it, were different from those which predominated in former risings of the capital. Under Marat, Danton, and Robespierre, the chief actors were the working classes, and their object equality; in the present, the actors were the middle classes, and their object equality too, but an equality compatible with security. Horrified by the atrocities of the reign of terror, the Parisians were apprehensive of its recurrence, by the retention in the new legislature of two-thirds of the convention, most of whom were looked upon as men of blood, implicated in the late sanguinary proceedings of the Jacobins in the metropolis, at Lyons, and in La Vendée. Hence the terrorists sided with the convention against the Parisians, not only as a means of securing an indemnity for past misdeeds, but preserving their supremacy in the government. On the other hand, the royalists aided the sectionists, thinking that the triumph of the moderates might pave the way for the restoration of the monarchy. Neither however the Jacobins nor royalists reaped the full fruits of their calculations. Meanwhile energetic preparations were made for the onset, the convention having secured the aid of detachments of the army. On the night of the 4th, the different sections beat to arms, and at noon on the next day, they were ranged in fighting order, having taken possession of several posts. A bloody conflict now took place between the citizens and regular troops near the hall of the convention, which after the loss of 1000 lives ended in the rout of the Parisians; their opponents had the advantage of artillery, which they used with destructive effect. Barras had the chief command of the conventionalists, subordinate to whom was Napoleon Buonaparte, who on this occasion confirmed the previous impression of his extraordinary military talents. Tranquillity followed, and the constitution and decrees were acquiesced in.

26. A general meeting of the London Corresponding Society was held in Copenhagen fields; the number of persons assembled as members and spectators was very great. Three rostra were erected from which Binns, Thelwall, Hodgson, and John Gale Jones made speeches; and an address, remonstrance, and resolutions were agreed to.

27. NATIONAL CONVENTION dissolved on the day fixed by law; it had sat upwards of three years, namely from October 20th, 1792. It terminated its sittings nobly; for the last decrees which it passed were for the abolition of the punishment of death at the return of peace, and for granting a general amnesty. Previously to the dissolution, attempts were made by Tallien, Legendre, Freron, and other Jacobin chiefs, to restore the ascendancy of their faction, but they were defeated by the energetic efforts of Thibaudeau, Lanjuinais, Boissy d'Anglas, Lepaux, Leage, and Larivière.

28. New French legislature met, and made choice of five directors, namely, Reveillière Lepaux, Reubel, Latourneur De-lamanche, Barras, and Sieyes. Sieyes soon after resigned, and Carnot was chosen in his stead. Of these directors, all except Reveillière Lepaux, were or had been of the predominant party of the Mountain or Jacobin.

29. The king, on going to open parliament, was surrounded by an immense throng of persons of all ranks, who clamorously cried out, "Bread! Peace! No Pitt!" His majesty was much agitated, and the first words he uttered when he entered the house of peers were these, to the lord chancellor: "My lord, I have been shot at." In his progress, one of the glasses of his coach was perforated by a bullet; and on his return he was treated with much rudeness.

30. A proclamation offering a reward of 1000*l.* for the discovery of the authors of the outrage on the king.

Hostilities suspended for three months between the French and Austrian armies.

Nov. 4. A proclamation to prevent seditious meetings, and to apprehend persons delivering inflammatory speeches.

6. Lord Grenville introduced a bill into the lords for the "safety of his majesty's person," and on the same day, Mr. Pitt, a bill into the commons, for the "prevention of seditious meetings." These two bills had for their object the restriction of the right hitherto possessed by the people of assembling for the purposes of petitioning the king and legislature, and of discussing political subjects. They were warmly opposed at every stage in both houses, but carried by more than the usual majorities, in consequence of the daring proceedings of the popular societies. Their duration was limited to three years.

FRANCOIS DIRECTORY.—The feeling of insecurity heretofore prevalent in France, began to subside under the Directory. The Pantheon, a revival of the Jacobin club, was shut by general Buonaparte, and a gradual epuration of the most violent of the faction was in progress in the public offices and municipality of Paris. As a means of lessening the influence of popular clamour over the legislature, the galleries in the convention-hall were reduced to a space not containing more than 300 spectators. A National Institute was established for the promotion of the sciences. It consisted of 144 members, among whom were some of the most illustrious names in France and Europe. In addition a central school or college was established in each department; and a primary school in each commune, to teach writing, reading, arithmetic, and the elements of morality.

21. A common hall in the city of London to petition against the sedition bills; the common council had agreed to a petition in their favour. In Westminster a petition against the bills was agreed to.

Dec. 8. Mr. Pitt brought a message from the king to parliament, to the effect that the state of affairs in France was such that his majesty was ready to treat with the existing government for peace.

9. The London Corresponding Society and an immense concourse, met in Marylebone fields. Messrs. Browne, Jones, and Thelwall were the speakers. "The petition and the resolutions," says the Annual Register, "are in strong, firm, and respectful language."

At the close of the year, Britain concluded a treaty with the dey of Algiers, by which the Algerines were permitted to carry their prizes to Corsica, and to sell them publicly there.—Ann. Reg. xxxvii. 246.

POOR. LAWS.—The serious abuses of mixing up wages with the parish allowance, and of a profuse grant of relief out of the workhouse, became prevalent. They originated in high prices. The price of corn which for three years preceding 1795 had averaged 54s., rose to 74s. a quarter. As wages continued stationary, the distress of the poor was very great, and many able-bodied labourers, who had rarely before applied for parish assistance, became claimants for relief. Instead of meeting this emergency by temporary expedients, and by grants of relief proportioned to the urgency of each individual case, one uniform system was adopted. The magistrates of Berks and some of the southern counties issued tables, showing the wages which they thought every labouring man ought to receive, according to variations in the price of bread, and the number of his family; and they accompanied these tables with an order, directing the parish officers to make up the difference to the labourer, in the event of the wages paid to him by his employer falling short of the tabular allowance. An act also passed to allow the justices to administer relief out of the workhouses, and to grant it to such poor persons as had property of their own.

WEST INDIES.—In the course of the year, the French made strenuous efforts to recover their possessions in the West Indies. Under the direction of Victor Hugues, a general revolt was planned against the British, in all the French islands. In St. Lucia, the insurrection broke out so suddenly, that the English were compelled to quit the island. The attempts made at Guadaloupe, Grenada, and St. Vincent, though attended with temporary success, were finally defeated.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—Alderman John Sawbridge, the late patriotic M.P. for the city of London. At Paris, aged 80. M. Barthelemy, author of the "Travels of Anacharsis in Greece." 28. A telegraph erected over the Admiralty to communicate with the line to Dover.

Mr. Stone tried before lord Kenyon for a conspiracy to kill the king, and acquitted. On the verdict being pronounced, a man was fined 20*l.* for raising an exulting shout.

Feb. 1. The king, in returning from Drury-lane theatre, was insulted, and a stone thrown into his carriage.

11. A forged French newspaper, L'Elcair, circulated for stock-jobbing; it announced a peace between Austria and France.

12. STATE OF THE POOR.—Mr. Whitbread on moving in the commons, that a bill to regulate the wages of labourers in husbandry be read a second time, made this statement. He said that "in most parts of the country the labourers had long been struggling with increasing misery till the pressure had become almost too grievous to be endured; while the patience of the sufferers, under their accumulated distresses, had been exemplary." He then recommended the immediate establishment of a minimum of wages; a measure as unjust against the employer, as a maximum would be against the employed. Mr. Pitt, in reply, admitted that the condition of the poor was cruel, and such as could not be wished on any principle of humanity or policy. But he argued against the proposition of Mr. Whitbread as contrary to sound principles, and concluded in these words: "What measures then could be found to supply the defect? Let us," said he, "make relief (by the parish), in cases where there are a number of children, a matter of right and an honour, instead of a ground for opprobrium and contempt. This will make a large family a blessing and not a curse; and this will draw a proper line of distinction between those who are able to provide for themselves by their labour, and those who, after having enriched their country with a number of children have a claim upon its assistance for their support."—Parl. Hist. xxxii. 710. Mr. Fox did not enter fully into the question, but appeared to acquiesce in the singular principles laid down; and Mr. Whitbread, in conclusion, complimented Mr. Pitt, and recommended government "to institute a liberal premium for large families!"

15. Ceylon captured by the British.

18. King Wake found guilty of a misdemeanor, in hissing the king on his going to parliament, and sentenced to the pillory, and five years' imprisonment.

INFLUENCE OF COLD.—The extreme mildness of last January, compared with the unusual severity of the preceding January of 1795, afforded an opportunity of observing the effects of the seasons on health. The average heat of January 1796 exceeded, by 20 degrees of Fahrenheit, the average of 1795. By turning to the bills of mortality, we find the effects of these different degrees of temperature on human life. In five weeks, between December 1st, 1794, and February 3rd, 1795, the whole number of burials in London amounted to 2823; and in an equal period of five weeks, between December 30th, 1795, and February 2nd, 1796, to 1471.—Philosophical Transactions. So that the excess of mortality in January 1795, above that of January 1796, was 1352 persons.

Mar. 1. War declared against England by the Dutch national convention.

10. Insurrection act passed in Ireland authorizing the lord-lieutenant to declare any district in a state of insurrection, whereby the magistracy obtained an arbitrary power of imprisonment.

24. Colonel Cawthorne of the Westminster militia, cashiered for peculation, and afterwards expelled the house of commons.

31. The oriental MSS. of Mr. Halhead, the disciple of the prophet Brothers, purchased by the British Museum.

Apr. 2. SHAKESPEARE FORGERY.—A tragedy, Vortigern, was performed at Drury-lane theatre as one of Shakspeare's, but subsequently acknowledged by its author, Mr. Ireland, to be a forgery. The audience, which condemned the play, showed more discrimination than several eminent literary connoisseurs, who after examining the alleged Shakspeare papers, attested with their signatures their conviction of their genuineness. Among the subscribers to this notable forgery (Ann. Reg. xxviii. 12) were the earls of Lauderdale, Somerset, and Kinnaid; Dr. Parr, sir Thomas Burgess, James Boswell, John Tweedale, H. J. Pye, E. Valpy, Thomas Blunt, Matthew Wyatt, and J. Pinkerton.

7. Admiral Cornwallis tried by a court-martial for disobeying the orders of the admiralty, but acquitted.

GENERAL BUONAPARTE.—This celebrated person, whose name will hereafter so frequently occur, had, like Hoche, Pichegru, Jourdan, Moreau, and other distinguished French generals, attained rapid promotion in the republican armies. In 1791 he was a captain of artillery; and it was only at the siege of Toulon, in 1793, that his soldierly abilities began to develop themselves. At Paris he commanded, as before noticed, the conventional troops on the insurrection of the sections, October 4th, 1795. Supported by the patronage of the director Barras, and the impression produced by his military talents, he was, at the desire of the officers and soldiers, appointed to the command of the army intended for the invasion of Italy. At this time Buonaparte was in his twenty-sixth year, and had never seen a regular engagement in his life; but such was the opinion of his character, science, and activity, that he inspired general confidence. The Italian army amounted to about 50,000 veterans; opposed to it were 80,000 Austrians and Piedmontese, commanded by general Beaulieu. Hostilities began on the 9th inst., at Voltri, nine miles from Genoa. Before the end of the month, seconded by the skill and zeal of Massena, Angereau, and Rampon, Buonaparte won the decisive battles of Montenotte, Millesimo, and Mondovi, which obliged the king of Sardinia to sign a treaty of peace in his own capital.

18. Sir Sidney Smith taken prisoner on the French coast, and sent, under a strong escort, to Paris.

22. Charette, the Vendean chief, executed at Nantes. Stoffet, another chief, suffered two months before; and general Hoche, after great exertions, succeeded in quelling the royalists.

30. PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.—The nuptials of these personages did not, from the first, promise domestic felicity; and the princess, after giving birth to a daughter, became the inhabitant of a separate establishment on Blackheath. The final separation took place in this month, just a year after the marriage, and three months after the birth of the princess Charlotte of Wales. The separation was at the instance of the prince, on the ground of incongeniality. In a letter to her royal highness, through the medium of lord Cholmondeley, dated April 30th, he says, "Our inclinations are not in our own power; nor should either be answerable to the other, because nature has not made us suitable to each other. Tranquil and comfortable society is, however, in our power; let our intercourse therefore be restricted to that."

May 7. Buonaparte passed the Po at Placentia, defeating two divisions of the Austrians, and striking such terror into the duke of Parma, that he requested an armistice. This was granted, on the condition of a large contribution; the delivering up twenty paintings, to be selected by the French; and sending commissioners to Paris, to treat of peace.

10. Buonaparte, at the head of his victorious republicans, carries, in face of a tremendous fire of artillery, the bridge of Lodi, on the Adda. Five days after, the conqueror entered Milan, the capital of Austrian Lombardy.

CONSPIRACY OF BABEUF.—About this time the power of the Jacobins in France received its death-blow. Although a majority of the directory were originally of this party, they inclined to moderate measures, as more agreeable to the altered feeling of the nation. With this view, the more violent of the Mountainists were gradually removed from public offices, the police, municipality, and military force of Paris. This opened the eyes of the terrorists, who determined to arrest the downward march of their faction, or at least revenge its extinction. Rumours of insurrection were for some weeks afloat; when, on the 9th inst., considerable bodies of cavalry were stationed in the vicinity of the Luxembourg and the Tuileries, and the streets patrolled. Next day the council of 500 was apprised by the directory of a horrible conspiracy on the eve of bursting forth, and that the conspirators had been arrested. Amongst these persons were Drouet, who had intercepted the flight of Louis XVI. at Varennes; Monsignol, ex-general of La Vendée; Babeuf, the chief contriver of the plot, and a man of fanciful or doubtful principles; Laignelot, an ex-conventionalist; Darthe; and Buonarroti, an Italian. The last has recently published an account of "Babeuf's Conspiracy for Equality," the importance of which he has greatly exaggerated. Its proceedings were early known to the directory, who suffered it to mature, and even encouraged it, that its authors might be crushed more effectually. Their designs were exactly of the Robespierre school—both atrocious and foolish. Under the pretext of establishing perfect political and civil equality, they purposed the massacre of all existing authorities,—executive, legislative, and municipal; and the establishing a community of goods. Believing them to be honest fanatics, government proceeded towards them with lenity: only Babeuf and Darthe suffered; and these, when sentence was pronounced, made an abortive attempt at self-execution, by stabbing themselves.

11. Lemaître and others tried and acquitted of a conspiracy to kill the king.

13. Peace between Sardinia and France.

17. Louis XVIII. compelled to quit the Venetian territory.

19. Parliament prorogued; and on the 21st dissolved by proclamation.

20. TRIAL OF JOHN REEVES, Esq., chairman of the London Association, came on before lord Kenyon, at Guildhall. The prosecution was instituted at the instance of the house of commons, on account of a pamphlet of Mr. Reeves, from which was read the following nonsense:—"That the government of England was a monarchy; that the monarchy was the ancient stock from which sprung those goodly branches of the legislature, the lords and commons; that these, however, were still only branches, and that they might be lopped off, and the tree be a tree still—shorn indeed of its honours, but not like them, cast into the fire." Reeves was acquitted.

27. Lord Charles Townsend found dead in a post-chaise, in which he had returned from Great Yarmouth, with his brother lord Frederick, who had been chosen representative of that borough. Both had exhibited symptoms of insanity; and, according to the statement of the survivor, a dispute occurred between them on religion, when lord Charles shot himself with a pistol.

30. At a methodist-meeting in Leeds a basin gave way in a workshop, by which 16 women, a man, and a boy, were instantly killed, and 30 others wounded.

The nobles and clergy of Lombardy, treated with contempt by the French, and incensed at their exactions, stirred up an insurrection, which was promptly suppressed by Buonaparte.

31. Jourdan and Moreau prepared to invade Germany.

June 3. Buonaparte entered Verona; next day he blockaded Mantua. A detachment was sent into the papal territories, and the pope being without the means of defence, was compelled to sue for an armistice, which was granted on condition of surrendering Verona, Ferrara, and Ancona, together with valuable paintings and manuscripts from the Vatican:

11. Sir Ralph Abercromby recaptured the islands of St. Vincent, Grenada, and St. Lucia.

24. Moreau, having passed the Rhine at Strasburg, forced the passes of the Black Forest.

27. Two old houses in Houghton-street, Clare-market, fell, and sixteen persons killed or wounded. Such accidents were of constant occurrence in the metropolis. Most of them have been passed over; but, we should say, that for the fifty years preceding, the falling of houses was as frequent and as destructive, in London, to human life as fires.

July 9. A verdict for 100*l.* given against Daniel Stuart, proprietor of the Morning-Post, for sending a forged French news; paper, L'Eclair, containing false intelligence, to the Telegraph office, and which the proprietors of the Telegraph inserted as true, by which their paper was discredited.

29. Wurmser, who had advanced through the Tyrol, at the head of an army of veterans, from Germany, and superseded Beaulieu in the command of the wreck of his army, compelled the French to raise the siege of Mantua.

Aug. 5. Battle of Castiglione, between the lake of Garda and Mantua. After a series of combats on this and the two succeeding days, Buonaparte compelled Wurmser to fall back into the Tyrol.

9. Eiba surrendered to the British, under commodore Nelson.

17. Admiral Elphinstone captured, in Saldanha Bay, a Dutch squadron, intended to recover back the Cape of Good Hope.

22. Jourdan, who had entered Bavaria on its northern border, and greatly alarmed the diet assembled at Ratisbon, was compelled to fall back in consequence of the junction of the Austrian forces, under Wartensleben and the archduke Charles.

Sept. 4. A large box brought to the secretary of state's office from Botany Bay, containing a quantity of rope two inches thick, spun by the convicts, and the first specimen of their manufacture.

12. Wurmser, after a series of defeats by Buonaparte, Massena, and Augereau, threw himself into Mantua with the remains of his army. In five days the French had taken 16,000 prisoners.

17. Jourdan crossed the Rhine at Bonn. On the 19th was a severe engagement between part of his army and the Austrians at Altenkirchen, in which affair Marceau, an esteemed French general, was killed. Moreau, who had penetrated into the heart of Germany, finding it impossible to maintain his advanced position after the repulse of Jourdan on his left, began his celebrated retreat from Ingoldstadt on the 10th inst., repassing the Leck, and encamping between Ulm and the lake of Constance.

General WASHINGTON retired, from public life, terminating a career which has few equals for genuine patriotism, true wisdom, and solid worth, in an admirable farewell address, in which he forcibly exhorted his countrymen to maintain the unity of their government, to cultivate the arts of peace, abstain from factious combinations, and entangling political alliances with foreign states.

22. Amphion frigate blew up at Plymouth. The accident happened at four o'clock, while captain Fellow was at dinner; and he and 15 others were the only survivors out of a crew of 220 men.

Oct. 6. NEW PARLIAMENT opened by the king with a speech, in which he announced his determination of opening a negotiation with France for peace, at the same time advertent to the necessity of increased energy in providing means for resisting the enemy, as an intention was manifested of making a descent on these kingdoms. Addresses being moved of a moderate tone, they passed with little debate and without a division. On taking into consideration the subject of invasion, Mr. Pitt proposed a levy of 15,000 men from the parishes, to be divided between the sea and land service, and a supplementary militia of 60,000 and 20,000 cavalry; not to be immediately called out, but enrolled and trained. These suggestions were not opposed.

8. Spain declared war against Britain.

9. Genoa excludes the English.

10. Naples made peace with France.

13. Moreau, after a retreat of 300 miles in an enemy's country, conducted with great skill and bravery, reached Wald Kirch, in the Brisgau.

The French formed two new republics in Italy,—the Cisalpine and the Transalpine.

16. Died, in his 71st year, and the 23rd of his reign, Victor Amadeus, king of Sardinia.

20. The university of Oxford distributed 2000 copies of the Bible among the French clergy; the marquis of Buckingham also presented 2000 copies, at his own expense, for the same purpose.

22. Lord Malmesbury, the English ambassador, arrived in Paris to treat of peace.

The successes of the French in Italy, under the command of a native of Corsica, caused an insurrection against the British in that island, which ended in compelling them to retire to Elba. It terminated the short-lived English kingdom of Corsica, with its constitution.

26. Habeas Corpus Act suspended in Ireland, and the government begins to arm the yeomanry.

Nov. 2. The French prohibited the import of English manufactures.

5. An invasion from the French being apprehended, a circular was issued by the duke of Portland, secretary of state, to the lieutenants of counties, recommending an account to be taken of the live and dead stock in parishes within twelve miles of the sea.

15, 16. BATTLE OF ARCOË, in which Buonaparte defeated a fresh army of Austrians, under marshal Alvinzi, sent to raise the siege of Mantua. Arcola is a village fifteen miles from Verona, seated in a marsh, and accessible only by a causeway. On this spot the battle lasted two days, and was more obstinately bloody than any that had been fought. It decided the fate of Mantua, Alvinzi leaving it to surrender or not, and retreating across the Brenta.

17. DEATH OF CATHERINE II.—The empress died suddenly, of apoplexy, in her 68th year, and 34th of her reign, having in 1762 deposed her husband, Peter III., who was murdered by Alexis Orloff; but whether by the direction or connivance of the empress, is uncertain. The prominent traits in the character of Catherine were a love of sway and of glory, especially the glory of aggrandizing the country she governed, and that with a total recklessness as to the means she employed for effecting her purpose. The empress had early patronised the philosophical principles, but was averse to the practice of the French revolution; and was artful enough to excite other powers to begin the war against France, but never actively joined the coalition. Her private conduct was as unscrupulous as her public, being openly immoral and licentious. Paul Petrovitch, the only son of the empress succeeded to the vacant throne.

Dec. 1. The LOYALTY LOAN, of 18 millions, was subscribed in 15 hours, between the 1st and 5th inst. One million was subscribed by the bank of England in their corporate capacity, and 400,000*l.* by the directors individually.

7. In the debate on the sumner it was discovered that the minister had already made advances to the emperor to the amount of 1,200,000*l.*, and also to the army under the prince of Condé, without the consent, and during the sitting of parliament. A motion by Mr. Fox, on this violation of parliamentary usage, gave rise to a strenuous debate, which called into action the strength of parties. On a division an amendment, in favour of Mr. Pitt, was carried by 185 against 104.

18. A French fleet, with 25,000 men, under general Hoche, sailed, destined for Ireland, but a storm dispersed their ships, so that on the 24th inst. no more than seven sail of the line and ten others, anchored in Bantry Bay. The admiral, Bouvet, refused to land the troops, and sailed back to Brest. The dispersion of this armament quieted the alarm of an invasion of England, which had been strongly apprehended in the latter part of the year.

19. The directory of France refused the basis proposed by lord Malmesbury, of a mutual restitution of conquests; by France in Europe, of the Netherlands and Italy; and by England, of her colonial acquisitions in the East and West Indies.

21. The notorious major Semple, to avoid transportation for his crimes, stabbed himself in Newgate.

25. The emperor Paul set at liberty general Kosciuszko and other Polish prisoners.

29. Lord Malmesbury arrived in London, having been ordered to quit Paris in 48 hours.

31. Several persons frozen to death in different parts of the country; the frost was so severe that the thermometer was 34 and 35 degrees below the freezing point.

A.D. 1797. PROSPECTS OF THE YEAR.—In the course of autumn, England was left to contend singly against the power of France. It was the most disastrous period of the war. Credit became affected, and the bank of England stopped payment. Soon after a mutiny broke out at Spithead; this was settled by giving the seamen additional pay. But another mutiny in the fleet at the Nore was not quelled without bloodshed, and the execution of some of the ringleaders. To add to the embarrassments of the country, Ireland was on the verge of rebellion. The dissensions in that kingdom, inflamed by a variety of aggravations, had proceeded so far, that the malcontents, who assumed the name of UNITED IRISHMEN, regularly organized themselves throughout the country, and sent deputies to treat with the French, for assistance in throwing off the English yoke. On the other side, the party attached to government put in practice strong measures. The military were dispersed into all parts, searches were made for arms with circumstances of great severity, and many persons were apprehended on suspicion. The moderate party in the Irish parliament, who proposed conciliation by a reform in the representation, finding themselves in a small minority, made a secession. The example was followed by the whigs in England.

Jan. 3. Three of the stones of the antique pile of Stonehenge fell, owing, as supposed, to the thaw. The smallest of the three weighed 20 tons.

Paul of Russia enjoined foreigners to wear cocked-hats and their hair in bags, and not to drive through Petersburg with more than two horses.

7. Riot at Carlisle, occasioned by the enrolment of the supplementary militia.

12. General Alvinci, with a fresh army of 50,000 men, made another effort to raise the siege of Mantua. Passing the Brenta, he fell upon Joubert, who retreated to Rivoli. Buonaparte unexpectedly arriving at Rivoli, in the night of the 14th, a terrible conflict ensued, in which the Austrians were completely defeated, and the entire of their left wing either killed or made prisoners. General Provera, separating from the main body of the Austrians, tried to throw himself into Mantua, but was repulsed in the suburb of La Foscara, and, with his column of 7000 men, laid down their arms to general Victor.

25. At the quarter-sessions held at Bourn in Lincolnshire, a blacksmith was sentenced to twelve months' solitary imprisonment, without seeing or speaking to any one, except the person who took his victuals, for saying "the king is a rascal, and all who belong to him," &c.

Feb. 1. Colonel Frederick, son of Theodore, ex-king of Corsica, shot himself in the west porch of Westminster-abbey.

2. Mantua capitulated to the French, Buonaparte granting very honourable terms to its brave defender, the venerable Wurmser. The imperialists were now expelled from Italy; and the pope having imprudently resumed hostilities, his territories were speedily overrun by the republicans, who levied upon him a contribution of 30 millions of livres in specie, beside works of art.

8. Mr. Adams elected president of the United States; and Mr. Jefferson, vice-president.

10. The French, under Marmont, entered Loretto, taking possession of the rich offerings of gold and silver; also the Santa Casa, or "Holy House," alleged to be the same in which the Virgin Mary was brought from Nazareth by angels, in 1291. The "Madonna," or "Lady of Loretto," was forwarded to Paris. It is a wooden figure, clumsily carved, and was restored to the pope at the time of the Concordat, who replaced it in the Casa Santa.

The six original pictures of Hogarth's "Marriage à la Mode" sold to Mr. Angerstein for 1000 guineas.

14. NAVAL VICTORY.—Sir John Jervis, with fifteen sail of the line, defeated the Spaniards, off Cape St. Vincent, with twenty-seven sail of the line. Amongst them were six of 112 guns, and one of 136. Four first-rate Spanish men-of-war were captured, and the remainder blockaded in Cadiz. The Spaniards had 600 killed and wounded; the British, 300. For this brilliant exploit sir John was raised to the peerage, and commodore Nelson, who greatly distinguished himself in the action, was knighted.

18. Trinidad surrendered to sir R. Abercromby.

19. Died, in his 74th year, JAMES DODSLEY, bookseller; brother, partner, and successor of the ingenious Robert Dodsley. Their father kept the free-school at Mansfield, and married a young woman of 17 at the age of 75, by whom he had a child at the age of 78.—Ann. Reg., xxxix, 12. Mr. J. Dodsley sold 18,000 copies of Burke's "Reflections on the French Revolution," to whom he made a handsome compliment for the profits. Mr. Dodsley died worth 70,000*l.*, which chiefly went to his nephews and niece, and his executors, one of whom was Mr. John Walter, who had been his brother's apprentice.

20. There being a great run on the banks in the north of England for specie, most of them stopped payment.

22. DESCENT IN WALES.—About 1400 Frenchmen landed in Pembrokeshire: they had no artillery; and from their ragged and mean appearance, seemed to have long been the inmates of jails. Lord Sawdor having assembled the country people, armed with scythes and pitchforks, the invaders surrendered to them without offering any resistance. This notable attempt at invasion, and its defeat, were communicated, in due form, by the duke of Portland to the lord-mayor.

26. RESTRICTION ON BANK PAYMENTS.—The suspension of specie payments by this great monetary corporation originated in political causes, not in an over-issue of paper, or other mismanagement of the direction. In the beginning of the year the public funds experienced a depression below anything of the kind felt at the worst period of the American war. This was occasioned by the failure of lord Malmesbury's pacific mission to Paris, and the adverse aspect of the war, in consequence of the victories of the French in Italy. To support the emperor, enormous loans were sent to the continent, the transmission of which had caused the exchanges to become unfavourable in 1795; and in that year and the following, large sums in specie were drawn from the bank. The directors were sensible of their approaching difficulties, owing to the government remittances; and as early as the 11th of February, 1796, resolved—"That it is the opinion of this court, founded upon the experience of the late imperial loan, that if any further loan or advance of money to the emperor, or to any of the foreign states, should in the present state of affairs take place, it will, in all probability, prove fatal to the bank of England. The court of directors do, therefore, most earnestly deprecate the adoption of any such measure, and they solemnly protest against any responsibility for the calamitous consequences that may follow thereupon." But notwithstanding this, and many other similar remonstrances, fresh advances of money were made to our allies, and fresh demands upon the bank; the directors reluctantly abandoning their own better judgment to what they truly termed the "pressing solicitations" of the chancellor of the exchequer, and their desire to avert "the probable distress which a refusal might occasion, in the then situation of public affairs." But though the foreign policy of ministers aggravated the difficulties of the bank, the more direct cause of them was the alarm of invasion. The formidable attempt of the French on Ireland last year, and their actual descent in Wales—this, combined with rumours of their landing on various parts of the coast, caused general apprehension, and a run was made on the provincial banks. Some of them failed; and the panic becoming general, extended itself to London. Demands for cash poured into the bank from all quarters; and on Saturday, the 25th instant, she had only 1,272,000*l.* of cash and bullion in her coffers (McCulloch's Historical Sketch of the Bank, p. 22), with every prospect of a violent run taking place on the following Monday. In this emergency an order in council was issued on Sunday the 26th, prohibiting the directors from paying their notes in cash until the sense of parliament had been taken on the subject. Next day the occurrence was communicated to parliament in a royal message, and on the 28th, after violent debates, a secret committee was nominated by ballot to investigate the affairs of the company. On the report of the committee appearing (March 2nd), whatever doubts might have been entertained with respect to the solvency of the bank, were removed by showing that at the moment the order in council was issued, the bank was possessed of property to the amount of 15,513,690*l.* after all claims upon her had been deducted. Previously to this inquiry there does not appear to have been any misgivings among the commercial classes; for on the very first day of the restriction, a meeting of the principal bankers, merchants, and traders was held at the Mansion-house, when a resolution was agreed to, and very numerous signed, pledging, as had been done in 1745, those present to accept, and to use every means in their power to cause bank-notes to be accepted as cash in all transactions. Ultimately a bill was brought into parliament, continuing the restriction on cash payments till six months after the signature of a definitive treaty of peace. The embarrassments of the bank having been chiefly caused by the policy of government, it had some claims on its protection, and its intervention in the existing emergency appears to have been an unavoidable expedient. So long as the alarm of invasion continued, it was clear that no bank paper, immediately convertible into gold, would remain in circulation. But after her coffers had been drained by imperial loans, she was wholly unable to meet such a run. On the day of the restriction, it has been seen, her supply of cash and bullion was reduced to 1,272,000*l.*; while her notes in circulation, of 5*l.* and upwards (the only denominations then issued), amounted to 10,266,561*l.* So that without ministerial protection a stoppage of payment was inevitable; and this, in the then critical state of the country, would have been productive of indescribable calamities.

Mar. 4. Twenty-shilling notes issued for the first time by the bank of England.

On Thursday, sir Godfrey Webster obtained a sentence of divorce and separation against his wife, formerly Miss Vassal, for adultery with lord Holland, in Italy and elsewhere. Sir Godfrey obtained 6000*l.* damages against his lordship, who immediately after the divorce married lady Webster, her ladyship having first had a child, which she acknowledged to be lord Holland's.

8. A public fast-day.

10. Spanish dollars issued by the bank, at 4*s.* 9*d.* each.

11. Ladies Buckinghamshire, Luttrell, and Stuart convicted, in penalties of 50*l.* each, for playing at faro. Two discharged servants informed of them.

16. Buonaparte passed the Tagliamento in pursuit of the retreating Austrians, now commanded by the archduke Charles. Arriving at the Lisonzo, he encountered opposition; but having effected a passage, took Gradisca; next made himself master of Gorizia; and finally, of Trieste, the emperor's only port on the Adriatic. Massena, Jonbert, and Bernadotte were simultaneously advancing on other points, through Carinthia, the Tyrol, and Carniola. The greatest alarm prevailed at Vienna, which was the avowed focus of the French armies. All the French columns having joined at Clagenfurth, on the 31st, Buonaparte wrote a letter to the archduke Charles, making overtures of peace. The archduke, in reply, stated that the emperor had not furnished him with powers to treat for peace.

23. A common-hall in the city of London, to address the king to dismiss his ministers. A meeting had previously been held in Palace-yard, Westminster, for a similar purpose.

24. The king refused to receive the address of the city of London on the throne, except in its corporate capacity, but he would receive it at the levee, in the usual way of receiving addresses.

A riot at Derby, occasioned by Mr. Thellwall delivering a political lecture in the Baptist-chapel. A mob collected, with drums and horns, to drown his voice. The lecturer, with pistol in hand, threatened to shoot whoever molested him; and in consequence was suffered to depart without injury.—Ann. Reg., xxxix. 15.

Apr. 3. According to a return to the house of commons, the number of aliens in the metropolis is 7041.

7. The Austrian general Bellegarde requested an armistice for ten days, which Buonaparte granted. He was within 120 miles of Vienna, and had written to the directory that "he hoped in a few days, at the head of 20,000 grenadiers, to plant the republican standard in the capital of his imperial majesty."

9. John Gale Jones, the itinerant delegate of the London Corresponding Society, found guilty at Warwick, under the late act against seditious assemblies. It was the first conviction under the statute.

10. Miss Faren, in the "School for Scandal," took leave of the stage previous to her marriage with the Earl of Derby.

18. PEACE WITH AUSTRIA.—Preliminaries of peace between France and Austria were signed at Leoben, in Styria. By this treaty Austria ceded the Netherlands to France, allowed a free navigation of the Rhine, and recognised the independence of the newly erected Italian republics. On the same day, general Hoche, commanding the army of the Sambre and Meuse, passed the Rhine at Nieuwied, and defeated the Austrians under general Kray. Next day Moreau recaptured Kehl, and defeated the Austrians, in a bloody engagement, near Strasburg. Intelligence of the peace of Leoben did not arrive till the 21st, when hostilities on the Rhine ceased.

MUTINIES IN THE NAVY.—In this and the two following months some alarming discontents manifested themselves in the navy, occasioned by the severity of the discipline, insufficiency of the provisions, unequal distribution of prize-money, smallness of pay, and the allowance of Greenwich pensioners.—(Annual Register, xxxix. 207.) These discontents first broke out into open mutiny in the fleet at Spithead, on the 15th, when, on the signal being given to prepare for sea, the men ran up the shrouds, and gave three cheers. Two delegates from each ship were appointed, and an oath administered, binding each seaman to fidelity to the cause. At length lord Bridport went on board, and told them that he was the bearer of redress for all their grievances, and the king's pardon. This produced subordination, which continued for some time, when a fresh mutiny occurred, under an apprehension amongst the sailors that the promises made to them would not be observed. This suspicion being, however, removed by an explanation from lord Hood, they were again reduced to submission. On the 8th of May a bill passed through both houses of parliament in one day, for augmenting the pay of the seamen and marines. This guarantee and concession, it was hoped, would have satisfied all reasonable demands of the discontented; but unfortunately they were obtained by force, and the same means, it was supposed, remained open for other acquisitions. A fresh mutiny, in consequence, broke out at the Nore on the 22nd; when delegates were elected to draw up and present a list of their grievances to the board of admiralty. In this instance government determined to employ force to reduce the mutineers to obedience, in which determination they were strengthened by the discountenance shown by the Portsmouth and Plymouth fleets to these proceedings. Preparations for hostilities were commenced on both sides, when the disaffected began to disagree amongst themselves, and after some bloodshed, all the ships submitted, giving up Richard Parker, the ringleader, and his fellow-delegates.

May 3. INVASION OF VENICE.—Buonaparte issued a manifesto against the Venetians, complaining of the enmity shown to the French during the war with the imperialists. Immediately after their territory was overrun by French troops, who on the 16th entered Venice, subverted the government, and established another on a more democratic basis. About the same time Genoa was revolutionized on a similar principle, Buonaparte informing the aristocracy that it was in vain to oppose the spirit of the age.

MORTALITY OF FOUNDLINGS.—At a meeting of a committee of the Foundling-hospital, London, on the 3rd instant, Mr. Bernard stated, in answer to sir John Blaquiere, that there had been admitted into the institution, since the year 1770, 1684 children, of whom 482 had died under the age of twelve months; being rather more than one in four. But the management had recently been improved: in the last ten years the average mortality had been reduced to one in six; and in the last four years, to one in seven.

14. The Irish house of lords made an alarming report of the preparations for a general insurrection.

15. Mr. W. Ponsonby moved, in the Irish house of commons, for a reform in that house, which was negatived by 117 to 30. Upon which Mr. Grattan and the leaders of opposition seceded from parliament.

30. Kosciuszko, the Polish hero, arrived in London, on his way to America.

June 1. England being left alone in the contest with France, intimated to the directory a desire to renew the negotiation for peace.

Irish Annuities.—The following are the yearly rentals of the Irish estates (Ann. Reg. for 1797, p. 51) belonging to

21. Died PETER TRILLUSON, a rich city merchant, remarkable for the eccentric will he made, and which gave rise to an act of parliament limiting executory devises (Cabinet Lawyer, 10th ed., p. 535). After bequeathing some inconsiderable legacies to his three sons, the rest of his property, consisting of lands of the annual value of 4500*l.*, and 600,000*l.* personal property, was vested in trustees, to accumulate, subject to contingent appropriations, for the payment of the national debt.

24. At a meeting of the Livery of London for the election of sheriffs, the earl of Lauderdale, citizen and needle-maker, was brought forward by the popular party as one of the candidates. The show of hands was against his lordship. It was an unusually numerous and respectable meeting, and considered a trial of political strength.

A royal warrant granted to Bolton, of Soho, Birmingham, to coin penny and twopenny-pieces.

30. Richard Parker, the mutineer, executed on board the Sandwich, at Sheerness. He behaved with firmness and propriety, expressing a wish that his death might be deemed a sufficient atonement, and the lives of others be saved. Parker was a native of Scotland, where he had been a shopkeeper, but getting into debt, had, two years before, volunteered into the navy.

July. Lord Malmesbury arrived at Lisle as minister-plenipotentiary, to treat with the French Republic for peace; the hon. Henry Wellesley his secretary.

8. DEATH OF EDMUND BURKE.—This eminent orator, writer, and politician was the younger son of an attorney, and educated at Dublin-college, in which city he was born, January 1, 1730. Not succeeding in an application for the professorship of logic at Glasgow, he settled in London, where he sought subsistence and distinction in the occupations of literature. His first acknowledged production was an ironical "Vindication of Natural Society," published in 1758. In the same year appeared the first volume of the "Annual Register," of which he was the projector and compiler, receiving for his services 100*l.*,—the receipts being still extant (Prior's Life of Burke, p. 61). His connexion with this work was long continued, but in the latter volumes Mr. Burke confined himself to the historical part, and afterwards only to a supervision of that. In 1761 he accompanied Gerald Hamilton, the secretary to the lord-lieutenant, to Ireland, and by his influence obtained a pension of 360*l.* a year on the Irish establishment. This appears to have been Mr. Burke's first introduction into public life. On his return, in 1765, he became private secretary to the marquis of Rockingham, then first lord of the treasury, and through the same interest, M.P. for Wendover. He was now a regular party-man, devoting his pen and his tongue to the support of his patron, from whom he received a nominal loan, but real gift, of 10,000*l.* This enabled him to purchase his Beaconsfield villa, and for which he showed his gratitude, by composing the well-known tribute, inscribed on the mausoleum of his noble benefactor in Wentworth-park. In 1770 appeared his "Thoughts on the Present Discontents;" a pamphlet abounding in constitutional sentiments, but more valuable as a specimen of the petty objects to which public writers were then devoted, being chiefly directed against the influence of an "inner cabinet"—that never existed—hostile not to the people, but to aristocratical domination; and for which the suggested remedy was the placing political power in the hands of himself and friends. In the disputes with the American colonies, Mr. Burke recommended a medium course, that concession should be blended with coercion. He also expressed himself favourably towards the liberty of the press, the rights of juries, and religious toleration. His bill for the economical reform of the royal household raised him high in popular estimation, and drew from his intellectual stores a rich display of antiquarianism, wit, humour, and financial detail. But his parliamentary consequence declined after the ruin of his party by the coalition with lord North, which he projected, and his oligarchic scheme of Indian administration; errors which were not redeemed by the want of judgment, temper, and equity he evinced in the impeachment of Warren Hastings. After the establishment of Mr. Pitt's ministry, in 1783, the "luxuriant expatiations" of the orator were listened to with impatience in the house of commons. They were considered interruptions to public business, and were met, says The Annual Register, vol. xl. p. 336, with "coughing, beating the ground, and hooting." Naturally irritable, these annoyances often drove him into the most outrageous fits of passion. He did not recover his ascendancy till the French Revolution, when he again burst forth with greater force and effulgence than ever, both as writer and speaker. There does not appear to have been a direct apostacy in the part Mr. Burke took in this great crisis.

He had advocated constitutional liberty and the removal of proved abuses, but he was never the partisan of organic changes in church or state. Parliamentary reform he had uniformly opposed, and the scruples of Dissent he reluctantly indulged. George III. was a great admirer of his celebrated "Reflections," and recommended to all the courtiers who came near him to read them. In 1795 he received a pension of 1200*l.* on the civil-list, and 2500*l.* on the 4*th* per cent. fund; and to which it is said a peerage would have been annexed, had not the boon become valueless by the death of his son. These visitations of good and evil he seems not to have long survived. Mr. Burke's mind was of Irish texture; more apt to become enamoured of outward appearances than realities; more imaginative than logical; more impulsive than considerate; more descriptive than discriminating. He had seen Marie Antoinette a vision of grace and beauty, therefore France was well governed, and the people happy. He rose to affluence in England in the alternate championship of the rival factions; found her the emporium of wealth, of letters, and public charities, therefore her political administration had been wise and beneficent. It was a remarkable instance of the juncture of extremes that two nations should be contemporaneously led away by two minds not unlike in extravagance, force, originality, and eloquence, but wholly opposite in their conclusions. Rousseau was the apostle of abstraction; Burke, of prescription. One sought the type of social excellence in the simplicity of villages, in fields, and woods; the other, in the refinement of cities, in halls, cathedrals, and palaces. Their convictions, as men of strong passions are apt to be, were moulded by taste more than reason. Amidst much abasement, they both retained what from Nature they had received,—

"Intense and glowing minds."

July 15. The exiled French clergy permitted to return to France on taking the oaths to the constitution.

20. Parliamentary session closed.

24. Admiral Nelson, acting on fallacious intelligence, made an unsuccessful attack on Santa Cruz, in the island of Teneriffe. The loss of lives in this rash attempt was equal to that sustained in the battle off Cape St. Vincent. Nelson himself had his arm shot off, and several valuable officers were killed or wounded.

28. The London Corresponding Society held a meeting in Pancras, to petition the king; but their proceedings were interrupted by the magistrates, who read the Riot Act, and arrested Alexander Galloway, Binn, Hodgson, and other speakers.

Aug. 30. At Leeds, the Methodist conference resolved that any member of their connexion should be ejected who propagated opinions inimical to the established religion and government.

Sept. 1. Buonaparte procures the liberation of Lafayette and fellow-sufferers, imprisoned in the castle of Olmutz.

4. ANARCHISTS IN PARIS.—The executive government of France found itself hardly able to make head against the plots of anarchists and royalists, and recommended that on the annual renewal of one-third of the legislature, the electors should take a new oath of fidelity to the constitution. Among the new members who took their seats were some of the ancient noblesse, the Jacobin Barrère, and general Pichegru, who was suspected of a design to restore the Bourbons. In the directory Latourneur went out by lot, and was replaced by Barthelemi, a diplomatist and a man of letters. More favour now began to be shown to the emigrants and nonjuring priests, and the severe decrees against them were relaxed. Buonaparte, however, adhered firmly to the directory; and on the anniversary of July 14th, he addressed his army, informing them that counter-revolutionary projects were in agitation, and urged them to be true to that republican cause in which they had shed so much blood. To this appeal the soldiers responded with alacrity. Animated by the support of the military, a majority of the directory determined at once to crush their political opponents. Early in the morning of the 4th inst. the alarm-guns were fired by order of the directory. Barthelemi, refusing to concur, was put under arrest; Carnot effected his escape. Commissioned by Barras, Reubel, and Lareveillière, general Augereau surrounded the hall of the legislative councils with a military force, and, entering, found the opposition members in consultation upon the course to be pursued. With his own hand he seized general Pichegru, and ordered eighteen others of the members to be arrested on a charge of treason. These were committed to the Temple, and the hall shut up. A committee of public safety was then nominated, whose resolutions were adopted by the council of 500. New decrees repealed the laws in favour of the royalists and emigrants, placed the public journals under the inspection of the police, and sentenced to deportation fifty-five members of the two councils. It is a signal proof of a change of national feeling in these acts of violence, that not one drop of blood was shed. The two vacancies in the directory were filled by Merlin and François de Neufchâteau.

6. Between this day and July 19th sir J. B. Warren captured seven French ships of war and sixteen merchant vessels.

9. Three men suffocated by the carbonic acid gas in one of Meux's rats, having descended without the previous precaution of letting down a lighted candle.

10. Died in childbed, Mrs. Goewin, a woman of uncommon talents, and considerable knowledge; well known by her literary works, under her original name of Wollstonecraft, particularly by her "Vindication of the Rights of Women."

18. Negotiations at Lisle abruptly terminated, and lord Malmesbury ordered to leave the place in 24 hours. The French had refused to treat on the basis of reciprocal restitution; and doubtless assumed their present arrogance in consequence of their late conquests, and a secret knowledge of the rebellion organizing in Ireland.

27. The bank withdrew their dollars owing to the number of counterfeits in circulation.

Oct. 4. Earl of Mornington appointed governor-general of Bengal.

A mutiny broke out in the fleet at the Cape of Good Hope, which subsided in consequence of a communication made to them that the demands of the seamen at Spithead had been complied with.

11. Admiral Duncan attacked the Dutch fleet off CAMPERDOWN, commanded by admiral De Winter, and, after a severe engagement, captured eight Dutch ships, including those of the admiral and vice-admiral, and four frigates: only three Dutch ships of the line escaped. For this brilliant victory Duncan was raised to the peerage, with an hereditary pension.

13. Sir B. Hammet fined 1000*l.* for refusing to serve the office of lord-mayor.

17. Definitive treaty of peace signed at Campo Formio, between Austria and France, agreeably to the preliminaries settled at Leoben, the emperor being compensated for the loss of Belgium by the cession of Venica. By a secret article, Austria consented that the Rhine should be the boundary between France and Germany.

THEOPHILANTHROPISTS.—A new sect appeared at Paris under this name, of which Lareveillière, one of the directors, declared himself the patron. These religionists, rejecting revelation, confined their worship to one Supreme Being; and gradually increasing in number, they at length took possession, by permission of the municipality, of many of the churches, occupied also at other hours of the day by the catholics. In lieu of the mystic and sumptuous rites of the Roman church, their offerings to the Deity were the simple products of the earth,—a wheaten ear, or a bouquet of flowers!

No. 2. BARRON BARRINGTON met. The principal topics of the royal speech were the failure of the negotiations for peace, the prosperous state of the revenue, naval successes, and the necessity of increased exertions in the prosecution of the war. The address was carried with more than the usual preponderancy of votes. Grey, Whitbread, Sheridan, and Fox, wearied by fruitless opposition, had seceded from parliament. Mr. Wilberforce said he did not participate in the "poignant grief expressed for the absence of Mr. Fox;" uninfluenced by "motives of personal ambition, he felt it more imperative upon him, in the critical state of the country, to stand more firmly at his post."—Belsh. Geo III., vi. 201.

30. Died, of dropsy, in the 54th year of his age, after a reign of eleven years, FREDERICK WILLIAM II., king of Prussia. He was succeeded by his son Frederick William III. Like his predecessor, the late king was influenced by ambition, and was little scrupulous about the means of its indulgence; traits of character manifested by the partition of Poland, the treaty of Pillnitz, and desertion of the coalition after receiving the English subsidy as the price of his continued co-operation.

Dec. 1. Mr. Fox presented to the king, at the lever, a petition from 5000 freeholders of the county of Down, complaining of Irish grievances.

2. Gold seven shilling-pieces ordered to be received as the current coin of the realm.

12. Colonel Fitzgerald, who was allied to the earl of Kingston, and shared his hospitality, having seduced, under aggravated circumstances, the daughter of that nobleman, fell, in a scuffle, a victim to his lordship's natural and just resentment.

19. General thanksgiving for our naval victories. The king and parliament went in grand procession to St. Paul's, to deposit the colours taken.

26. DEATH OF JOHN WILKES, F.R.S.—This once popular agitator expired in his 73rd year, at the house of his accomplished daughter "Polly," in Grosvenor-square, alderman of Farringdon Without, and chamberlain of London. Mr. Wilkes had long considered himself a "fire burnt out." Whatever may have been his motives, his exertions and intrepidity added legal security to the liberties of Englishmen. According to one of his contemporaries (Butler's Reminiscences, 73-4), Wilkes was an "elegant epicurean; in his politics an aristocrat, and would have much rather been a favoured courtier at Versailles than the most commanding orator in St. Stephen's chapel." He possessed, however, something more than the vapour of patriotism: he could resist corruption, attack and overcome tyranny, deride a king, and face poverty, and banishment. His ready wit was proverbial, and he never missed the opportunity of being jocular at the expense of his colleagues. Sometimes he would disconcert the gravity of a city feast by his satire; and when he told alderman Burnell (formerly a bricklayer), who seemed to be unable to manage a knife in the simple operation of cutting a pudding, "that he had better take his trowel to it," he set the whole corporation in a roar.

28. Insurrection at Rome; the French ambassador, general Duphot, killed, in endeavouring to prevent the pope's soldiers from firing on the people.

USEFUL PREMIUM.—Count Rumford gave 1000*l.* 3 per cent. annuities, the interest of which is to be disposed of every other year, to the person who shall communicate any discovery on heat and light. The preference to be given to such discovery that tends most to promote the good of mankind; and to be determined by the council of the Royal Society.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.—The total number of persons paying assessed taxes was 791,802; of which number, 190,122 paid under 6*s.*—Ann. Reg. for 1797, p. 159.

The gold and silver coined in the reign of George II. was 11,966,576*l.*; in the present reign, up to 1797, the amount was 44,111,817*l.* About 40 millions of specie were supposed to be at present in circulation.—Ibid. 57.

The number of emigrant French clergy supported by government was 5000; of lay-persons, 2950.

The British naval force in commission in January was, of ships of the line, 124; fifty guns, 18; frigates, 180; sloops, 184; total, 506. There were building, 22 ships of the line, 3 frigates, and 9 frigates.

In Virginia, Thomas Palmer, esq., who, among other bequests, left the reversion of 150*l.* to the author of the best essay on the "Cruel and Absurd Practice of War." Robert Burns, 37, "The Ayrshire poet" and emi-their plans had been discovered by government officers, the contents no longer to detain the public. A general insurrection was planned upon, in which the centre of Dublin, the camp near it, and the military barracks, were to be surprised in one night, and other places were to be seized at the same moment. The disclosure of the plot by one of the conspirators occasioned the seizure of fourteen of the delegates at Dublin; and the information of Armstrong, a militia officer, who had entered among them as a spy, produced other disclosures, which entirely defeated this design. Nothing therefore was left but to execute, to which they shortly after resorted.

23. The French under Berthier having deprived the pope of his temporal authority, his holiness withdrew to Sienna.

Mar. 1. At Margate were apprehended on suspicion of holding a treasonable correspondence with the enemy, Arthur O'Connor, proprietor of a Dublin newspaper; Evans, an active member of the London Corresponding Society; O'Coigley, a priest; Henry and Allen: they were brought to London and committed to the Tower.

12. The Irish directory arrested at the house of Oliver Bond, on the information of Reynolds a spy.

13. A hair-dresser at Newport, Monmouthshire, ate and drank to such excess, as to occasion his death; on a coroner's inquest being held on the body, the jury brought in a verdict of felo de se, and the remains of the glutton were buried in the public road.

25. Lord Somerville chosen president of the Board of Agriculture, in opposition to sir John Sinclair.

The total amount of the St. Jago, Spanish prize, was 555,000*l.*; out of which admiral Gell and the other flag officers shared 52,000*l.* each; the several captains 26,000*l.*; and the subaltern officers in proportion: the law expenses amounted to 28,000*l.*, leaving 148,000*l.* in the agents' hands, to defray any other contingent demands.

30. The celebrated Didot the French printer, with a German named Herman, have announced a new invention in printing, which they term stereotype.—Ann. Reg. 22.

Apr. 2. LAND TAX REDEMPTION.—Mr. Pitt introduced his plan for supporting public credit, and augmenting the national resources. It consisted of a scheme for making the land-tax, which had hitherto been annual, perpetual, and allowing the owner of the land to redeem his land-tax, at a price regulated by the current price of the three per cents. The ministerial project became law, but it never realised the expectation of its author. At this period the produce of the tax at 4*l.* was 2,037,627*l.*, and it was calculated that the sale of this amount, 66 millions of the public debt might be cancelled. But not one half of the land-tax has yet been redeemed.

4. Messrs. Mellish, Bosanquet, and Pole, merchants of the city, were stopped by three highwaymen, on Hounslow-heath: after robbing them, without resistance, of their money and watches, one of the robbers wantonly fired into the chaise, and mortally wounded Mr. Mellish.

The duke of York appointed commander-in-chief of all the forces.

10. Bernadotte, the French ambassador at Vienna, in obedience to the orders of the directory, caused the tri-coloured flag to be displayed in triumph at his hotel, which so incensed the populace that they tore it down: upon this Bernadotte wrote a haughty note to the emperor demanding satisfaction, which being refused, he abruptly left the city.

20. The executive committee of the London Corresponding Society arrested with their books and papers, in an old building, in Newcaste-street, Strand.

Died, aged 31, of a decline, Mr. Jenkins the tall bank clerk: his outer coffin measured eight feet in length, and he was buried by permission of the directors in the ground inside the Bank, which was formerly the burial ground of St. Christopher's church. Some surgeons had offered upwards of 200 guineas for his corpse.

The bishop of Derry (earl of Bristol) arrested in Italy, on suspicion of being a spy.

May 12. Sir Sidney Smith escaped from France, after an imprisonment of two years.

19. EXPEDITION TO OSTEND.—Intelligence having been received that a number of transports fitting out at Flushing were intended to be sent round by the canals to Ostend and Dunkirk, for the purpose of invading England, an expedition was despatched to destroy the sluices and basin of the Bruges canal at Ostend. The direction of the enterprize was entrusted to general Coote and captain Home Popham. On the 19th the troops were disembarked, and in a few hours the sluices were blown up, and several vessels in the canal destroyed. But on returning to the beach, the wind and surf were so high, that it was impossible to re-embark. Meanwhile the country being alarmed, the enemy advanced upon them with a superior force, and the British, after a spirited resistance, were compelled to capitulate. The number landed was about 1000, of whom more than 100 were killed or wounded; among them general Coote.

20. EXPEDITION TO EGYPT.—A formidable expedition had long been preparing at Toulon, which had been the subject of various conjectures. It consisted of 13 ships of the line, and 200 transports, carrying 28,000 regular troops; artists, linguists, and men of science of all kinds, to the number of 121, also accompanied the expedition. The command of the whole was given to Buonaparte, who besides acquiring the reputation of being the greatest general of the age, bore that of a man of varied talents and resources. It sailed on the 20th, and on June 9th, reached Malta, of which possession was taken; thence it proceeded to its ultimate destination, and reached the coast of Egypt July 1st. The object of the expedition now disclosed itself, which was the conquest of that celebrated country, coveted not only as a valuable acquisition, but as affording a station whence the English power in the East Indies, long mistakenly regarded by the French as the great source of their rival's wealth, might be advantageously assailed. Buonaparte landed his troops, took Alexandria by storm, defeated the rebel beys, and made himself master of Cairo.

At a meeting of the whig club, Mr. Fox gave as a toast "the Sovereignty of the people:" on the 25th, the king struck out his name from the list of privy councillors.

21. A. O'Connor, Binns, Allen, Leary, and O'Coigley, tried at Maidstone for high treason; the last only was found guilty; but O'Connor and Binns were detained on another treasonable charge. Mr. O'Coigley was executed on Pennenden heath, meeting death with great fortitude, and denying to the last the charge of treasonable correspondence abroad.

ARRESTS IN DUBLIN.—On the 21st, the two Shearers, both barristers of fortune, and some others, were arrested, and the city and county of Dublin declared to be in a state of insurrection. On Saturday evening, major Sirr, capt. Ryan, and Mr. justice Swan, proceeded to a house in Thomas-street, to arrest lord Edward Fitzgerald. On being introduced to his lordship in bed, he fired a pistol at Mr. Swan, which did not take effect; he then seized a dagger and ran Mr. Swan through the body. Capt. Ryan then entered the room, when his lordship ran at him and cut open his body, from whence his bowels protruded. Major Sirr, who had been waiting outside with a sergeant's guard, then ran up stairs, and finding his lordship struggling with Mr. Swan, who was nearly exhausted with loss of blood, the major fired, and wounded Fitzgerald in the shoulder. His lordship was then conveyed to the castle, and from thence to Newgate, where he died on the 5th of June, from anxiety of mind and the wound he had received. Captain Ryan died on the 23rd of May.

23. Lady Edward Fitzgerald, the celebrated Pamela, daughter of the duke of Orleans, ordered to quit the kingdom.

24. The Irish rebels attacked the towns of Carlow and Nass, from which they were repulsed with loss. Next day they marched 15,000 strong against Wexford, and upon defeating the garrison, which sailed forth to meet them, obtained possession of the town. Subsequently they became masters of Enniscorthy; but being driven back with great slaughter, from New Ross, they wreaked their vengeance upon their captives at Wexford in the most barbarous manner; inflicting death upon more than a hundred persons in every shape that cruelty could devise.

27. Owing to some observations on the 25th, in parliament, Mr. Pitt and Mr. Tierney met on Sunday on Putney-heath to fight a duel. After discharging two cases of pistols, Pitt fired into the air, and the affair ended.

June 4. Sir Edward Crosbie and others hanged for treason in Dublin.

12. General Nugent attacked the rebels, 5000 strong, commanded by Munro, near Ballynahinch, and routed them with great slaughter. This victory quelled the insurrection in the north.

19. Several militia regiments having volunteered to serve in Ireland, a bill was introduced to empower the king to accept the offers of such regiments. It was opposed by Nicholls, Banks, Tierney, and Lawrence Palk, as a violation of the constitutional principle on which the militia was established; but it became a law.

20. Charles marquis Cornwallis, whose political and military character was eminent, arrived in Dublin to supersede lord Camden in the viceroyship.

21. General Lake attacked the main body of the rebels in their encampment on Vinegar-hill; and after a vigorous resistance, so completely routed them, that nothing but pillagers subsequently remained in arms. Wexford and other places, which the insurgents were in possession of, were delivered up, and the insurrection in the south completely put down.

29. Parliament prorogued, the king congratulating the houses on the national zeal against the common enemy.

July 17. Johnson, the bookseller, found guilty, before lord Kenyon, of a libel, in selling Gilbert Wakefield's answer to a courtly pamphlet of the bishop of Llandaff, in which the prelate, in his horror of French principles, had evinced an unexpected, and as many thought inconsistent, zeal, in favour of the war and the minister. Jordan, Cuthell, Williams, and Flower, were also persecuted, on account of Wakefield's pamphlet, as was the author himself.

19. A. O'Connor, McNevin, Emmett, and other state prisoners, were pardoned, on condition of giving all the information they possessed relative to the conspiracy. An amnesty was soon after published by the new lord lieutenant, who discouraged the violent proceedings of the Orangemen, and adopted a system of moderation. Some examples however were deemed necessary. Both the Sheares were executed, the revolutionary address (Ann. Reg. xl. 43) found on the person and in the hand-writing of one of the brothers, precluding mercy; also O'Byrne and M'Can. Mr. Oliver Bond, a commercial man of great wealth and high character, was pardoned.

Aug. 1. BATTLE OF THE NILE.—A strong British Squadron, under admiral Nelson, had long been in anxious pursuit of the Toulon fleet. At length it was descried at anchor across the bay of Aboukir, near the mouth of the Nile, commanded by admiral Brueys, in the L'Orient of 120 guns. Each fleet consisted of 13 sail of the line. Nelson decided on an immediate attack, and regardless of the position of the French, protected by shoals and batteries, he ran into close engagement, in which operation an English 74 grounded. The first day's conflict terminated in the blowing up of the L'Orient, the admiral and his crew, to the number of 1000, perishing in the explosion; and the second day's engagement in a victory, the most splendid in our naval annals. Nine sail of the line were captured, while two more and two frigates were destroyed. Brueys in the action committed the great error of not getting his fleet under weigh, by which the British were enabled with superior force to beat each ship in succession, while riding at anchor. The loss of the English was 900 sailors killed; that of the French far greater.

2. Died in his 53rd year, on the Liverpool stage, while performing the part of the Stranger in the play of that name, John Palmer, a popular comedian. Mr. Palmer had recently suffered domestic bereavements, which are supposed to have given a painful application to some passages in the performance, that produced a fatal excitement.

18. The Leander, 74, captured by the Le Généreux, 74, after a contest of six hours and a half.

22. The French to the number of 700, under General Humbert, landed at Killala in Ireland.

Sept. 2. The Daily Advertiser, one of the oldest London diurnal prints sold to the proprietors of the Oracle, with which it was incorporated.

8. General Lake attacked the united French and rebel force at Ballinamuck, and compelled the French to surrender at discretion. When the return of prisoners was made, it excited surprise that such a handful of invaders should have had the temerity to penetrate into the heart of the kingdom; the whole number, Sarazin and Humbert included, amounting only to 844.

The French completed the subjugation of Switzerland, by defeating, after an obstinate resistance, the inhabitants of Unterwalden, near the lake of Lucerne: all the cantons accepted the constitutions imposed upon them by their Gallic invaders. Geneva was united to the French republic, and became the capital of a new department.

11. The Porte, incensed by the invasion of Egypt, declared war against France, and formed an alliance with its old foe the court of St. Petersburg. The new sovereign of Russia, in whose character passion predominated over principle, was violent in his declaration against the French revolution, and had signified his intention of marching an army into France for the restoration of the Bourbons.

Oct. 4. The metropolis illuminated to celebrate the victory of the Nile.

12. CAPTURE OF WOLFE TONE. — Sir John B. Warren captured the Hoche and six frigates, destined for the support of the insurgent cause in Ireland. Aboard the Hoche was the celebrated Theobald Wolfe Tone, a man of courage and ability, and the founder of the society of United Irishmen. This ardent spirit was arraigned before a court-martial, to which he made a bold and clever address. He anticipated the vengeance of the law by terminating his own existence in prison, at the moment the court of king's bench had, on the motion of Mr. Curran, interfered by habeas corpus, to prevent his execution. Mr. Tone was the last victim to the Irish rebellion, an enterprize more alarming than dangerous, and not less weakly conducted than rashly begun. It is computed that in its short and sanguinary course, 30,000 lives were sacrificed. Although the catholic peasantry were of necessity the instruments of the insurrection, yet the leaders generally belonged to other religious communities. The higher description of catholics, whether ecclesiastical or civil, maintained their loyalty, and went even so far as to publish a paper signed by the twenty-two titular bishops and archbishops, with the lords Fingal, Southwell, Gormanstown, and Kenmare, sir Edward Bellew, &c. dissuading their countrymen from joining in the rebellion.

26. A violent insurrection against the French at Cairo, which was not suppressed without much bloodshed. Numerous actions followed against the Mamelukes and Arabs, in which the French were successful, and they established their authority through the greater part of Egypt. Buonaparte affected great respect for the Mahometan worship; and at the close of the year prepared to invade Syria, where Ibrahim Bey had taken refuge, under the protection of Djerzar Oglou, the pacha of Acre.

Nov. 15. The island of Minorca surrendered to a British force under general C. Stuart, and soon after Gozza, near Malta, to a detachment of admiral Nelson's squadron.

The French prisoners in England were estimated at 27,000, the English in France at 6000.

20. PARLIAMENT opened by the king, who descanted upon the victory of the Nile, the suppression of the Irish rebellion, the warlike decision of the Porte, and the magnanimity of the emperor of Russia.

23. The king of Naples alarmed by the near approximation of the French republicans, entered the Romish territory at the head of 80,000 men, accompanied by Mack the Austrian general. Their triumph however was short. Championnet, collecting the scattered corps of the French, marched against the Neapolitans, and though greatly inferior in number, soon reduced them to the necessity of acting on the defensive.

24. Napper Tandy and his confederates, charged with treasonable practices, were arrested in Hamburg, by command of the British minister: the minister of France claimed them as French citizens, and the senate, unwilling to offend either power, came to no decision on the subject.

27. A day of thanksgiving.

Dec. 3. Coni, the strongest fortress in Italy, surrendered to the Austrians.

4. INCOME TAX.—The triple assessment of last session, which Mr. Pitt termed his "new and solid system of finance," having been found oppressive and unproductive, he came forward with a fresh expedient for raising the chief supplies within the year. This was the celebrated tax on income. In substance his resolutions were, that the augmentation of the assessed tax should be repealed, and in its place a duty of ten per cent upon income be substituted, to commence with incomes above 60*l.* a year, but in a reduced ratio from that sum to 200*l.*; the return of income by individuals to be according to their own statement, but liable to be checked by surveyors, if there were reason to suspect deficiency. He calculated the national income at 102 millions, which would produce a tax of 16 millions. Objections were made to the equity of the principle of taxing the produce of industry and capital in an equal ratio. But the resolutions were well received; they passed three readings before the holidays, and a bill founded upon them became law in the ensuing year.

9. The French directory deposed from his Italian dominions the king of Sardinia.

15. An army of 60,000 Russians arrived at Brunn in Moravia, under Suvarof, and were joyfully received by the Austrian court.

18. Provisional treaty concluded between the emperor of Russia and England, the chief object of which was to induce Prussia to join in the new confederacy against France. Failing in this, Paul stipulated, on condition of a monthly subsidy from England, to have ready for the field 45,000 men, to be "employed wherever the utility of the common cause should require." Prussia firmly, but in guarded terms, declined to accede to this coalition.

19. On the second reading of the bill for the continued suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, remarks were made by Mr. Courtenay and sir Francis Burdett, on the severe treatment of the state prisoners, especially in Cold Bath Fields. The number now imprisoned was seventy, among them colonel Despard; but the reports of their cruel treatment was contradicted by the ministerialists.

24. In the night the thermometer was 14 degrees below the freezing point.

AMERICA.—The disregard of national rights by the French government nearly involved them in a dispute with the United States of America. Agreeably with the interpretation of international law by the directory, neutral vessels were declared subject to capture and condemnation, if any portion of their cargoes consisted of British manufactures; and if the subjects of any state at peace or in alliance with France were found on board a British vessel, they were pronounced pirates. America having vainly remonstrated against these unjust decrees, commissions for reprisals at sea were issued by the states, the military were augmented, and the supreme command of the forces confided to general Washington.

ST. DOMINGO.—The negro chieftain, Toussaint l'Ouverture, was left in possession of St. Domingo during this year; the English troops having evacuated the island in May, and the French before the close of autumn.

NETHERLANDS.—The oppressions of the directory in Belgium, especially their military conscriptions, excited a formidable insurrection during the autumn, which was not quelled without bloodshed.

DISCOVERIES AND INVENTIONS.—Dr. Herschel discovered four additional satellites to the planet bearing his name.

The manufactory of Bolton and Watts lighted with gas.

Life-boat invented by Greathead.

An improvement made in gun-making, by the barrel being bored out of a solid piece of steel.

Gypsum found in America to be a valuable manure.

A patent granted for hanging a window-sash and shutters, without the appearance of lines and pulleys.

A patent was granted to a tailor of Finsbury, for making gentlemen's breeches, so as to do away with all the inconveniences hitherto complained of.

ARMY AND NAVY.—The British army consisted of 41 regiments of cavalry; 110 infantry; 30 fencible cavalry; 42 fencible infantry; 110 of old and new militia; besides invalids and volunteer-corps of 100,000 men more. The number of field-marshal, 6; generals, 289; colonels, 325; lieutenant-colonels, 648; majors, 595; total 1863. The British navy in commission consisted of 140 ships of the line; 22 of 50 guns; 135 frigates; 317 sloops; with part of which, the Texel was blockaded by Duncan; Brest by Bridport; and Cadiz by St. Vincent. The number of admirals was 102; post-captains, 520; commanders, 359; lieutenants, 2008; total 2989.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—John Williams, LL.D., an eminent dissenting divine. At his seat at Downing, Flintshire, Thomas Pennant, 72, an agreeable writer, a florist, tourist, and zoologist. William Jennings, the greatest stockholder in England. At Baltimore, Robert Merry, an accomplished but affected poet, well known in England by his signature of Della Crusca. John Zephaniah Holwell, 87, an intelligent writer on East India affairs, and one of the sufferers in the Black Hole at Calcutta in 1756. George Vancouver, the circumnavigator, and a captain in the British navy. At Chantilly, near Paris, Thomas Muir, 33; he was one of the victims of the state trials in Scotland, in 1793, and who after being brought off from Sydney in an American vessel, had undergone surprising adventures.

A.D. 1799. PROSPECTS OF THE YEAR.—This year is memorable by the effort of a third confederacy of Europe against the power of France. English subsidies brought into the field the hordes of Russia; and Austria, encouraged by such powerful co-operation, abruptly terminated the protracted negotiations at Radstadt, and resumed hostilities against the republic. The scene of warfare extended over the whole surface of Italy, along the banks of the Rhine, among the marshes and canals of Holland, and amidst the lakes and mountains of Switzerland. After gigantic efforts on both sides, the campaign ended with the loss of Italy, with the exception of Genoa, by the French, who however still retained for their frontier, in defiance of their antagonists, the iron barrier of the Alps, and the entire left side of the Rhine. They were relieved at the end of the year by the sudden defection of Russia from the coalition. Meanwhile a great change was effected in France; the directorial government, which had become weak and unpopular, was overthrown, and the consular establishment substituted. By this revolution, the ascendancy of the military over the civil power was confirmed, and long kept paramount in France. The offensive part taken by England in the third coalition, consisted of an unsuccessful effort to revolutionise Holland, and in aiding with her naval force the royalists in Italy, in the restoration of the pope and the queen of Naples. The death of Tippee Saib, and the dismemberment of his kingdom, formed another feature in foreign transactions.

Jan. 1. Athenæum at Liverpool opened.

2. Sir Sidney Smith arrived at Constantinople on a mission from this country, and was favourably received.

6. A soldier robbed the Mint of 2000 guineas, but was taken at Dover.

8. The lease of Don Saltero's coffee-house at Chelsea was sold, with all the curiosities. It was first opened in 1695 by one Salter, a barber, and became a noted place of resort, and depository of rarities, the gifts of naval officers, and the superfluities of sir Hans Sloane's museum. It is mentioned in the "Tatler," No. 34, where the don is ridiculed for his credulity in appropriating his hats and pincushions to queen Elizabeth's chambermaids.

10. The French ministers, who had been carrying on negotiations during the whole of last year, relative to German boundaries at Radstadt, informed the emperor of their determination to leave the place, if the Russian troops were permitted to enter his dominions.

12. The corporation of Cork passed resolutions favorable to a legislative union between Britain and Ireland.

14. Five English gentlemen who had been sent to investigate the title of Vizier Ally, were assassinated by his orders at Benares.

22. A royal message delivered to both houses of parliament, recommending a LEGISLATIVE UNION between England and Ireland, in order the better to defeat the common enemy of both countries. On the 31st, Mr. Pitt brought forward a series of resolutions, which were almost unanimously adopted, and with a joint address from both houses, were presented to the king as the basis of the contemplated incorporation of the two kingdoms. [For the terms of the union, see July 2nd, 1800, when this great measure was completed.] The Irish house of lords was in favour of the union. The commons divided, 109 to 105 against it. The English house of commons on the same question divided, 140 for, 15 against it. Mr. Fox opposed the union from the beginning (Ann. Reg. xlv. 1); he apprehended that from the manner in which the Irish representatives were returned, they would be constantly found in the ranks of whoever was minister, and give him a preponderating influence over every parliamentary opposition.

24. Naples surrendered to the French after a spirited resistance, chiefly from the Lazzaroni, who were averse to a change in established institutions.

31. The fortress of Ehrenbreitstein, which had been blockaded since 1797, surrendered to the French; by which they became masters of both sides of the Rhine, from Dusseldorf to Schaffhausen.

Feb. 2. A young woman, returning from Impington to Cambridge, was overtaken by a snow-storm, and from fatigue fell down, when she was covered with the snow, in which she continued eight days without food. Being discovered by a farmer, her life was saved, though she lost her feet by mortification.

20. El-Arich surrendered to Buonaparte: soon after, Gaza opened her gates, and Jaffa was carried by storm. Palestine was thus overrun, and the victor continued his triumphant march towards Acre.

21. Rev. Gilbert Wakefield tried for his pamphlet in answer to the bishop of Llandaff (ante p. 601), and condemned to pay a fine of 100*l.*, and to suffer two years' imprisonment. At first this eminent scholar was confined in the King's-bench prison, but was soon removed to the common gaol of Dorchester.

27. A general fast-day.

Mar. 1. The directory having declared war against the emperor, Jourdan, at the head of 40,000 men, crossed the Rhine at Kehl and Basle.

5. The East India Company gave up the point of recruiting for its own service. Recruits in future were to be engaged for ten years, leaving it to their option to enlist for a further term of five years, the company stipulating to defray the expense of their passage home.

Archduke Charles crossed the Leck.

6. The snow lay so thick on the ground that the passage of the Manchester and Carlisle coaches was impeded, and the mails forwarded on horseback.

8. Massena took by assault the fortress of Lucienstein, cut out of a rock in the channel of the Rhine, and the only passage through the Rhetian Alps between the Voralberg and the Grisons.

13. Nearly two-thirds of Pera, a suburb of Constantinople, destroyed by fire.

16. By the accidental sinking of the pavement a well was discovered near the front gate of the Royal-exchange, which had not been used for 600 years. The water being of excellent quality, the ward of Cornhill purposed erecting a pump over it.

18. SIEGE OF ACRE.—Buonaparte reached Acre on the 18th, and on the 20th opened his trenches. Sir Sidney Smith, in the Tigre of 84 guns, was in the road. He had captured the French flotilla laden with their besieging train. However, the French pushed their works within half-musket shot of the town-ditch, and, having made a breach, attempted to carry the place by assault, but were repulsed. An alternation of attacks and sorties followed for the space of sixty days, in which Buonaparte pitilessly sacrificed his bravest soldiers, and was at last compelled to raise the siege.

25. Battle of Stockach, between the archduke Charles and Jourdan. Ten thousand men were left dead or dying on the field, and the French compelled to retreat towards the Rhine.

Apr. 5. Battle of Magnan: the Austrians, under Kray, being joined by the vanguard of the Russians, forced the French, under Scherer, to retreat across the Mincio. This was Scherer's third defeat, and his retreat rendered unavailing the success of Lecourbe in the Tyrol, who withdrew into the Engadine. At the opening of the campaign, the whole of Italy was in possession of the French; and the revolutionary spirit having strongly seized the more enterprising of the Italians, a native auxiliary force might have been raised, which would have enabled them to defy the efforts of the combined forces; but the proceedings of the French Directory had long been marked by arrogance and imbecility, and their generals, especially Scherer, the late minister of war, were unequal to the emergency.

14. General Suvarof assumed the command of the Austro-Russian armies in Italy. In a short time the French were expelled from the principal towns in the north, which compelled Macdonald to evacuate the kingdom of Naples, and cross the Appennines.

15. Orders issued on the parade, St. James's-park, for disbanding the 5th, or Royal Irish regiment of dragoons, for insubordination; the officers to continue on full-pay till December, and then be placed on half-pay.

Sackville (earl of Thanet), Denis O'Brien, R. Ferguson, T. Thompson, and

T. G. Brown, were tried for a riot and attempt at rescue at Maidstone, at the conclusion of the trials of O'Connor and others for high treason. Lord Thanet and Ferguson were found guilty, fined, and sentenced to one year's imprisonment.

16. A powerful army of Turks having assembled, from Damascus and about Mount Tabor, to raise the siege of Acre, they were suddenly attacked by Buonaparte, and great numbers driven into the Jordan. What most surprised the Infidels was to be at once beaten through a line of nine leagues; so little were they acquainted with the rapid combinations of European tactics.

28. The French plenipotentiaries at Radstadt, Bonnier and Roberjot, were way-laid and assassinated near Radstadt, by a troop of Szeckler's hussars, or persons resembling them. Jean Debry was also left for dead, but recovered. The perpetrators of this base crime were never discovered; the infamy is shared between the French emigrants and Austrians.

The Austrians under Melas entered Milan. At Bortero the French under Serurier, to the number of 3000, surrendered.

May 3. Benjamin Flower, the printer of the "Cambridge Intelligencer," was brought to the bar of the lords for reflecting, in a paragraph, on the bishop of Llandaff's speech, on the subject of a union with Ireland; and lord Grenville moved that he be fined 100*l.*, and committed to Newgate for six months. Lord Holland objected to this summary proceeding; but it was justified by lord Kenyon, and the motion was carried.

20. Buonaparte compelled to raise the siege of Acre. He cheered his followers—for this reverse met with his accustomed boast—informing them that "new dangers and glory awaited them."

27. The Russians entered Turin.

30. James Perry, the editor; John Vint, the printer; and George Ross, the publisher of the "Courier" newspaper, fined, and sentenced to imprisonment, for a paragraph, stating "the emperor of Russia to be a tyrant among his own subjects, and ridiculous to the rest of Europe."

June 5. Archduke Charles compelled Massena to evacuate Zurich.

15. Buonaparte reached Cairo from Acre, having traversed the Great Desert, 70 leagues wide, which separates Asia from Africa.

18. Suvarof defeated Macdonald on the Trebia, with immense loss.

20. Cardinal Ruffo, at the head of the royalists and some Russian auxiliaries, entered Naples. Soon after a confederate force of English, Russians, Italians, Portuguese, and Turks entered the port under the convoy of lord Nelson, and invested the castle of St. Elmo. Capua and Gaeta were afterwards taken by the assistance of the English. A severe vengeance was shortly after inflicted, in contravention of a solemn treaty, on the Neapolitan patriots, with the culpable connivance of Nelson, acting under the influence of the profligate wife of the English ambassador, sir William Hamilton.

21. George III. inspected the volunteer corps of the metropolis, to the number of 12,200, at their respective stations.

18. CHANGES IN THE DIRECTORY.—The annual renewal of one-third of the legislature did not improve the position of the directory, who had become unpopular from the expedients to which their financial difficulties had compelled them to resort, and the reverses of the republican armies. On the removal of Rewbel on the 18th, by the lot of secession, the other directors, with the exception of Barras, relinquished the directorial purple. Four new rulers were therefore chosen; among whom were the silent and speculative abbé Sieyes, then ambassador at Berlin. These changes did not restore public confidence, and a general insurrection against the existing authorities prevailed in the western departments.

July 7. The Kennet and Avon canal opened.

25. Battle of Aboukir, in which the Turks lost 18,000 men, and the French 1000. By this signal victory, Buonaparte retrieved French affairs in Egypt, which had suffered during his absence in Syria.

28. Mantua, with a garrison of 10,000 men, dishonourably surrendered to the Austrians.

Aug. 1. The king reviewed the Kentish volunteers, to the number of 5000, at lord Romney's seat. Seven thousand persons dined in marquees erected on the lawn.

16. BATTLE OF NOVI.—The combined armies, under Suvarof and Melas, defeated the French under Joubert and Moreau. It was the most bloody encounter of the campaign. Three times Suvarof charged the centre of the enemy in person, at the head of his hardy veterans, and three times he was repulsed by the valour of the French. The gallant Joubert, leading on the French infantry to the charge, was struck by a ball which pierced his heart. The loss on both sides, in killed and wounded, was estimated at 20,000 men. The fortune of the day was decided by Melas turning the right wing of the French.

20. The valuable Dutch settlement of Surinam surrendered to the English, under lord H. Seymour.

24. BUONAPARTE LEAVES EGYPT.—Party dissensions in France, her danger from external foes, and the opening these difficulties afforded to the ambition of this extraordinary leader, seems to have suddenly determined him to quit Egypt. His campaign in the East had been signalised by splendid triumphs, and only one reverse. It greatly increased his European fame, by showing him no less a Mahomet than a Zinghis Khan. He had availed himself of the usages of warfare, as well as of the superstitions of Islamism. The military execution of his Turkish prisoners at Jaffa, though sanctioned by the strict rules of modern war on flagrant breaches of parole, was one of those sanguinary acts that could only have been perpetrated in a barbarous region. Buonaparte gave no intimation of his departure, further than the following brief announcement to the army, dated August 23rd.—“In consequence of news from Europe, I have determined immediately to return to France. I leave the command of the army to general Kleber. It shall hear from me speedily: this is all I can say at present.” Next day he sailed from the road of Aboukir, taking with him Berthier, Lannes, Murat, Marmont, Andreossi, and Bessieres; with the philosophers Berthollet, Mongé, and Arnaud. On September 30th he reached Corsica. And October 7th, landed at Frejus. The same good fortune, in escaping the enemies' cruisers, attended him in leaving and returning to France.

26. EXPEDITION TO HOLLAND.—While the armies of France were fully occupied in Italy and Germany, a favourable opportunity seemed to offer for wresting Holland from her dominion. An expedition, under sir Ralph Abercrombie, having set sail from England on the 13th, came to anchor in about a fortnight, off the Helder, where the troops disembarked. On the 30th, admiral Mitchell summoned the Dutch fleet to surrender, and to hoist the Orange flag, which was complied with unresistingly. The number of ships captured were eight of the line, besides smaller rates, and four Indiamen. An affair with general Brune, who commanded the French and Dutch troops, to the amount of 25,000, September 18th, terminated in favour of the English. On the 13th, the duke of York assumed the chief command of the army, which amounted to nearly 35,000 effective men, including 17,000 Russians. On the 2nd of October, general Brune was driven from his position, and forced to take up a new one near Beverwyck. An attempt made to force this position failed: this, and the severe defeat of the Russians by Vandamme, led to a suspension of arms. The British commanders, finding no support from the inhabitants, resolved to relinquish the enterprise. In conformity with this resolution, they evacuated Holland by capitulation; and, as the price of being suffered to re-embark without molestation, 6000 seamen, Dutch or French, prisoners in England, were to be liberated.

29. Died, at Valence in France, whither he had been conveyed by order of the directory, pope Pius VI., aged 82.

Sept. 11. Tortona surrendered to Suvarof. Italy had been reconquered in less time than it had been lost by the disasters of the Austrians in 1796. In obedience to his capricious master, Suvarof now directed his march towards Switzerland, where a second army of Russians, under Korsakoff, had joined the archduke Charles at Schaffhausen. This formed the right wing of an extended military line, having for its centre the force under Suvarof, and for its left, in Italy, the Austrians under Kray and Melas.

24. BATTLE OF ZURICH.—The approach of Suvarof with reinforcements determined Massena immediately to attack the enemy before him. At the first onset, the brave Austrian commander Hotze was killed. Zurich was entered, sword-in-hand, by the French, and Korsakoff, with the loss of his baggage and artillery, retreated by Bulach. Suvarof, enraged at this repulse, wrote to Korsakoff,—“You shall answer with your head if you make another retrograde step. I am coming to repair your errors.”

PARLIAMENT was assembled, to enable the king to avail himself of the voluntary services of the militia. A bill for this purpose was forthwith introduced, allowing, instead of one-fourth, as permitted by the act of last session, three-fifths of the militia of each county to enlist in regular regiments, with a bounty of ten guineas to each man upon so enlisting. The other parliamentary business of the year related chiefly to commercial and financial matters.

27. Commodore Trowbridge having blockaded the port of Civita Vecchia, the city of Rome surrendered to the arms of Britain; a destiny of this famous capital of the world never revealed by the augurs of the Julian or Augustan ages! The French garrison, aware of the fate of the patriots of Naples, refused to capitulate till the safety of those of Rome was guaranteed: to which Trowbridge generously acceded, unwilling to be the instrument of the vengeance of the queen of Naples.

Oct. 4. Suvarof penetrated to Schwitz, and carried by assault the post of Brunnen, with the bridge over Molen, after a desperate resistance from Lecourbe. This was the last of his triumphs; he was unable to join Korsakoff. Had he pushed through the valley of the Glaris, he would have fallen into the snare which Massena had laid for him. Indignant at this check, he sullenly retired into the Grisons, closely pursued by the French, who cut off a large part of his heavy artillery and baggage. On the 7th, Korsakoff again advanced, but the indefatigable Massena—now the Ajax of France—passing rapidly from the right to the left of the French line, gave him another repulse. It was incessant fighting, and the slaughter dreadful. Constance, three times won and lost, remained at last with the republicans. In the space of fifteen days 30,000 men on both sides are said (Belsh. Hist., xi. 151) to have fallen victims to the sword.

9. The La Lutine, which had sailed from Yarmouth with 600,000 dollars on board, shipped by English merchants for the relief of commercial houses in Hamburg, foundered at sea: every soul on board perished, except Schabracq, a notary-public, who was picked up.

28. Sir George Dunbar, bart., major of the 14th Light Dragoons, shot himself with a pistol at his house in Norwich. The catastrophe arose out of a quarrel, at mess, with his brother officers, which preyed on the baronet's mind.

Nov. 7. The directory gave a grand entertainment, in the church of St. Sulpice, to Buonaparte and Moreau, who a few days before had met, for the first time in their lives, at the house of Gohier, president of the directory. Seven hundred and fifty guests were present; but no women or spectators were admitted. The president gave for a toast, "Peace;" and Buonaparte, the "Union of all Frenchmen."

9. DISSOLUTION OF THE DIRECTORY.—The reception of Buonaparte at Paris, and on his journey from Frejus, had been most enthusiastic. He was considered the good genius of France, who would extricate her from all her difficulties. The directory had become unpopular from its arrogance, tyranny, and rapacity; and, exclusive of the royalists, the country was divided into the two prevalent parties of the moderate and violent republicans. All parties paid court to Buonaparte, and confided to him their designs; but his aim was to attach the military, in which he succeeded. After some time passed in political intrigues, the moderates, at the head of whom was Sieyes, agreed upon a scheme for the subversion of the existing government. An alarm of a conspiracy was spread; the council of elders, a majority of whom were favourable to the design, was suddenly assembled, and a decree passed to remove the legislative sittings to St. Cloud, and to invest Buonaparte with the command of every species of armed force in the capital. The result of these measures was the resignation, voluntary or forced, of the three directors, Gohier, Moulin, and Barras, who were opposed to the movement, Ducos and Sieyes being favourable. On the 9th, the legislature met at St. Cloud; the council of elders in the Great Gallery, and that of 500, of whom Lucien Buonaparte was president, in the Orangery. Buonaparte entered the council of elders, and, in an animated address, described the dangers that menaced the republic, and conjured them to associate their wisdom with the force which surrounded him. A member using the word "Constitution," Buonaparte exclaimed, "The Constitution! It has been trodden under foot, and used as a cloak for all manner of tyranny."—Ann. Reg., xli. 20. Meanwhile a violent debate was going on in the Orangery, several members insisting upon knowing why the place of sitting had been changed. The president endeavoured to allay this storm; but the removal had created great heat, and the cry was, "Down with the dictator! No dictator!" At that moment Buonaparte himself entered, bareheaded, followed by four grenadiers: on which several members exclaimed, "Who is that? No sabres here! No armed men!" while others descending into the hall, collared him, calling him "Outlaw," and pushed him towards the door. One member aimed a blow at him with a dagger, which was parried by a grenadier. Disconcerted at this rough treatment (Hazlit's Life of Napoleon, ii. 297), general Lefebvre came to his aid; and Buonaparte retiring, mounted his horse, and addressed the troops outside. His brother Lucien also made a forcible appeal to the military, and the result was, that a picket of grenadiers entered the hall, and, the drums beating the pas de charge, cleared it at the point of the bayonet. In the evening the council of elders, and that of the 500 again assembled; but the latter was a more compliant assemblage than had met a few hours before. Lucien Buonaparte congratulated the members present on the deliverance they had obtained from the yoke of demagogues and assassins. His speech was interrupted only by applauses. The day being now sufficiently prepared, Boulay de la Meurthe, in an able speech, urged the necessity of a radical change in the constitution, and an intermediary project, already adopted by the council of elders, was introduced. By this it was declared that the directory had ceased to exist; that sixty-one deputies were disqualified, by their violence, for the national representation; that a provisional consular commission should be appointed, composed of citizens Sieyes, Ducos, and Buonaparte; and that the two councils should name committees, of 25 members each, to prepare a new constitution. Thus terminated the famous revolution of the 18th Brumaire, and which, like that of Thermidor, in 1796, was wholly effected in the short space of twenty-four hours (Belsh. Hist., xl. 223). Both were accomplished after the Cromwellian fashion, the intervention of the soldiery, and the forcible exclusion of refractory representatives, being the leading features.

18. In the interval between the abolition of one constitution and the creation of another, the consuls were vested with a dictatorship, in virtue of which, 59 of the most inveterate Jacobins were sentenced to banishment; but this decree was never carried into effect. Several rigid republicans, who had been exiled, were recalled. Among them, Carnot and Pastoret. Lucien Buonaparte was made minister of the interior; Talleyrand, of foreign affairs; Carnot, of war; and Bouché, of police. The tyrannical laws against emigrants and priests were softened or repealed. On the other hand, only twelve newspapers were allowed to be published. Before this purgation, there had been fifty journals in Paris, morning and evening.—Ann. Reg., xlii. 50. They were, for the most part, badly printed, in respect of type and paper. The price was two sous; of which the hawkers were allowed one-third for profit.

27. The earl of Scarborough, with his sister, passing through a side of Fitzroy-square which was badly lighted, the coachman mistook his way, and drove over, into an area 10 or 12 feet deep. His lordship and sister escaped with slight contusions; the coachman had his ribs broken, and the footman died in consequence of his injuries.

Died, in his 90th year, Kien Long, emperor of China, over which he had reigned sixty-four years; and had the honour of receiving, successively, poetical addresses from Voltaire; the author of the "Pursuits of Literature;" and Peter Pindar.

Dec. 6. A meeting at the London-tavern to alleviate the distresses of the poor. The example of 1795 was recommended; and Mr. Forster stated, that in the month ending April 27th, 40,000 persons had been relieved, by 759,918 meals from the soup-shops, at an expense of 3476*l*. A subscription was opened.

13. CONSULAR CONSTITUTION.—The legislative committees having finished their labours in little more than a month, the new constitution was presented to the French nation. The government generally acknowledged to be the most desirable, was one adapted to practical uses, not to any preconceived theory. By the new code, the constitution was to consist of an executive composed of three consuls, one bearing the title of chief, and in fact possessing all the authority: of a conservative senate composed of eighty members, appointed for life; the first sixty to be nominated by the consuls, and the number to be completed by adding two, annually, for ten years: and a legislative body of 300 members; with a tribunate of 100. The power of proposing new laws was vested in the executive, and the senate were to fill up vacancies in their own body. The integrity of the representative principle was obviously compromised in the consular system; but it was accepted by a vast majority of the citizens. The votes in favour of the constitution were 3,012,659; against it, 1562. Buonaparte was nominated the first consul, for ten years; Cambacères and Lebrun, second and third consuls, for five years. Sieyès, who had taken an active part in the revolution, and in framing the new constitution, was rewarded by the grant of an estate, in the vicinity of Paris, of the annual value of 15,000 francs.

14. DEATH OF GENERAL WASHINGTON.—This great man, and chief founder of American independence, expired, in his 68th year, leaving a name likely to conciliate the general suffrages of posterity. Characters of greater brilliancy there may have been, but none possessing more solid worth and usefulness. Judgment and good sense were the predominant traits of his intellect, to the exclusion of fancy or vivacity, to which he made no pretension. Equally inaccessible to the flatteries of life, or the suggestions of despondency, he held on his firm and patriotic course with undeviating consistency. Washington left a widow, but no issue; and honours of every kind were paid to his memory by his grateful countrymen.

25. Buonaparte was no sooner made first consul than he made a direct overture to the king of England for peace. It was written with manly simplicity, and an appearance of sincerity, but did not meet with a corresponding return. It was handed to lord Grenville, who, in a long official reply, adverted to the origin of the war; and without assuming to prescribe a form of government to France, expressed an opinion, intimating that the "restoration of the ancient line of princes, under whom France had enjoyed so many centuries of prosperity," would afford the best guarantee for the maintenance of peace between the two countries. The last condition, involving in its attainment the destruction of the existing government in France, of course put an end to all further communications.

30. French consuls decree that the remains of Pius VI. should receive sepulchral rites, which for six months had been denied them.

31. The French prisoners in England amounted to 25,646, and the consuls signified their intentions of discontinuing the usual remittance for their subsistence. The French government had hitherto maintained the French prisoners in England, and England had maintained the English prisoners in France; but the consuls reckoned on a saving by discontinuing this system; as the number of prisoners was fewer, and the price of provisions less, in France than in England.

PRICES OF CORN.—The average price per bushel of wheat this month was 8s. 5d.; barley, 4s. 5d.; oats, 3s. 5d.

DEATH OF TIPPOO SAIB.—Among the events of this year was the death of Tippoo Sultan, and the extinction of the Mysore kingdom. This chief ill brooked the curtailment of his dominions, and had opened negotiations with the French republic. Upon the 5th of May, his capital (Seringapatam) being stormed, Tippoo, after contesting every inch of ground to the interior of his palace, was found, when the conflict ceased, amidst a heap of slain. His two sons had previously surrendered, upon an assurance of safety. His territories were divided by the conquerors; the English taking the southern portion and Seringapatam, by which their empire reached from sea to sea. The Nizam and the Mahrattas had the remainder; but the latter refused their portion, and it fell to the other partners in the dismemberment.

IRISH REBELLION.—The amount of claims for damage sustained by the loyalists from the rebels, in the summer of 1798, were, for the county of Wexford, 311,341*l.*; Wicklow, 129,978*l.*; Mayo, 99,739*l.*; Kildare, 932,233*l.* The total of claims for all the counties was 792,508*l.*—Ann. Reg., xli. 32.

SCIENCE AND ARTS.—A new instrument was invented by Lowry to engrave parallel lines.

The French introduced their new, but not very intelligible, system of weights and measures, founded on the kilogramme and the metre, or ten millionth part of the distance from the pole to the equator.

The metaphysics and poetry of Germany began to be noticed in England: the former from Kant's writings, and the latter from the plays of Schiller and Kotzebue.

Dr. Jenner, who had begun his investigations on the cow-pox so early as 1776, succeeded this year in getting it into extensive practice.

In the "Philosophical Transactions" was published an account of a sub-marine forest, examined by Mr. Correa, on the coast of Lincolnshire, near the village of Huttoft.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—At Halle, John Reinhold Forster, LL.D., author of several works on natural history, and the gentleman who, with his son, accompanied captain Cook in his second voyage of discovery. Thomas Payne, 82, who for forty years kept a bookseller's shop at the Newgate, and which obtained the name of "The Literary Coffee-house," from the number of literati frequenting it. Spallanzani, a celebrated Italian naturalist. Galvani, the discoverer of galvanism. William Melmoth, 89, author of "Letters of Pliny the Younger," &c. At the Carpenters' Arms, in the parish of Wick, James White, an unfortunate literary gentleman, author of the "Adventures of Richard Cœur de Lion," &c. James Burnet, called Lord Monboddo, 85, an eccentric metaphysical writer. William Seward, F.R.S., 52, biographical and anecdote writer. Joseph Towers, LL.D., dissenting minister, and an author of eminence. William Curtis, 53, author of "Flora Londinensis." At Athens, John Tweddell, 32, an accomplished scholar and traveller. Richard earl Howe, a successful English admiral. John Bacon, 59, the celebrated sculptor. At Bowood-park, John Ingenhouz, M.D., an ingenious natural philosopher. At Abbeville, Marmontel, 79, author of "Belisarius," and his own "Memoirs." Borda, 84, an eminent French mathematician.

A.D. 1800. PROSPECTS OF THE YEAR.—The first consul adopted prudent measures to secure himself in power. He conciliated the royalists, treated the clergy with respect, and offered peace to England and Austria. His amicable overtures not being favourably received, he sought peace by a vigorous prosecution of the war; and this, so far as Germany was concerned, was attained by the victories of Marengo and Hohenlinden. The fickle Paul of Russia not only withdrew from the confederacy against France, but revived, in hostility to England, the armed neutrality of the northern states. Malta, Goree, and Curação surrendered to the British arms; but the attacks on Ferrol and Cadiz failed. The union with Ireland was completed. The scarcity of this year was greater than the preceding,* and occasioned tumults in London and other places. Parliament passed several measures to increase the supply and diminish the consumption of bread. But prosecutions being instituted, at the suit of the crown, against regrators, engrossers, and forestallers, the popular prejudice against an useful class of middlemen was inflamed, and the most effective mode of enforcing national economy, in the use of bread-corn, counteracted.

Jan. 1. There prevailed hot disputes in France and England about the commencement of the new century; some ascribing it to Jan. 1, 1800, and others, to Jan. 1, 1801; but the astronomer Lalande, who took part in the dispute, showed clearly that the year 1800 was part of the 18th century. The same ridiculous question was agitated in 1760.

9. The Bank agreed to advance 3,000,000*l.* to government without interest, for six years, but liable to be called in, if the 3 per cent. consols rose to 80, on condition of a renewal of their charter to Aug. 1, 1833.

10. First soup-establishment for the poor in Spitalfields.

15. The question of the UNION being brought forward in the Irish house of commons, it was strenuously opposed by Grattan, Curran, and W. C. Plunkett. It was supported by Corry, the chancellor of the exchequer, and lord Castlereagh, secretary; and an approving address was carried by 139 against 24.

17. Chelmsford church fell in. It was erected, by the contributions of the townsmen, in 1424.

20. Correspondence with Talleyrand closed by a letter from lord Grenville of this date.

22. PARLIAMENT reassembled, and, in a message from the king, notice was taken of the late correspondence with France. A vehement debate ensued; but such was the dislike and suspicion of the French government, that an approving address was voted in the lords, by 79 to 6; and in the commons, by 260 to 64.

24. A convention signed between general Kleber and the grand vizier, for the evacuation of Egypt by the French troops. The negotiations had been carried on in concert with sir Sidney Smith, aboard the Tigre.

A storm blew down the remains of king John's castle at Old Ford, near Baw. It was built in 1203, and was the place where that prince usually slept after signing Magna Charta.

Feb. 6. REPENTANCE OF ORLEANS. —The duke of Orleans (Louis Philippe, the present French king) having arrived in London from Clifton, waited on Monsieur (afterwards Louis XVIII.), and on being introduced into his closet, addressed him by saying, "That he had come to ask forgiveness for all his faults, which he hoped would be forgotten. They were the effect of error, and were chiefly to be attributed to the evil counsels of an intriguing woman (madame de Genlis), who had been entrusted with the care of his education. He was ready to shed the last drop of his blood in the reparation of his errors, and in defence of the rights of his lawful sovereign." —Ann. Reg. xii. 3. Monsieur then embraced the duke, and said he had no doubt of the sincerity of the professions he had just heard.

19. Resolutions in favour of peace were moved by Mr. Waltham, and carried at a common-hall of the city of London; 2000 persons were present.

26. SCARCITY OF BREAD.—An act came into force, prohibiting the sale of bread which had not been baked twenty-four hours. It was thought that the consumption of stale bread would be much less than new, and was intended to mitigate the prevailing scarcity; the price of bread having become higher than had ever before been known, owing to two successive bad harvests. Resolutions were also entered into by members of both houses of parliament, to lessen as much as possible the consumption of bread and flour in their families; and their example was generally followed by the superior ranks. Mr. Arthur Young estimated the average deficiency of the late harvest at rather above one-third.

Mar. 11. The Royal Institution, for the promotion of the fine and useful arts, held its first sittings.

At a conclave held at Venice, cardinal Chiaramonte, a native of Cesena, was elected pope; when he took the name of Pius VII.

17. Lord Keith's flag-ship the Queen Charlotte of 110 guns, caught fire just before day-break, while under easy sail, between Gorgona and Leghorn, and burnt to the water's edge, and then blew up, by which upwards of 700 lives were lost, the boats not being able to contain one-fourth of the crew. Lord Keith was at Leghorn when the accident happened.

20. British government refused to ratify the convention for the evacuation of Egypt by the French: upon which Kleber vigorously assailed the Turks, and defeated them.

21. Ionian republic, consisting of Zante, Corfu, and other Venetian islands, formed, under the protection of the Porte.

27. Legislative union agreed to in both houses of the Irish parliament, chiefly through the management of lord Castlereagh.

The crew of the Danaë frigate mutinied, and carried her into Brest harbour.

30. At the close of the assizes at Chelmsford, the judge having put the black cap on, to sentence a man for forgery, Mr. Garrow pointed out a variance in the spelling of the Christian name in the forged note and in the indictment: in the former it being abbreviated Bartw., and in the latter, Bartholomew. Baron Hotham held the objection to be fatal to the indictment, and the culprit escaped death.

Apr. 5. Lord Keith blockaded Genoa, which was besieged on the land side by the Austrians under Melas, and resolutely defended by Massena.

25. Moreau crossed the Rhine.

May 3. Defeated, with great loss, general Kray at Stockach.

5. Buonaparte leaves Paris to place himself at the head of the grand army of reserve, 50,000 strong, at Dijon.

15. James Hadfield discharged a pistol at the king from the pit of Drury-lane theatre. He had been in the army, and wounded in the head, and was soon discovered to be insane. On the morning of the same day, while the king was reviewing a battalion of the guards in Hyde-park, a spectator standing near his majesty was wounded by a ball-cartridge, fired in one of the volleys by a soldier, who was not discovered.

18. DEATH OF FIELD-MARSHAL SUVAROV.—This able but ferocious warrior died near Petersburg, in his 70th year. His death is supposed to have been hastened by chagrin; arising either out of the late check he met with in Switzerland, or the sudden change in Russian policy. He was not, however, disgraced, but received with distinction by the imperial court. Suvarov was of Swedish extraction, and originally intended for the legal profession, which he early abandoned for the more congenial pursuits of violence and slaughter. He was disinterested, affable even to buffoonery, superstitious, and desperately brave, but cruel to the vanquished.

20. Buonaparte, after astonishing efforts, passed the Great St. Bernard.

June 5. The French enter Pavia. On the same day Massena, after a pertinacious defence, surrendered Genoa to the Austrians; and that day the Austrian general Ott received orders to raise the siege.

14. General Kleber assassinated in his garden at Cairo. The general received four stabs; and Protain, the architect, was severely wounded in trying to parry the poniard of the murderer. The assassin had come from Aleppo across the desert, and confessed he was employed by the aga of the janizaries in the grand vizier's army.—Menou's Dispatch, July 3rd. He was executed after the Egyptian fashion, being impaled, having first had his right hand burnt; and three chiefs who were privy to, and had concealed the object of his atrocious mission, were beheaded, and their bodies burnt.

17. VICTORY OF MARENGO.—This irregular but sanguinary conflict decided the fate of Italy. It was fought on a plain six miles long, between Tortona and Alexandria. The French force, commanded by Buonaparte, was about 50,000, of which 3000 were cavalry; that of the Austrians, under Melas, 60,000; of which 15,000 were cavalry. The French were formed in two lines, with cavalry on the wings. Behind their centre was a defile, having a wood on the one side, and on the other a chain of vineyards extending to the village of Marengo. The Austrians were drawn up on the banks of the Bormida, over which bridges had been thrown. About noon the battle began. Eighty pieces of cannon preceded the Austrian battalions, and discharged into the ranks of the French showers of shot and shells. After several hours' desperate fighting, the left of the French, under Victor, and the right, under Lannes, began to give way; and it was with difficulty the centre, commanded by the first consul, kept its ground. At this critical juncture the divisions of Desaix and Monnier arrived on the ground. The fortune of the battle now began to change. Unable to force the centre of the French, Melas tried to turn the defile in their rear by extending his wings. Weakening his centre for this movement, Buonaparte seized the opportunity to pierce it with a collective force; and Desaix with his fresh troops, falling with irresistible impetuosity on the left wing of the Austrians, they everywhere gave way. The Austrian cavalry, by charging en masse, attempted to retrieve the day, but were repulsed by Murat. Night coming on, the confusion was irremediable; and at the passage of the Bormida a terrible carnage ensued. The village clock struck ten, when the French, weary of slaughter, returned slowly to their camp, leaving the field covered with the dead and the dying. The loss of the Austrians, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, was 15,000; that of the French, 10,000, including the intrepid Desaix, who finished a short life (being only 32) of military glory in the arms of victory. The loss of the Austrians in the first month of the Italian campaign amounted to 60,000, and induced Melas, the day after the battle of Marengo, to propose an armistice. It was acceded to by the victor on the conditions that neither side should send reinforcements into Germany, and that the Austrians should surrender to the French Genoa, Tortona, Coni, and other strong places. Immediately after, Buonaparte re-established the Cisalpine republic, and, with Berthier, sung Te Deum in the cathedral of Milan, regardless, as he said, of the taunts of "the atheists of Paris."

28. Moreau, forcing Kray before him, penetrated to Munich.

July 2. UNION WITH IRELAND.—The act for this purpose received the royal assent, to commence January 1st, 1801. By this important instrument the established churches and legislatures of the two countries became consolidated, and the two kingdoms united, under the name of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. Four lords spiritual, by rotation of sessions, and twenty-eight temporal lords, elected for life, were to represent the peers of Ireland in the house of lords; and 100 commoners to sit in the house of commons. The laws and courts of each kingdom were to continue unchanged. The contributions of Britain and Ireland towards the public expenditure were, for twenty years, to be in the proportion of fifteen to two; but the interest of the public debts of each was to be separately defrayed.

4. Mr. Busby found guilty of regrating, in buying corn in Mark-lane, and on the same day, in the same place, reselling it. Lord Kenyon said to the jury, "You have conferred by your verdict almost the greatest benefit on your country that ever was conferred by any jury" (Ann. Reg., xlii. 23). During the existing scarcity, forestalling, regrating, and engrossing, excited as much popular—and seemingly, from the remark of the learned judge—judicial prejudice as witchcraft formerly.

12. First stone of the new dock in the Isle of Dogs laid.

Downing college incorporated.

15. Armistice agreed to in Germany.

22. Sir Francis Burdett complained, in the house of commons, of the treatment by governor Aris of the prisoners confined, under the suspension of the Habeas-corpus Act, in Cold-Bath-fields.

28. Preliminaries of peace between France and Austria signed at Paris, which the emperor refused to ratify, because England was not a party to them.

29. Parliamentary session closed.

Samuel F. Waddington tried at Worcester assizes, and found guilty of forestalling hops.

John S. Boothby Clopton, esq., committed suicide with a pistol. He was well known at the club-houses, and left an estate of 7000*l.* a year.

Aug. 2. The Union Act having received the assent of the Irish parliament, the session and their existence terminated.

Two new squares began to be formed on the duke of Bedford's Bloomsbury estate: one to be called Russell-square; the other, Tavistock-square.

10. A person by accident set fire to Radnor forest, and, owing to the dryness of the season, it burnt for thirty miles in circumference, destroying thousands of sheep and many cottages. The earl of Oxford and Mr. Lewis were the chief sufferers.

23. A sad accident happened near Selkirk in Scotland. Four young ladies—Miss Ayres, Miss Anderson, and the two Miss Scotts of Singlee—were drowned, while bathing in the Ettrick, which ran at the bottom of Mr. Scott's garden. It is supposed one of the ladies had got out of her depth, and all had perished in a vain attempt at saving her.

25. Sir Edward Pellew and sir James Pulteney fail in an attack on Ferrol.

27. Lord Keith despatched two sloops of war to burn the small town of Cosenatico, on the Adriatic Gulf; which fully succeeded in their mission, and retaliated on the inhabitants the offence they had given his lordship by arresting a British officer charged with dispatches.

29. The emperor of Russia, in an edict, complained of the interruption of the navigation of the Sound by British ships; and sequestrated the property of British subjects in Russia.

30. The grand-jury of York recommend the enclosure of waste lands, of which there remain 7,800,000 acres in England, as the best preventative of future scarcity.

Died, Mrs. Montagu, sister of lord Rokeby, and author of an "Essay on the Writings of Shakspeare;" and distinguished for her hospitality to the chimney-sweepers, whom she regaled with roast-beef and plum-pudding, every May-day, on the lawn before her house. She was an excellent scholar and, like her name-sake, a celebrated letter-writer. Her estates, about 10,000*l.* per annum, devolved to her nephew Mr. Montagu.

31. Riots at Birmingham and other towns, owing to the high price of provisions. The houses of bakers and meal-men were violently attacked; and hardly any corn-factor could sleep in his bed with security. (Belsh. Hist. xii. 123.)

Sept. 5. Malta, the chief place of which. La Valetta, had been two years under blockade, surrendered to the British.

14. An inflammatory placard stuck on the Monument, urging the people to rescue themselves from famine by their own exertions, and take vengeance on monopolists and forestallers.—Annual Register, xlii. 212. In consequence, for several days, there were riotous assemblages, who began breaking the windows of bakers and other obnoxious persons. But by the prudence of lord mayor Combe, aided by the volunteers, no serious outrages were committed.

30. Joseph Buonaparte, on the part of the French republic, signed a treaty of amity and commerce with the United States of America.

Oct. 9. The British government refusing to negotiate on the basis of a separate peace with France, the correspondence between M. Otto and Lord Grenville was abruptly terminated.

31. The superb chapel of St. George, Windsor, finished in the Gothic style.

Nov. 7. Paul of Russia laid an embargo on British vessels to the number of 300, and their crews, contrary to usage in such cases, were taken out and sent into the interior; and all English property sequestrated. The alleged ground of these outrages was that the English had taken possession of Malta, without recognising the right to the island of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, of which the emperor was grand-master.

9. PARLIAMENT opened by the king with a speech, chiefly referring to the high price of provisions.

10. Prussia takes possession of Cuxhaven under pretext of maintaining the neutrality of the north of Germany, and thereby occasions some uneasiness in England.

The guard of a Dover coach shot near Shooter's-hill, and the coach robbed by two highwaymen.

19. Mr. Abbot introduced a bill for ascertaining the population of Britain.

22. American congress assembled, for the first time, at the new city of Washington.

Dec. 3. The Austrian army, under the archduke John, attacked the French, under Moreau, at HOHENLINDEN; but, one of the Austrian columns losing its way, they were entirely defeated with the loss of 10,000 men and eighty pieces of cannon. After this victory Moreau penetrated into the Salzburg territory, and Augereau having made himself master of Bamberg, and Bruce of Trent, the emperor was again induced to propose an armistice, which was agreed to on the 25th.

15. ARMED NEUTRALITY.—The northern powers revived the armed neutrality for the protection of maritime rights, to which Prussia acceded. The basis of this league was:—1. That merchant ships under convoy are not liable to search. 2. That the effects which belong to the subjects of the belligerent powers in neutral ships, with the exception of contraband goods, shall be free. 3. That arms and ammunition only shall be considered as contraband. (Belsh. Hist., xii. 99.) These maxims of international law were especially directed against England; and the establishment of them would have deprived her of the chief advantages of her naval superiority.

29. INFERNAL MACHINE.—An attempt made in Paris on the life of the first consul, by placing a combustible machine in a cart, intercepting his way to the opera; it exploded after he had passed, but did considerable damage, and destroyed several lives. Several royalists and jacobins were apprehended by the activity of Fouché, on suspicion of being contrivers of the infernal machine, and special tribunals created, with despotic powers, for the trial of the disaffected.

31. This short parliamentary session and the century closed by the king. Before his majesty withdrew, he ordered the chancellor to read a proclamation declaring that the individuals who composed the expiring parliament should be the members on the part of Britain of the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and that this imperial parliament should assemble January 22nd, 1801.

31. CALENDAR.—Owing to the act for the correction of the calendar in 1752, this year was not a leap-year, as it otherwise would have been, and from the first day of March there was a difference of twelve days between the new and old styles, instead of eleven as formerly. By this alteration old Lady-day will be on April 5th, and so continue for a century.

IMPORT OF CORN.—The following is the quantity of corn imported into Britain, between September 26th, 1799, to September 27th, 1800:—

Wheat and flour	1,261,932 qrt.
Barley	67,988
Oats	479,320
Rice	300,693 cwt.

The average price in the month of December of wheat per bushel was 16s. 4d.; barley 7s. 6d.; oats 5s. 2d.

BENTHAM'S PROJECT.—Jeremy Bentham, esq., proposed to the Lords of the Treasury (Annual Register, xlii. 396) to take charge of the convicts now confined in the hulks; to erect a building for their detention; feed, clothe, educate and instruct them in useful trades: all this he undertook to accomplish at a reduction in the present expense to the amount of twenty-five per cent. In the centre of his establishment he proposed to have a point of view from which a superintendent might see every convict, without being himself visible. He also proposed a subsidiary establishment, to which every convict might resort for employment in the trade in which he had been instructed, after the term of his punishment had expired.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—George Stevens, A.S.S., commentator on Shakspeare, &c. Joseph Warton, D.D. A.D. 1801. PROSPECTS OF THE YEAR.—At the commencement of the year every continental port was closed against the British; but the sudden death of the emperor Paul, and the victory of Copenhagen, dissolved the northern confederacy. After concluding peace with Austria the attention of the French was drawn to vast preparations for a pretended invasion of England; they answered the purpose of a real descent by alarming the kingdom and wasting the national resources in defensive preparations. In Egypt France suffered a great reverse by the decisive victory of Alexandria; after a pertinacious resistance they were compelled to capitulate to the British and evacuate the country. Meanwhile negotiations for peace were secretly carrying on between the consular and English government, which ended in the settlement of the preliminaries to a definitive treaty. The chief domestic events were,—the first meeting of the Imperial Parliament, the resignation of Mr. Pitt, and the formation of the Addington ministry, a return of the king's indisposition, and the mutiny of the fleet in Bantry Bay. The high price of bread continued till after the harvest, occasioning severe distress among the labouring classes, and much popular discontent.

Jan. 1. Being the first day of the century, as well as of the union with Ireland, it was ushered in by the ringing of bells and the firing of the Tower guns.

3. A royal proclamation declaring that in future the regal title appertaining to the imperial crown of Britain and Ireland shall be, in Latin, Georgius Tertius, Dei gratia, Britanniarum Rex, Fidei Defensor: English,—"George III., by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith." Thus the absurd titular assumption of "King of France," was omitted. In honour of the union many promotions were made, and new titles conferred on the nobility of Ireland; a considerable number of whom either received advancement of rank in their own order, or were created peers of the United Kingdom. A new great seal was presented to the lord chancellor, and the members of the council took the oaths as privy councillors of the United Kingdom.

14. An order of council laying an embargo on all Russian, Danish, and Swedish vessels.

15. East India Company grant a pension of 5000*l.*, to commence from 1798, for twenty years, to the marquis Wellesley. The marquis, with the concurrence of the company, established a university at Calcutta upon a liberal and extensive scale.

22. IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT met for the first time. It was opened by commission, and Mr. Addington was unanimously re-chosen speaker.

26. Tailors' wages advanced by the city magistrates from 2*s.*, to 27*s.* a week.

31. The sale of fine wheaten bread prohibited from this day, and brown bread substituted.

The situation of the French prisoners in England very deplorable, the first consul having refused to defray the expense of their clothing.

Thomas Jefferson, after a warm contest, elected president of the United States, and Mr. Burr, vice-president.

Feb. 2. The king opened parliament. Earl Fitzwilliam moved an amendment to the address, which was supported by lords Darnley, Suffolk, Carnarvon, Moira, Holland, and Fife; opposed by lords Romney, Grenville, Mulgrave, and Spencer. It was negatived by 73 to 17 peers. A similar amendment was moved by Mr. Grey in the commons, and negatived by 245 to 63 voices.

9. TREATY OF LUNEVILLE concluded between Austria and France. The whole of the left bank of the Rhine was confirmed to France from Switzerland to Holland. The independence of the Helvetic, Batavian, Cisalpine and Ligurian republics was conceded by the emperor, who was left in possession of his Venetian acquisitions; the Adige being made their boundary. The duke of Tuscany was indemnified in Germany for the loss of his duchy.

10. Mr. Addington resigned the speakership, his majesty having signified his intention of appointing him to an office with which it was incompatible. On the same day lord Grenville informed the upper house, that the ministers being unable to carry a measure they deemed essential to the tranquility and prosperity of the empire, they had tendered their resignation, which had been accepted.

12. The earl of Pomfret appeared in court to enter into recognizances to keep the peace towards his wife.

Two reports have been made by Mr. Dodd, on the progress of his undertaking to cut a tunnel under the Thames, from Gravesend to Tilbury, for passengers and carriages. The committee examined the shaft, and found that a steam-engine would be requisite to keep out the water flowing in from the lateral springs.

14. A fire in a factory at Manchester, by which forty persons perished.

16. A return of the king's malady was announced under the name of a fever, which did not entirely leave him till March 12th. The last question discussed in the cabinet, previous to the king's indisposition, was that of the extension of political privileges to the catholics of Ireland, which Mr. Pitt had given them reason to expect as a result of the union.

RESIGNATION OF MR. PITT.—On the same day that the king's indisposition was publicly announced, Mr. Pitt took occasion in the house of commons to state the grounds on which he and some of his colleagues had retired from the ministry. This was stated to be their inability to bring forward a measure which they deemed essential to give complete effect to the union with Ireland. Such a measure Mr. Pitt stated if he had "remained in the government he must have proposed." (Annual Register, xlii. 129.) Among the difficulties attending the concession of political rights to the Irish catholics, Mr. Pitt did not probably foresee that of obtaining the consent of the king, who conceived it to be contrary to the obligation of his coronation oath. The objection was insuperable and long remained so; and placed the minister in the painful position of being unable to redeem the obligation he had contracted with a numerous body of subjects. This was the sole reason assigned for his resignation and was perhaps sufficient, but other reasons may have influenced this determination. Mr. Pitt's popularity had declined. All our continental allies had deserted us, and some of them had formed a menacing league hostile to our maritime claims. The expeditions to Egypt and Copenhagen had not yet achieved their brilliant triumphs. Popular discontents were aggravated by a two years' scarcity, and war taxes, though the facility with which an enormous loan was raised in the current year, shows no great pressure of financial difficulties. Peace, however, had become desirable from the hopeless prospects of the war, and the first step to an amicable negotiation was the retirement of men whose minds were embittered by disappointment, and who had assumed a tone of decided hostility to the consular government. Mr. Pitt had been premier more than seventeen years. He was accompanied by his resignation by earl Spencer, lord Grenville, Mr. Dundas, and Mr. Windham, all members of the cabinet, and other changes took place afterwards.

18. The completion of the ministerial arrangements being delayed by the king's illness, Mr. Pitt continued chancellor of the exchequer, and brought forward the budget. The sum stated as the amount of necessary supplies was upwards of 35,000,000*l.*, to defray which, besides new taxes, a loan of 25,000,000*l.* was proposed.

Mr. Corry, the chancellor of the exchequer for Ireland, stated the debt of that country to amount to 36,000,000*l.*; more than thirty of which had been contracted since the commencement of the war.

Mar. 2. The state-prisoners who had long been confined in the Tower, Coldbath fields, Shrewsbury, and other county gaols, were brought to the duke of Portland's office, and most of them liberated on their own recognizances. Col. Despard, Gallevay, Lemaitre, and Hodgson, refusing to give bail, were committed to Tothill-fields; they insisted upon being discharged unconditionally, or brought to trial.

3. Spain declared war against Portugal, on the ground of her connexion with England, and refusal to ratify a treaty concluded with France in 1799.

12. Lord Castlereagh introduced a bill for continuing martial law, on account of the insurrectionary state of Ireland. It was supported by all the Irish members, Sir Laurence Parsons alone excepted. Mr. Pitt paid many compliments to the talents of lord Castlereagh and his extensive knowledge of the true interests of the British empire.—Annual Register, xlii. 157. The bill became law.

The king's illness was distressing to the royal family, particularly as none of the regular medicines administered could induce repose. In this emergency, when professional skill was baffled, the casual observation of Mr. Addington, afterwards lord Sidmouth, upon the virtue of a pillow of hops, was acted upon, and had the effect of relieving the sufferer from his malady.

17. Henry Dundas, president of the board of control, received from the East India Company a pension of 2000*l.* a year, to be continued to him or his assigns during the continuance of the exclusive trade of the company.

ADDINGTON MINISTRY.—The new premier received his appointments on the 17th inst., but the administration was not completed till July 30th, when the duke of Portland was declared lord-president. The following was the ministerial list:—

Mr. Addington, Premier.

Duke of Portland, Lord-President.

Lords Hawkesbury, Pelham, and Hobart, Secretaries of State.

Earl of Westmoreland, Lord Privy-Seal.

Earl St. Vincent, First Lord of the Admiralty.

Lord Eldon, Lord Chancellor.

Earl of Hardwick, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland.

Lord Auckland, Postmaster-General.

Charles Yorke, Secretary at War.

Sir Edward Law, Attorney-General.

Spencer Percival, Solicitor-General.

Dudley Ryder, Treasurer of the Navy.

Thomas Steele and Lord Glenkervie, Paymasters of the Army.

The new ministry seem to have been formed with the two-fold object of putting an end to the war, and evading the agitation of the Abolition question. Mr. Addington had given general satisfaction as speaker of the house of commons; he had acquired the king's personal favour by his decorous manner and respectable character, but he had no political reputation, neither had any of his colleagues. They were obviously brought forward to do what their predecessors were unable or unwilling to accomplish, and when their task was done they were dismissed.

19. Owing to the prosperity of the Bank of England, the proprietors resolved that in addition to the annual dividend of 7½ per cent., a bonus of 5½ in navy 5 per cents. shall be paid on each 100*l.* stock.

21. A convention concluded between France and Spain, by which the latter guaranteed the renunciation of the duchy of Parma by the reigning duke to the French Republic, in lieu of which the duchy of Tuscany was assigned to the son of the duke of Parma, with the title of King of Etruria. Spain also ceded the colony of Louisiana to France and the isle of Elba.

BATTLE OF ALEXANDRIA.—A large armament having been fitted out for the recovery of Egypt, under the command of sir Ralph Abercrombie, it effected a disembarkation on the 8th inst. with great spirit, at Aboukir. Advancing against the French, posted at some distance from Alexandria, a severe though indecisive action ensued on the 13th. On the 20th general Menou arrived, and concentrating the whole disposable force of the French, determined next day to attack the British. The force on each side was about 12,000. The English occupied a line about a mile in extent, nearly four miles from Alexandria, having a sandy plain in their front, the sea on their right, and the lake of Aboukir on their left. The battle began before day-light with a sham attack on the English left, which was succeeded by a real one on the right; after a long and desperate engagement the assailants were completely defeated, and their famous corps of Invincibles almost annihilated. The loss of the French in killed, wounded and prisoners, was upwards of 3900; that of the British 1400. Among the latter were the gallant sir Ralph Abercrombie, who terminated a long career of brilliant services. General Hutchinson, a brave and able officer, succeeded to the command, and followed up the victory of his predecessor so effectually, that early in autumn the French army capitulated, upon condition of being conveyed with their arms, artillery, and effects to their own country. A British force from India by the way of the Red Sea arrived, under Sir David Baird, just after the conclusion of the treaty, which terminated the grand project of the French of making Egypt an entrepôt for the conquest of Hindostan.

25. Paul emperor of Russia assassinated in the 46th year of his age, and the fifth of his reign. He was succeeded by his son Alexander, whose first acts were to liberate the English from confinement, and open negotiations by which the armed neutrality was dissolved. Paul had shown signs of insanity, and this was the pretext for his destruction; but, in more civilized countries, such an unfortunate malady meets with different treatment. This extraordinary act seems to have been thought both necessary and laudable in Russia, for Alexander afterwards admitted as guests at his table the murderers of his father.

30. Sir Thomas Duckworth and general Trigge captured the Danish island of St. Thomas, and the Swedish island of Bartholomew in the West Indies.

April 2. ATTACK ON COPENHAGEN.—A powerful armament, consisting of 18 ships of the line, with a number of frigates and bomb-vessels, sailed for the Baltic, March 12th, under the command of admiral Parker, and vice-admiral Nelson. On the 30th the fleet passed the Sound, with no resistance from the Swedish, and little from the Danish side of the strait. On approaching the harbour of Copenhagen the fleet of Denmark was descried flanked and supported by powerful batteries on land and floating. An attack on this formidable crescent was entrusted, at his own request, to Nelson with twelve ships of the line, and all the smaller craft. It began at ten o'clock in the morning, and was kept up on both sides with the greatest courage for four hours, when both fleets exhibited a very shattered appearance. Seventeen sail of the enemy had been burnt, sunk, or taken; while three of the largest of the English ships, owing to the intricacies of the navigation, had grounded within reach of the enemies' land batteries.

At this juncture Nelson proposed a truce, to which the prince of Denmark promptly acceded. The loss of the English in killed and wounded was 942; that of the Danes 1900. Nelson described the battle of Copenhagen as the most dreadful he had ever witnessed.

3. The Prussian troops entered the electorate, and compelled the regency of Hanover to disband their troops. Hamburg was seized by the prince of Hesse with 15,000 Danish troops.

4. A female taken into custody named Robinson, who, under the pretence of being a rich heiress, had swindled tradesmen to the amount of 20,000*l*.

14. On the report of a secret committee, bills for further suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, and preventing seditious meetings, were passed with the usual majority. Bills of indemnity were also passed for protecting persons in authority from the consequences of their zeal and activity since 1793; and in Ireland, since 1799.

26. A riot in Wych-street, owing to the discovery of some human bodies, intended for anatomical purposes.

May 4. Earl Temple moved for a new writ for Old Sarum to return a member in lieu of the Rev. J. H. Tooke, who being in priest's orders, was ineligible to a seat in the house of commons. This was not agreed to, but a bill was brought in by Mr. Addington to declare persons in holy orders in future disqualified to sit, which became law. The exclusion of clerical representatives in the lower house cannot be esteemed unfortunate, if lord Clarendon's remark be true, that "Clergymen understand the least, and take the worst measure of human affairs, of all mankind that can read and write."

14. The income of the London corporation amounts to 92,062*l*.; its expenditure, to 87,828*l*.

18. First stone of the Stock-exchange, in Capel-court, laid by Mr. Hammond.

June 1. Embargo taken off Russian, Swedish, and Danish vessels in the British ports.

3. The foundation laid for the building of the bank of Scotland, in Bank-street, Edinburgh.

6. The Spaniards under the Prince of Peace having got possession of all the strong places in Portugal, the latter agreed to a treaty, stipulating to shut her ports against the English.

13. Thomas Spence, a poor bookseller, was sentenced by lord Kenyon to pay a fine of 50*l*., and be imprisoned a twelvemonth, for publishing a seditious libel, called "Spence's Restorer of Society;" in which he recommends the abolition of private property in land, and the vesting it in parishes, for the good of the public at large.

17. Lord St. Helens signed a convention with Russia at Petersburg, by which is conceded the right of search to ships of war; and to which Sweden and Denmark acceded.

19. The duke of York laid the first stone of the Military-asylum, Chelsea.

30. Two of the York hussars shot on Bincombe Down, pursuant to sentence of a court-martial, for an attempt to escape to France.

July 1. STEAM BOAT.—"An experiment," says the Annual Register, "took place on the river Thames, for the purpose of working a barge, or any other heavy craft, against tide, by means of a steam-engine on a very simple construction. The moment the engine was set to work, the barge was brought about, answering her helm quickly; and she made way against a strong current, at the rate of two miles and a half an hour."

2. Parliament prorogued by commision.

10. Paddington canal opened.

13. Sir James Saumarez burns near Cadix two Spanish ships of 112 guns each, and captures one of 74 guns. Some days before, the admiral lost an English 74, by her grounding under an enemy's battery near Algeiras.

22. Grand review, by the duke of York, of the London Volunteers, amounting to 4734, in Hyde-park.

14. The queen gave a splendid rural fête in Frogmore-gardens. Six hundred of the nobility were invited by tickets; none others were admitted. Mrs. Mills personated a gipsy, delivering her poetical auguries of the future fortunes of the several members of the royal family. Ducrow exhibited his feats of strength and dexterity, balancing on his chin three coach-wheels; also a ladder, to which was affixed two chairs with two children on them. A ball at the princess Elizabeth's thatched barn concluded the entertainments.

15. An impostor named Smith, without being in orders, or in any way connected with the clerical profession, officiated for the curate of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, solemnizing marriages (which were void), baptisms, &c. He officiated for a month, and would have continued had he not been apprehended on a charge of forgery, for which he was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death.

24. Colonel Clinton takes Madeira.

Aug. 4. Lord Nelson bombarded Boulogne, and sunk several gun-boats. This was only an experimental attempt to discover the position and defences of the enemy; and on the 15th and 16th it was renewed in earnest. The most desperate courage was displayed to board and cut out the French vessels, but they were so well prepared, that only a lugger was brought off, and a severe loss was inflicted on the assailants, who showed more daring than judgment.

21. Sale by auction of Mr. Beckford's splendid furniture at Fonthill-abbey. Not a stool, a tripod, or any other article, fetched so little as a guinea. It was a sign of the times, to see plain Wiltshire farmers bidding for some of the finery in this gorgeous accumulation of an inordinate fortune and effeminate taste.

Sept. 9. Died, at Hackney, much regretted, in his 46th year, the Rev. GILBERT WAKEFIELD, late a prisoner in Dorchester gaol (ante 614). Mr. Wakefield had distinguished himself in Biblical and classical learning, and was a sincere lover of the truth, which he pursued with little regard to consequences, in religion, criticism, and politics. A subscription of 5000*l.* was raised for him during his long imprisonment; and he had begun a course of lectures on Virgil in London, when he was carried off by a typhus fever.

Oct. 1. Preliminaries of peace between Great Britain and France were signed at lord Hawkesbury's office, in Downing-street, by his lordship, and M. Otto, on the part of the French government. Wearied of a war, now without an object, intelligence of this event was joyfully received by the people of both countries. A few days after, France concluded a peace with Russia, the Porte, and Portugal.

The emperor Alexander crowned at Moscow. Thirty thousand persons were entertained at dinner, the recruiting service for the year discontinued, fines remitted, and debtors to the crown liberated from prison.

10. General Lauriston, aid-de-camp to the first consul, having arrived with the ratification of the preliminaries, the populace took the horses from his carriage, and drew it to Downing-street. At night there was an illumination, which was renewed the next evening.

29. PARLIAMENT opened by the king, who announced the signature of preliminaries, and congratulated them on our naval and military triumphs. In both houses the addresses passed unanimously. Mr. Sheridan said it was a peace of which every one was glad, but no one proud.

Nov. 3. DEBATE ON THE PRELIMINARIES. —The subject of the peace was formally debated in both houses; and in the upper house a decided opposition to its terms was expressed by lords Spencer, Fitzwilliam, Caernarvon, Buckingham, Grenville, and the bishop of St. Asaph. It was defended by Moira, Bedford, St. Vincent, Nelson, Westmorland, Hobart, Pelham, and the bishop of London. Nelson said that neither Malta nor Minorca was important as a naval station. On a division the minister's address was carried by 114 to 10. In the commons the preliminaries were defended by Fox, Pitt, and Hawkesbury; and assailed by Windham, Thomas Grenville, and lord Temple. The address carried without a division.

10. Mr. Barclay, of Ury, in Scotland, for a bet of 5000*l.* engaged to walk 90 miles in 21½ successive hours. He began his task at 12 o'clock at night, on the road between York and Hull, and completed it one hour, seven minutes, and fifteen seconds within the time.

Dec. 14. A large armament of 23 ships of the line and 25,000 men sailed from Brest, for the purpose of recovering the islands of St. Domingo and Guadaloupe; permission for this purpose having been obtained from the English government.

The prize-ox at Smithfield weighed near 300 stone, at 8 lb. to the stone, and was sold for 160*l.*

24. Buonaparte declined the offer of the inhabitants of Paris, to have a statue erected to his honour in his lifetime.

Robert Orme, 73; a servant of the East India Company, and author of a "History of Hindostan." Colonel Cyrus Trapaud, 87; the oldest general in the service. Sir Grey Cooper, 76; a pensioner, and author of some pamphlets in favour of the whigs. James Hurd, B.A., 38; author of a poem, and a critical disquisition on tannum, mentioned in the Scriptures. At Hadleigh, Mrs. Chapone, 75; poetess, and author of valuable works on education.

A.D. 1802. PROSPECTS OF THE YEAR.—Public events were lessened in number and interest by the cessation of hostilities; but though the preliminaries of peace were settled, there was a long delay in the conclusion of a definitive treaty. In the interval France was constantly giving new cause of suspicion and offence by the conclusion of secret treaties with other powers, by annexations of territory, and the assumption of authority in adjoining states. These excited uneasiness and heart-burnings, which were aggravated by the virulence of political writers in London and Paris. France had virtually ceased to be republican. Hy the promulgation of a new constitution, almost absolute power had become vested in the first consul. In England the chief domestic occurrences were the dissolution of the parliament, and the discovery of a treasonable conspiracy to overturn the government, at the head of which was a military officer, smarting under a sense of real or fancied injuries. As this plot was unconnected with any political party, and its means strangely disproportioned to its purposes, it excited no alarm, and hardly any feeling save that of commiseration for its misguided partisans. The harvests of this and the preceding year were abundant, and made up for the deficiency of 1800 and 1801.

Jan. 8. Trial of the mutineers of the Bantry Bay squadron began at Portsmouth. The mutiny arose from the squadron being ordered to the West Indies. Fourteen of the ringleaders were found guilty, and executed.

25. The constitution of the Cisalpine republic having been re-modelled, Buonaparte was elected its president; by which it virtually became annexed to France. Further annexations became known before the peace of Amiens.

28. GOVERNOR WALL.—This person, formerly lieutenant-governor of the island of Goree, was executed at the Old Bailey, for the murder of Benjamin Armstrong, a serjeant in the African corps, by causing 800 lashes, with a rope, to be inflicted by black slaves, with such cruelty as to cause his death. The populace gave three successive shouts of exultation when this unhappy criminal was launched into eternity. He was a native of Dublin, and his trial excited intense interest from his rank, his age, and from twenty years having elapsed since the commission of the offence. Mr. Wall had long lived in obscurity; and the trial at last took place at his own solicitation, either from a wish to disburthen his mind of the atrocious charge, the probability of the death of the witnesses against him, or hope of the royal clemency. But the last was incompatible with the severe justice about the same time being executed on the mutineers of Bantry Bay.

Feb. 8. A Margate-hoy lost on the sands near Reculver, and twenty-three persons drowned.

10. Charles Abbott, late Irish secretary, chosen speaker of the house of commons, in place of sir John Mitford, now baron Redesdale, appointed lord-chancellor of Ireland.

12. A king's messenger, on his way to lord Cornwallis, was attacked by two wolves near Boulogne, who tore off the lips of the horses.

15. The petition of 200 of the principal booksellers of London presented to parliament against the high duty on paper,

24. A puffing advertisement appeared, offering to dispose of a Queen Anne's farthing, for which 700 guineas had been offered and refused; alleging that it was one of the only two coined in that queen's reign. This, however, was a mistake, if not an artifice to enhance the price. Mr. Leake, in his "History of English Money," says that in queen Anne's reign "there were some few copper halfpence and farthings coined," and gives a description of them, pp. 405-6, Lond. edit., 1745. From this it appears halfpence are as rare as farthings, and neither are so much so, as to bear any extraordinary price.

Two attempts recently made by an incendiary to set fire to the town of Boston in New England.

Mar. 8. The lord-chancellor determined that Bibles printed by the king's printer in Scotland could not be sold in England, but might be exported.

The sons of a noble earl (Ann. Reg., xlv. 376), one of whom was breeding to be a bricklayer, and the other a tanner, have been lately seduced from these employments by their sister, to the great mortification of their father, who is disappointed in his favourite scheme.

PIC NIC SUPPER.—This season, says the Annual Register, has been marked by a new species of entertainment, common to the fashionable world, called a Pic Nic supper. It consists of a variety of dishes. The subscribers to the entertainment have a bill of fare presented to them, with a number against each dish. The lot which he draws obliges him to furnish the dish marked against it, which he either takes with him in his carriage, or sends by a servant. The proper variety is preserved by the taste of the maitre d'hôtel who forns the bill of fare.

24. Edward duke of Kent appointed governor of Gibraltar, in the room of the late general O'Hara.

27. PEACE OF AMIENS.—Nearly six months had elapsed since the agreement to the preliminaries of peace; during which time the country had been kept in a state of anxious suspense, and no diminution could be made in the war establishments. The leading feature of the definitive treaty was, that France retained all her conquests, while the acquisitions of England during the war were all given up, except the islands of Trinidad and Ceylon. The territories of the Porte were maintained in their integrity; those of Portugal placed in the same situation as before the war; the republic of the Seven Islands acknowledged; Malta and its dependencies were restored to the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, under certain restrictions. The French agreed to evacuate Naples and the Roman states; and the British, Porto Fer-rajo, and all the ports possessed by them in the Mediterranean and the Adriatic. Such were the leading stipulations of this temporary adjustment.

20. Civil-List Debts.—It appeared from the report of a parliamentary committee that a debt of no less than 900,000*l.* had been contracted since the passing of Mr. Burke's reform bill; and that during the whole period of Mr. Pitt's ministry the provisions of that act had been totally disregarded. A sum, however, was voted for making good the deficiency. Two days after, Mr. Manners Sutton, solicitor to the prince of Wales, made a motion concerning the claim of his royal highness, during his minority, to the revenue of the duchy of Cornwall, amounting to 900,000*l.* The chancellor of the exchequer opposed the motion. He objected that the house was not competent to decide on the legality of the claim; but if that was allowed, the expense of the education and maintenance of the prince ought to be deducted. Mr. Fox held that the prince had a right to be maintained and educated by his father, and that the same account ought to be rendered of the revenues of Cornwall as had been done of those of the bishop of Osnaburg to the duke of York. After much discussion by the law-officers, the claim was got rid of, by moving the order of the day, which was carried by 160 to 103.

Apr. 2. Died, at Bath, lord KENYON, chief justice of the court of King's-bench, over which he had presided since the death of Mansfield, in 1768. His lordship was inferior to his predecessor in eloquence, but respectable for integrity and patience in his judicial capacity. He always manifested a stern dislike to the low practices of pettifoggers, to the pursuits of gamblers, and to the sexual irregularities of the higher orders, as evinced in cases of seduction and adultery.

5. In bringing forward the budget, Mr. Addington announced the abandonment of the income-tax. The national debt was stated to amount to 500 millions, being an increase of 400 millions during the present reign.

9. Bank Restriction Act continued.

12. A motion by sir Francis Burdett, to inquire into the conduct of the late minister, rejected by 207 to 39.

18. FRENCH CONCORDAT.—The principal articles of this agreement with the pope were the establishment of the free exercise of the Roman-catholic religion; a new division of the French dioceses; the bishops to be nominated by the first consul, and to take an oath of fidelity to the republic; the bishops to appoint the curés, but under confirmation by the government; catholics permitted to make endowments to churches. To commemorate the settlement of the Gallican church, the first consul went in grand procession, drawn by eight horses, to the cathedral of Notre Dame.

19. Sir Edward Law, created lord Ellenborough, appointed lord-chief-justice of the King's-bench.

27. An amnesty, with the exception of those who had borne arms against France, in favour of the emigrants. They were not to interfere with the arrangements of property made previous to the amnesty; but they were restored to such remains of property as still remained in the hands of government.

29. Peace proclaimed in the metropolis. At night a brilliant illumination.

May 3. St. Domingo and its chiefs, Toussaint, Christophe, and Dessalines, submitted to the French.

5. Cleopatra's coffin, head of the Theban ram, and other Egyptian curiosities sent home by lord Elgin, landed at Portsmouth.

6. Rev. George Markham, third son of the archbishop of York, obtained 7000*l.* damages against Mr. Fawcett for crim. con. Mr. Erskine was counsel for the plaintiff; Mr. Best, for the defendant. The criminal intercourse had existed five years before its discovery, when Mrs. Markham had become the mother of nine children. It was an aggravated case, from a long and confidential friendship having subsisted from infancy between the parties.

7. THANKS TO MR. PITT.—Mr. Nicholls, seconded by Mr. Jones, moved an address to the king, thanking him for removing Mr. Pitt from his councils: upon which lord Belgrave, seconded by Mr. Thornton, moved an amendment to the effect that it was to the energy of the king's councils the country was indebted for the protection of the constitution from foreign and domestic foes. On a division, the amendment was carried by 222 against 52. Sir Robert Peel next moved a vote of thanks to Mr. Pitt, which was carried by 211 to 52. These motions had the fate which might be expected, and were ill-timed. Parliament could not pass a vote of censure on the late minister, whom they had with large majorities supported, without passing a vote of censure on themselves.

8. Buonaparte chosen first consul for life, with liberty to choose his successor. Registers were opened in every commune throughout France on the same day, and the suffrages of the nation taken; when there appeared the vast majority of 3,577,259 citizens for, and only 9074 against, these innovations (Belsh. Hist., xii. 413). In the tribunate, Carnot was the only dissident. On these great honours being conferred upon him, Buonaparte remarking on the inconstancy of fortune, said (Ann. Reg., xlv. 205), "How many are those on whom she has lavished her favours that have lived a few years too long."

13. Grand debate on the peace in both houses of parliament, but without any novelty of argument. No one affected to be proud of the treaty of Amiens, but such was the general impression of the necessity of peace to the country, and the impossibility of obtaining better terms by a protracted contest, that lord Grenville's motion in the lords was negatived by 122 to 16. In the commons a similar motion by Mr. Windham, impugning the terms of it, was negatived by the still greater majority of 276 to 20.

17. Slavery re-established in the colonies by the French legislature.

20. A destructive fire in Woolwich Warren, supposed to be the work of an incendiary.

24. A bill for the abolition of bull-baiting lost in the house of commons by 64 to 51. It was opposed by Mr. Windham, who contended that horse-racing and hunting were more cruel and immoral than bull-baiting or prize-fighting.

27. Mr. Canning's motion against the importation of fresh negroes into Trinidad negatived.

29. Mr. Pitt's birth-day commemorated at Merchant Tailors'-hall by a meeting of 900 noblemen and gentlemen; earl Spencer in the chair, who gave as a toast,—"The pilot who weathered the storm;" forgetting, as Mr. Belsham observes, that the "storm was not weathered till the pilot was thrown overboard."

June 3. Parliament voted 10,000*l.* to Dr. Jenner for the introduction of the vaccine inoculation; and 1200*l.* to Mr. Greathead, a ship-carpenter, of South Shields, for the contrivance of the life-boat.

26. First stone of the London Docks laid by the chancellor of the exchequer.

28. Parliament prorogued by the king, and next day dissolved by proclamation.

July 2. Died at his house in Stanhope-street, colonel BARRE, who began his parliamentary career contemporaneously with his countryman, Mr. Edmund Burke, and acquired celebrity by his energetic opposition to the American war. He had long held the sinecure, worth 3000*l.* a-year, of clerk of the pells, which Mr. Addington, at his death, gave to his son, then a youth at school (Ann. Reg. 430). Barré had been blind twenty years, but continued a cheerful companion to the last.

4. The king of Sardinia abdicated his throne in favour of his brother. Buonaparte soon after, under the pretext that the people had a right to choose their own government, annexed Piedmont to France.

15. The election for Westminster terminated in favour of lord Gardnet and

Mr. Fox—Mr. Graham, an auctioneer, and the popular candidate, declining the further prosecution of the contest. Immediately the result was declared, the mob began the demolition of the hustings, appropriating to themselves, agreeably to immemorial custom, whatever parts of the structure they could carry off.

MONARCHY IN FRANCE.—The French government was making rapid strides to monarchy. By a decree of the 12th, a kind of nobility was established, under the name of the legion of honour, each member receiving a salary proportioned to his rank. Soon after a senatus consultum was published, organising a new constitution, which was accepted at a single sitting by the legislative body. It empowered the first consul to name his colleagues, to choose his successor, and appoint forty members of the senate, the whole number of which was 120, and prescribe the only subjects on which they should deliberate.

29. Mr. Byng and sir Francis Burdett, after a severe contest, elected members for Middlesex, in opposition to Mr. Mainwaring.

Aug. 25. Buonaparte prohibited the circulation of English newspapers: immediately the order was issued the police visited the coffee-houses and reading-rooms, seizing the English journals. A war of abuse had been carried on for some time between the English press and the Moniteur, the official organ of the consular government.

28. Toussaint, the late chief of St. Domingo, imprisoned at Paris under the pretext of conspiring against the French government.

30. The Preston jubilee celebrated with great pomp and festivity; it is held every twenty-one years, and this is the eighteenth since the incorporation of the guild under Edward III.

Sept. 3. Mr. Fox received with great respect by Buonaparte at the Tuileries.

The number of English at Paris estimated at 12,000.

21. DESCENT BY A PARACHUTE.—M. Garnerin, who had lately ascended in a balloon from Ranelagh, Vauxhall, and Lord's cricket-ground, undertook this day to descend in a parachute. It was made of canvas in the form of an umbrella, having at the top a large flexible hoop of about eight feet diameter. Beneath this was a basket, or tube of wicker-work, in which the aeronaut was seated. The ascent was made from near North Audley-street; and at the height of 4000 feet Garnerin cut the cord, and the parachute separated from the balloon. He descended with great rapidity; and, from the oscillation, and almost horizontal position of the parachute and basket, the adventurer appeared in the utmost danger. After a few moments of painful suspense to the spectators, he alighted, without serious injury, in a field near St. Pancras church.

25. At Sturibach fair, a false alarm of "fire!" was given at the theatre, which caused such a rush to escape, that four persons were trampled to death and thirty bruised.

Oct. 1. Buonaparte interfered as mediator in the subsisting differences between the smaller Swiss cantons.

2. A famous robber, named Schündermann, apprehended. He had long spread terror on both banks of the Rhine by his daring exploits; and was supposed to have formed himself on the model of the Carle Moore of Schiller. He robbed only the rich, especially Jews and the clergy, and gave part of his booty to the poor. He had a gang of 200 under him, by one of whom he was betrayed.

The king of Spain annexed to the royal domains all the property of the Knights of Malta in his dominions, and declared himself grand-master of the order in Spain. It was a new obstacle to the execution of the treaty of Amiens, and was supposed to be done at the suggestion of France.

13. A swindler, under the assumed name of the hon. colonel Hope, completely duped many people at Keswick, and contrived to marry the famed "Beauty of Buttermere." His real name was John Hatfield, a married man and uncriticized bankrupt.

21. The bishopric of Osnaburg, which only belonged alternately to the house of Brunswick, was, by a decree of the German diet, secularised, and annexed to Hannover, in exchange for some territories of the electorate.

Nov. 1. During the performance of Pe-rouse at the Preston theatre, when the hero fired at the Indian, the wadding entered the thigh of the latter (Mr. Bannerman), which caused mortification, of which he died.

6. After an interval of thirteen months since the signing of preliminaries of peace, general Androssi arrived as ambassador from France.

An English newspaper called the Argus is now published at Paris, which is unceasingly occupied in abusing the government and people of this country. The editor is named Goldsmith, formerly proprietor of the Albion newspaper in London, and translator of the "Crimes of Cabinets."

Lord Seaforth has introduced into the West Indies the seeds of the palm that produces the fibres from which the cordage and cables, called in the East Indies gomootoo, are manufactured.

16. MEETING OF THE NEW PARLIAMENT. — The new members elected were unusually numerous—they amounted to 184, of whom 145 were English, 14 Scotch, and 25 Irish. The elections had been carried on in Liverpool, Nottingham, Norwich, Westminster, and in Middlesex, with considerable heat, and even violence. At Norwich Mr. Windham was thrown out, and Mr. Mainwaring for Middlesex; in Westminster, Mr. Fox, the "friend of the people," had a sharp contest with the popular candidate. Upon the whole the Whig party was strengthened; but there was no division on the address in either house of parliament, though the royal speech foreboded a renewal of the war: Mr. Abbot was unanimously rechosen speaker.

TREASONABLE CONSPIRACY. — Colonel Despard, who was lately discharged from Cold-Bath-Fields prison for seditious practices, was apprehended at the Oakley Arms, Oakley-street, Lambeth, with thirty-six of his confederates, principally consisting of the labouring classes—English, Irish, and Scotch, and among them three soldiers of the guards. After several previous examinations before the privy-council, the colonel and fourteen others were fully committed to take their trial for high treason before a special commission.

29. In the court of king's bench, Hamlyn, a tinman at Plymouth, was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, and to pay a fine of 100*l.*, for offering Mr. Addington a bribe of 2000*l.* to procure for him the place of land-surveyor.

Dec. 10. Lord Ellenborough ruled that no witness should be bound to answer any question which tends to degrade himself, or to show himself to be infamous. This doctrine was warmly opposed by Mr. Erskine, but his lordship affirmed it to be the law of England.

29. A jobbing gardener, who for twenty years had lived in a cave or hermitage on the borders of Sydenham-common, near Dulwich, and acquired the appellation of the "Man of the Woods," was barbarously murdered by the gipsies of that neighbourhood.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—The Rev. Arthur O'Leary, 73, a popular catholic clergyman, and founder of St. Patrick's chapel, Soho. At Dublin, John Fitzgibbon, earl of Clare, lord chancellor of Ireland, and a statesman deeply engaged in the coercive policy of the Irish government. John Moore, M.D., 72, author of 'Zeluco,' and books of travels. Alexander Geddes, LL.D., 65, a learned Roman catholic, who, under the patronage of lord Petre, commenced a new and literal translation of the Scriptures, which was not much encouraged either by the divines of his own or of the protestant faith. Welbore Ellis, F. R. S., lord Mendip, 89, one of the Portland party, and often referred to by Junius in not very respectful terms. At Lucknow, in the East Indies, general Claud Martin, who bequeathed a fortune of 475,000*l.* almost entirely to charitable uses. At Woburn, much respected, Francis duke of Bedford, 37; his grace sunk under a surgical operation for hernia; he was never married, and was succeeded in his title and estates by his next brother, lord John Russell. Joseph Strutt, 55, author of "Sports and Pastimes." At Paris, M. de Calonne, the celebrated finance-minister of Louis XVI.

REVENUE, DEBT, TAXES.

The war of 1793 was entered into with sanguine expectations that it would be of short duration. In a military sense France was far from formidable; her army in 1793 did not exceed the usual peace establishment of 130,000 men, and its strength was greatly impaired by the emigration of its principal officers, as well as by the general relaxation attendant on a continental peace of thirty years. All the chances of the contest were in favour of the allies; in the number and discipline of their armies, in extent of financial means, and the stability of their governments, they possessed a decided superiority; a single campaign seemed sufficient to humble the French, to march to Paris, and re-establish the monarchy. These anticipations proceeded upon the old common-place data of politicians, without contemplating the revolutionary resources of talent, energy, and enthusiasm — issues of assignat, levies en masse, and confiscations of property, about to be placed at the disposal of the new rulers of France.

During the first four years of the war no extraordinary fiscal expedient was resorted to; the deficiency in the taxes was supplied by annual loans, which rapidly increased from 11,000,000*l.* in 1794 to 32,500,000*l.* in 1797. In the latter year the war-taxes, chiefly from the increase in the assessed taxes, amounted only to 3,000,000*l.*; but the great loan of 1797, combined with other causes, depressed the 3 per cents. below 48, and rendered a new system of finance necessary to the support of public credit. Upon this emergency Mr. Pitt resolved, by a great increase of the war-taxes, to raise a large portion of the supplies within the year; the public, from the increase of riches, and the general prosperity, being well able to bear additional burdens. This plan was vigorously acted upon in 1798 by the imposition of the income-tax, which at once raised the war-taxes to 12,000,000*l.*; in 1799 to 17,000,000*l.*; in 1801 to 17,000,000*l.*; and in 1802 to 19,000,000*l.*—(Lowe's Present State of England, p. 22.) The increase of taxes, however, caused no relaxation in the system of borrowing; greater means placed at the disposal of government, and greater the expenditure; till at length the war-loans amounted to upwards of forty millions.

The following statement from Dr. Hamilton (Inquiry into the National Debt, 3rd. edit. pp. 157, 269) exhibits the sums raised by taxes and loans from the commencement of the war in 1793 to the peace of Amiens:—

Years.	By Taxes.	By Loans.
1793	17,170,400	4,500,000

COMMERCE, SHIPPING, AGRICULTURE.

As no market of importance was closed against England by the breaking out of the war, British commerce continued steadily to increase after its commencement. In 1793 there was a mercantile revulsion and a great number of failures, but they were unconnected with the war, and arose from the speculations in corn by some great houses, and the general spirit of over-trading during the nine antecedent years of peace. After Holland was overrun by the French, and forced into the war against this country, the shipping interest was benefited by obtaining a part of the carrying trade of the United Provinces; but only to a limited extent, as the largest portion of this navigation was transferred to neutrals, Americans, Danes, Swedes, and Prussians. It was mainly a continental, not a naval or mercantile war; and, in consequence, the impulse previously given by numerous mechanical discoveries and improvements to commercial and manufacturing industry continued unabated to the peace of Amiens. In the subjoined statement it appears that the official value of the cargoes exported more than doubled from 1793 to 1802; and the amount of tonnage employed in the export trade of Great Britain increased in nearly an equal ratio:—

Years.	Tonnage.	Value of Cargoes.
1793	1,281,447	£20,390,180
1794	1,537,099	26,748,083
1795	1,400,296	27,123,338
1796	1,563,105	30,518,913
1797	1,351,371	28,917,010

AGRICULTURE would, in the ordinary course, have benefited by the prosperity of commerce, had not its natural tendency been partly counteracted. The first effect of the war was to withdraw from agriculture a portion of labour and capital, to produce a rise in the rate of interest, and to necessitate the abandonment of many projects of improvement, such as drainages, canals, and other undertakings dependent for success on a low rate of interest. The scarcity of capital was partly remedied by the Bank Restriction Act and increased issues of paper money; but another cause operated disadvantageously. This was the unfavourableness of the seasons. In the ten years, from 1793 to 1802 inclusive, there were only three good harvests; the rest unfavourable. In 1793 the season was favourable; in 1794-5, a partial deficiency in each year; in 1796-7-8, seasons less unfavourable; 1799-1800, bad seasons; in 1801-2, good crops.—(Low's Present State of England, p. 130.) As any rise in price, occasioned by a bad harvest, is not an equivalent for a deficiency in the crops, it is obvious that the seasons were against agricultural improvement.

The backwardness of agriculture and high price of wheat in 1795-6 originated, in 1797, a parliamentary inquiry into the waste-lands of the kingdom, and the passing of enclosure acts. In the Report of the Committee it is stated, that the first enclosure act, according to the modern system, was passed in 1710. (Ann. Reg. xxix. 411.) Only one other act passed in Queen Anne's reign. The number of acts passed, and acres of land enclosed, up to 1797, is stated as follows:—

Reign.	Acts.	Acres.
Anne	2	1,439
Geo. I.	16	17,660
Geo. II.	226	318,778
Geo. III.	1532	2,804,197

The Committee estimated the acreage of England at 46,000,000; of which 1,300,000 acres were common fields, and imperfectly cultivated, and 9,800,000 waste or common, leaving one-fifth part open to a general enclosure act.

The following statement will elucidate the condition of labourers in husbandry in the period under notice; it is the weekly expenses of the family of an agricultural labourer, consisting of 34 persons, being an average of the expense of 65 families of labourers in different parts of England, collected by Sir F. Eden in 1796:—

Exclusive of rent, fuel, clothes, deaths, births, and sickness, which made the average expense amount to 36*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.* a-year.

Wages, both in husbandry and skilled trades, were greatly advanced by the high price of provisions in 1800-1; those of labourers fully one-half, and those of the carpenter, bricklayer, mason, and plumber, rose to above double the rates mentioned on a former occasion (p. 567).

The increase of burials in 1800-1 was, doubtless, partly caused by the dearth, approaching to famine, of these years; it is by connecting such effects with their causes that a value is given to statistical tables.

CANAL-NAVIGATION, PORT OF LONDON.

The first efforts to extend internal navigation were directed to the widening, deepening, and otherwise improving the natural rivers of the kingdom. In 1635 Mr. Sandys formed a project for rendering the Avon navigable, through the counties of Warwick, Worcester, and Gloucester, "that the towns and country might be better supplied with wood, iron, pit-coal, and other commodities." Similar attempts, in other districts, continued to be made for a century later; but for the most part with indifferent success. Rivers not communicating direct with the sea, and unaided by the tide, mostly form expensive and uncertain channels for the conveyance of merchandise. The ascent of them is laborious; their banks and beds are constantly undergoing changes by the shifting of sands, and the action of the current, and of floods; they are often impassable in summer, from drought; and in winter, from inundations. These difficulties in the way of river-navigation suggested the expediency of abandoning the channels of most rivers, and of digging parallel to them artificial channels, in which the water might be kept at the proper level by means of locks.—(McCulloch's Com. Dict., 211.) The first lateral canal of this sort in England was begun 1755, for improving the navigation of Sankey-brook on the Mersey. But it is to the Duke of Bridgewater, and his celebrated engineer, James Brindley, that the country is chiefly indebted for this description of internal navigation. Possessing valuable coal-fields on his estate at Worsley, seven miles from Manchester, but the sale for which was diminutive, owing to the expense of transport, the duke sought to obviate the disadvantage. He first thought of making Worsley-brook navigable to the Irwell, which, was itself navigable to Manchester; but was diverted from the project by Mr. Brindley, who was aware of the inconvenience of river conveyance, and whose favourite idea was that "rivers were chiefly valuable to feed navigable canals." Acting on the suggestion of this bold and ingenious engineer, the duke constructed a level canal from Worsley to Manchester, carrying it over the Irwell by an aqueduct 39 feet high. The canal in 1761 was extended by a side-branch running through Cheshire, parallel to the Mersey, and falling into that river at Runcorn, by which a safer and cheaper conveyance by water was opened from Manchester to Liverpool. Immense benefits resulted from these enterprises; the price of coals was reduced to one-half at Manchester; the rates of carriage from that place to Liverpool had heretofore been 12s. per ton by the Mersey, and 40s. per ton land-carriage: by act of Parliament the duke was limited to the charge of 6s. per ton on his canal, which was a speedier and better conveyance.

Notwithstanding the great reduction in the price of coals at Manchester, and the rates of carriage to Liverpool, the noble proprietor realised, as he deserved to do, an immense revenue from his spirited undertakings; and the success which attended them gave a wonderful impulse to canal navigation. In 1766 Mr. Brindley was employed to connect the Trent and Mersey by a canal, called the Grand Trunk Canal, but he died in 1772, five years before the completion of this undertaking. He had formed the idea of joining the four great ports of London, Liverpool, Bristol, and Hull by grand canals, from which subsidiary branches might be carried to contiguous towns;—a magnificent conception, that was subsequently realised, though he did not live to see it.

The west riding of Yorkshire was early distinguished by efforts to improve internal navigation. The communication between the Mersey and Humber by the Grand Trunk Canal is circuitous and tedious; and another more northerly line of communication was formed, not less circuitous, certainly, but with the advantage of passing through the chief seats of the cotton and woollen manufacture. A canal was opened from Liverpool, by the way of Skipton, to Leeds, thence communicating at Selby, by the Air and Calder navigation, with the Humber. This gigantic work was begun in 1790: it took forty-six years to complete it, and cost 1,200,000*l.* (Statistics of the British Empire, ii, 187.) Notwithstanding its enormous cost, and the competition of other lines, it has become, contrary to what was long anticipated, remunerative to the shareholders. The most extraordinary canal undertaking in this part of the country is the Rochdale and Huddersfield canal, carried over the central ridge that separates Yorkshire from Lancashire. The summit of the canal is 656 feet above the level of the sea, being the highest elevation of any canal in the kingdom; and is carried through a rocky mountain, called Standedge, by a tunnel three miles in length. In speaking of this gigantic work at the period of its completion, the Annual Register says, "A century ago the Yorkshire hills were with difficulty passed on horseback; they are now crossed by three navigable canals, on which a million of money has been expended."

The profitable returns from the Bridgewater and other canals had the effect of generating a spirit of speculation. In the summer of 1792 there was quite a rage for these undertakings; and the shares in the Grand Trunk, the Stourbridge, Birmingham, Fazely, and other canals, rose to enormous premiums (p. 561). The consequence was that many projects were entered upon without due consideration either as to their cost or utility; they were the schemes of adventurers, who only sought to profit by the prevailing intoxication, and many became the dupes of their exaggerated representations.

The period under notice was also remarkable for the great improvements effected in the ports and harbours of the kingdom. These partly resulted from the extension of canal navigation, but more directly from the vast increase of shipping and commerce. This was peculiarly the case with the Port of London. It was only after the termination of the American war, and the loss of the transatlantic colonies, that the commerce of the river Thames began rapidly to increase. At the commencement of the 18th century, in the year 1700, exclusive of the coasting-trade, the

Imports amounted to	£4,875,538
Exports	to 5,387,787

At the middle of the century, in 1750, the

Imports were	£5,540,564
Exports	8,415,218

Total £13,955,782

So that in half a century the exports and imports together had increased only 3,692,456*l.* But in the six years from 1790 to 1796, the trade of the port of London, notwithstanding the war, increased more than triple the amount of its advance during the first fifty years of the century, as appears from the following statement:—

Imports and Exports, 1790	£22,992,095

Increase £10,289,951

In 1796 the exports and imports of all the out-ports of England amounted to 17,476,953*l.*, or about one-half the trade of the port of London. The accommodations for this vast increase in the traffic of the Thames became quite inadequate, it being prior to the erection of those magnificent works, the London and the East and West India Docks, with their vast piles of warehouses. About 13,000 vessels arrived annually in the river; their cargoes had to be landed at what were termed the legal quays, twenty in number, extending from London-bridge to the Tower; or, if these were insufficient, at the sufferance-wharfs on the opposite side of the Thames. It was only the smaller craft that could approach the quays; all the larger vessels were obliged to deliver their cargoes by the means of lighters, as colliers continue to do. The American ships, and the ships in the West India trade, employed lighters. The East India ships discharged their cargoes into decked hoys belonging to the Company. The delay in the delivery of cargoes was often very great; and in particular seasons of the year, when the Pool was crowded with shipping, the confusion was indescribable. Innumerable opportunities were afforded for pillage, fraud, and embezzlement. The revenue suffered, and individuals sustained immense losses from depredation and the exposure of their property on the wharfs; sugars and other valuable commodities often remaining for months unprotected upon the quays, six or eight heads high. In 1796 a parliamentary committee was appointed to devise remedies for these disorders, and to bet- ter accommodation for the increased trade of the river. But no legislation followed the appointment of this committee. In 1799 the subject was revived; and the present dock system was entered upon in good earnest, by passing an act for the erection of the West India Docks (39 Geo. III. c. 69). In a year or two after, (vide Jan. 1804) acts were passed for the erection of the London and East India Docks. These, with the establishment of the Thames police, effected a complete revolution and vast improvement in the navigation of the port of London.

CENSUS OF THE POPULATION.

It shows a remarkable indifference in the Legislature to economical inquiries of great public interest, that no measure was adopted for obtaining an authentic enumeration of the people till the year 1800. Prior to that time the population of England was a matter of conjecture, and very discordant opinions were entertained on the subject by public writers. It was the opinion of Dr. Price, supported by some ingenious remarks on births and burials, that there had been a gradual decline in the populousness of England since the revolution of 1688; and that at the time he wrote, about 1780, the number of people in England and Wales amounted only to 4,263,000, being 737,000 less than Gregory King's estimate of the population in 1699 (ante p. 266). This statement excited great attention, and encountered a sharp opposition from those who were sanguine in their representations of national prosperity. Arthur Young justly inferred, from the progress of improvements in agriculture, in manufactures, and in commerce, an augmentation in the number of the people. Messrs. Eden, Howlett, and Wales entered the lists against Dr. Price, to show that the public returns on which he relied for the verity of his conclusions were most erroneous, and his reasonings, besides, were illogical and inconclusive. These rejoinders had the effect of reviving the public spirit; and the friends of Dr. Price were so far impressed by them as to be reduced to a state of sceptical suspense, in which they admitted the "uncertainty of the present population." Parliament, however, still remained quiescent: either from superstitious notions of the impiety of an inquiry into the numbers of the people, or reluctance to betray the desolateness of the country to the enemy, they took no steps to solve remaining doubts, and the statistical controversy on the subject was kept up, with little intermission, to the end of the century. It might not have been then terminated by an authorised investigation, had not the severe distresses of the people in 1795-6, and more acutely in 1800, forcibly suggested the importance of ascertaining whether they were occasioned, or in what degree, by an increase in the number of consumers, or a deficiency of agricultural produce? The results of the parliamentary inquiry satisfactorily showed that the people had increased, were increasing, and, in the opinion of some, ought to be diminished, either by emigration, moral restraint, or some other of the preventive checks of Mr. Malthus.

The Population Act, introduced by Mr. Abbot in 1800, has been repeated at every decennary period down to 1831. Availing himself of the returns of births, marriages, and deaths, obtained under these acts, Mr. Finlayson has drawn up a statement of the progress of the population through the whole of the last century. From this statement, which is subjoined, it appears that population rather declined in the first ten years after 1700, and that it only increased slowly during the tranquil reigns of George I. and II. In 1760 the inhabitants of towns began rapidly to multiply, from the powerful impulse given to commercial and manufacturing industry by mechanical inventions.

UNION WITH IRELAND.

The chief epochs in the history of Ireland up to the present era were the great revolution in the landed property of the kingdom under the Protectorate of Oliver Cromwell (ante p. 247); the Treaty of Limerick in 1691, which guaranteed to the catholics the religious immunities enjoyed under Charles II.; the efforts of the Irish volunteers in 1782 to obtain from the English government a free trade; and successsive mitigations, in the course of the reign of George III., of a penal code, that not only subjected catholics to severe religious disqualifications, but interdicted to them the ordinary rights of property, inheritance, and marriage. In 1793 catholics were admitted to vote for members of parliament. It was only by a violation of the articles of Limerick that they were excluded from seats in the house of commons. During the reign of Charles II. catholics sat in parliament, and they were only excluded by a statute of William III., which required the members of both houses to take the oath of supremacy. As the Irish house of commons assumed to be independent of the English, this statute did not extend to Ireland, but it was acquiesced in, and catholics ceased to sit in parliament. The Irish house of commons, indeed, for a long period after the Restoration, was not legislative; it was a mere council placed at the arbitrary will of the executive government. It met only every two years; and the members held their seats, not by triennial or septennial election, but during the pleasure of the crown.

The close of the rebellion of 1798 offered to Mr. Pitt a favourable opportunity for terminating the separate existence of the Irish parliament. The loyal part of the population were alarmed by the evidence of foreign connexions which that disastrous experiment disclosed; and many who had engaged in the struggle, and were distracted between the fear of punishment and the hope of mercy, were glad to purchase safety by acquiescence in the minister's scheme. The catholics were seduced by delusive hopes of emancipation; and while the established church was assured of its ascendancy, protection was held out to sectarians. To lord Castlereagh, under the guidance of the viceroy, the marquis Cornwallis, was confided the operative part of procuring the concurrence of the Irish parliament. The principle upon which the chief secretary proceeded was that of preventing loss and of securing benefits to those possessed of political influence. Some, like sir Jonah Barrington, however, refused to be won, and preferred the glory of legislative independence—though it had never been productive of benefit to Ireland—to the most seductive lures of the minister.

Lord Castlereagh's first object was to introduce into the house of commons, by means of a Place Bill, a sufficient number of dependents to balance opposition. He next openly announced a scale of compensation, to all who chose to accept it, for the loss of patronage and interest. First, he proposed that to every nobleman who returned members to parliament should be paid 15,000*l.* for every member he returned. Secondly, that every member who had purchased a seat in parliament should have his purchase-money repaid to him by the Irish treasury. And, thirdly, that all other members, and those who were losers by the Union, should receive full compensation for their losses. In order to carry these objects into effect, 1,500,000*l.* was raised by taxation on the people of Ireland to buy up the interests of their representatives and of the borough proprietors.

The sums paid, as stated by sir Jonah Barrington, to the following (Historic Memoirs of Ireland, ii. 342), will elucidate the scale of compensation:—

Lord Shannon for his patronage in the Commons	245,000
The marquis of Ely	45,000
Lord Clanmorris, besides a peerage	23,000
Lord Belvidere, besides his douceur	15,000.
Sir Hercules Langrishe	15,000

By this mode of procedure the obstacles which had opposed the legislative union of England and Ireland were removed. Sir Jonah Barrington says (Historic Memoirs, ii. 376) that twenty-five members who had successfully opposed the union in 1799 voted for it in 1800, making a difference of fifty in its favour. In England there was some difference of opinion as to its policy. Mr. Fox, as before noticed, was against the union, on the ground that the influx of Irish members into the imperial parliament would be so much additional weight placed at the disposal of the crown. Lord Holland, Thanet, and King signed a protest against the union in the upper house (Ann. Reg., xlv. 201). They relied on precedent; alleging that the union with Scotland was a source of discontent and tumult; and that the Scotch peers petitioned for its dissolution six years after it was concluded.

GEORGE III. A.D. 1803 to 1816

The second period of the great revolutionary war was terminated by the decisive battle of Waterloo, and the settlement of Europe under its ancient monarchies. It is pregnant with grand military achievements. Directed by the chief of transcendent genius, France overpowered in rapid succession continental states, and aspired to the glory of universal dominion. England singly stood forth to challenge her ambitious pretensions, and, by her maritime preponderance, like Carthage of old, to limit her territorial encroachments. A second Punic war ensued, distinguished by wonderful vicissitudes, but the sequel of which, contrary to that recorded of the memorable struggle of the rival commonwealths of the Roman era, terminated in the signal triumph of the naval power.

The Treaty of Amiens was never consummated. A hollow peace was agreed to, but confidence was not inspired, and both combatants remained with lance at rest, ready to renew the conflict. France complained of the non-evacuation of Malta; England rejoined that the evacuation of the island to the knights of St. John of Jerusalem had become impracticable, in consequence of the conduct of France and Spain, in having destroyed the independence of the Order by the sequestration of its revenues. Other and more serious grounds of mistrust and irritation subsisted between the two nations. Misled by a military education, the First Consul sought the greatness of France chiefly by an extension of empire, and was incessantly occupied in projects of aggrandisement, in forming secret alliances, in fitting out expeditions hostile to England, in annexations of territory, and in sending out exploratory missions to Egypt, and even to this country*. These proceedings excited the suspicion and jealousy of England. Moreover, a powerful war-faction existed, which had from the first deprecated the peace of Amiens either as dangerous or inglorious, and seized every opportunity to aggravate the differences and, if possible, produce a rupture between the two countries. The British press was the chief instrument employed. Buonaparte's character and personal history were depicted in revolting colours, and his own unguarded demeanour afforded plausible pretexts for the exaggerations of party writers. Naturally arrogant, and elated and restless by his sudden elevation to supreme power, he betrayed a petulance and want of dignity unworthy of his high station. He personally insulted the English ambassador, questioned the right of England to meddle in continental affairs, and, in soldierly gasconade, boasted that Britain could not contend singly against France. The last, more than the infliction of any real injury, or the violation of any compact, produced a renewal of hostilities. National pride was hurt, and the prejudices of the people roused; so that the second war began, like the first, with the popular sanction.

The situation of the two countries was unfortunate: they could neither live at peace nor effectually wage war against each other. Like quarrelsome boys on the opposite sides of a brook, they could only throw stones at a distance. All, however, that could be done for mutual injury and annoyance was promptly executed. England swept the seas of the enemy, and took possession of her colonies; France seized Hanover, despite of the declaration of George III. that he was at war only as king of England, not as German elector. Contrary to international usage, but on the plea that French ships had been captured prior to a declaration of war, Buonaparte arrested all the English in France, detaining them prisoners of war. Much individual suffering was thereby occasioned, as well as from the interruption of commerce in the north of Germany. Spite and hatred could suggest nothing further in the first year of hostilities, and the belligerents were compelled to sit down, growl, gnash their teeth, and hurl reciprocal defiance. Napoleon revived the threat of an invasion, and England sought to subsidise a new coalition on the Continent. Animosities were exasperated by the conspiracy of Pichegru, Georges, and other royalists, landed from England to assassinate the First Consul; and the duke d'Enghien became the victim of the retaliatory vengeance of the French ruler. It paved the way, already not much impeded, for the assumption of the imperial dignity by Napoleon, who became, in May, 1804, emperor of the French, with power to choose his successor.

In the same month an important change took place in the British councils. Mr. Addington first sought the auxiliary aid of Mr. Pitt; but that gentleman, adhering to the rule of his outset in life, of "not accepting any subaltern situation," declined copartnership: only the premiership would satisfy his ambition, and, in the existing position of political parties, it was sufficient that he willed it. Up to the present, Mr. Pitt had given ministers his parliamentary support; but, thinking the time had arrived for regaining the helm, he joined the opposition of Mr. Fox and lord Grenville, which forced Mr. Addington to resign. Mr. Pitt's second ministry was popular in the nation, but weak in parliament. His political character suffered by the abandonment of the catholic question—to which the Grenvilles adhered—and the exclusion of Mr. Fox. He sought to strengthen himself by raising Mr. Addington to the peerage, and by his appointment to be lord-president of the council. This union was short-lived, viscount Sidmouth dissenting from the minister's scheme to screen the delinquencies of lord Melville from punishment; and soon withdrew from his administration.

Amidst these difficulties and disagreements was the disastrous continental war. The impatience of the British government had hurried Austria into hostilities before the arrival of the Russians, and without concert with Prussia, or even ascertaining whether that power intended to be neutral, friendly, or hostile in the struggle. The result was almost magical. With his maps and compasses, Buonaparte planned the destruction of the Austrian forces; and what he had warily conceived in the Tuileries he executed in the field with the celerity and force of the thunderbolt. General Mack was surrounded at Ulm, and compelled to surrender, by the armies which, a short time before, had been assembled in Holland and on the coast of Brittany, for the invasion of England. Confounded by the masterly tactics of the French emperor, Vienna was abandoned to the conqueror, which he entered; and, before the conclusion of 1805, closed the campaign and the war, by the victory of Austerlitz and the Treaty of Presburg. The signal defeat at Trafalgar was the only reverse sustained by the French arms in this year of splendid successes; and this victory England dearly won by the loss of the most generous and brave of her naval warriors.

* The death of Mr. Pitt formed the opening occurrence of 1806. It was sought to replace him by one of his colleagues, the earl of Liverpool, but his lordship declined the premiership; justly concluding that the slender materials left by his late superior were of too little weight, either in parliament or in the country, more especially as they were disunited amongst themselves, to form a stable administration. Recourse was in consequence had to the political combination denominated the "Old and New Opposition," headed respectively by Mr. Fox and lord Grenville, whose influence and principles are described in the Events and Occurrences. Though the GRENVILLE MINISTRY was a combined firm, established by the union of three sections of politicians (vide Feb. 5, 1806), and supported by the confidence of the aristocracy and middle ranks, still it was from the first weak, in not having the favour of the court and the populace, and in being actively opposed, through the agency of corporations and the Press, by monopolists and displaced officials. Moreover, it trusted too much to high principles, that conciliated only the minority of the enlightened, while it committed itself irredeemably with the multitude by acts savouring of pecuniary greediness or constitutional violations. The effect was manifest in the cold reception given to its supporters in the general election that followed the death of Mr. Fox, in the autumn. The adverse position of affairs on the Continent augmented its embarrassments. Buonaparte was pursuing a career of unchecked aggrandisement, by establishing the Confederation of the Rhine, changing the republic of the Seven Islands into a monarchy for his brother Louis, and placing his brother Joseph on the throne of Naples. We were embroiled with Prussia, who had seized Hanover; and began hostilities with the Turks, in which we were worsted, to compel the Porte to make peace with our ally, the emperor Alexander, who had been the aggressor in the war. In the height of these entanglements was fought the great battle of Jena, which at one blow laid another kingdom at the feet of the conqueror. The humiliation of the court of Berlin was beheld without commiseration. Despised and insulted by the French, at war with England, hated by Austria for her wavering and selfish policy, Prussia had been left singly to contend against her giant opponent, supported chiefly by some reminiscences of military glory derived from the Great Frederick. Before the close of the campaign the French eagles had penetrated beyond the Oder, where the affair of Pultusk with the Russians showed that they had still enemies to combat not unworthy of their daring.

Mr. Fox died in September, leaving a chasm among his colleagues that could not be filled up by any of equal weight and popularity. Like his rival, he expired amidst continental reverses; the æquiem of Pitt being the victory of Austerlitz—that of Fox, the overthrow of Jena. In eight months the leading political parties had lost their chiefs under whom they had pertinaciously combated for twenty years. They had been divided, however, rather by views of interest or hereditary predilections than conflicting principles. Ambition linked Mr. Pitt to the court; aristocratic sympathies and companionship, Mr. Fox to the whig families. Both were men of the constitution as settled in 1688, with this difference, that, contrary to the common impression, Mr. Pitt was less apprehensive than his opponent of the ascendancy of the democratic branch of the government. In their notions of external policy there was no divergence. The maintenance of a balance of power in Europe, by continental alliances, was the common pivot; and Mr. Fox trod closely in the steps of his predecessor in 1806, when he made war on Prussia and Turkey, and refused to treat with France for peace unless in concert with our Russian ally. Parties founded on principles may be hereditary, but factions usually expire with the interests that have banded them together. This would have been the consummation of the Fox and Pitt combinations, but that the interests which divided the leaders descended, with their animosities, to their followers, keeping them long after hostilely confederated.

The Grenville ministry did not long survive the loss of the foreign secretary. They had not been more successful in their negotiations for peace than their predecessors, and the events of the war were unfavourable. A difference with the king on the removal of religious tests, that kept a large portion of his subjects in a state of civil disqualification, was the proximate cause of their downfall. It was not, however, for the maintenance of a principle that they were dismissed—that they conceded to the monarch's scruples; but for the profitless ostentation of recording one in the cabinet proceedings. Intriguers, availing themselves of this punctilio, slipped in: a wretched cry of the "Church in Danger" was got up; the sense of the people was taken by a general election, at the height of the popular delirium; and the result was, the firm establishment of the PORTLAND MINISTRY, of which Mr. Percival was the leading member.

This was in the spring of 1807. Meanwhile Napoleon was waging against the Russians a bloody war in Poland, which was terminated, after the sanguinary conflicts of Eylau and Friedland by the peace of Tilsit. The romantic king of Sweden was our only remaining ally. Despairing of mastering us by the sword, the French emperor resolved to dry up our pecuniary resources, which, he affirmed, had been the bribe and pabulum of all the coalitions that had been formed against him. Dictator of continental Europe, he sought to exclude British commerce in every port and place to which his power or influence extended. He began with his Berlin decree, issued in November, 1806: it was followed by others in the present year, dated at Milan. Orders in Council were promulgated by the English in retaliation, and the effect of both was the destruction of neutral commerce. The war had assumed such a character of bitterness, that the rights of nations were not respected by either belligerent, nor even by powers at peace. Russia unjustly wrested Finland from Sweden. England began her infractions of international law by a piratical attack on four Spanish ships of war in 1804, and crowned her turpitude in 1809, by the bombardment of Copenhagen and the seizure of the Danish fleet. Justice was outraged on all sides; the peaceful pursuits of commerce everywhere interrupted; and the enjoyments that result from the reciprocal intercourse of nations abridged, merely because of the rancorous hatred of two governments; for the war had become entirely objectless; neither party had power to injure the other: England was indisputable master at sea, and France on land.

About the year 1808 imperial France reached her meridian greatness. In that year the sway of the French emperor was more absolute in power, and more extended and indisputable in territory, than at any subsequent period. His empire was surrounded by a cordon of vassal kings of his own creation, or by federative unions of which he was the Mediator or Protector. Prussia existed only as a matter of grace and favour; Austria, three times conquered, was fearful to incur his displeasure; while Russia was bound by her late treaty to co-operate with him in his plans for the humiliation of England. About forty-five millions of French, Italian, Flemish, and Dutch subjects were directly obedient to his will, and thirty-eight millions more were influenced by his authority. With all this vast power at his command, Buonaparte could never succeed in fully establishing his CONTINENTAL SYSTEM. It was only his immense influence, his prodigious energy, and a resolution steeled against remonstrance or disappointment, that could possibly have seduced him into the undertaking. It was the will of one man opposed to the interest of every nation, of every individual. British commerce had everywhere its ramifications and interested supporters. A smuggler's cove, an obscure creek, or a dark night, was sufficient to baffle his most savage ordinances, and did baffle them. Heligoland became the great depôt of English manufactures, and they always found their way into the Continent despite of Napoleon's midnight searches, and burnings at Antwerp and Hamburg.

The anti-commercial war of the French ruler was the beginning of the end of his domination. It led to the introduction of French troops into the Peninsula, first under the pretext of excluding British commerce from Portugal, and next of "infusing youth into the decrepid Spanish monarchy." In 1808 the celebrated intrigues at Bayonne commenced. Charles IV. resigned the crown of Spain to prince Ferdinand, who was jealous of the Prince of Peace, an instrument of France, and the favourite of the queen and her imbecile husband. Buonaparte, who fomented the dissensions of the royal family, procured himself to be appointed umpire of their differences; but, in lieu of awarding the crown to father or son, he placed it on the head of a member of his own family. Europe was an attentive spectator of these extraordinary scenes; on one side was seen folly and weakness almost incredible; on the other, ambition, subtlety, and a contempt for the opinion of mankind, that excited universal indignation. The Spaniards, enraged at the treatment of their princes and the perfidy of their betrayer, flew to arms. A bloody insurrection at Madrid showed that, however debased they were, they were still capable of resistance when trampled upon. England, ever watchful to deal a blow to her implacable foe, exultingly beheld the gathering storm, aided its rising, in which she was zealously seconded by the privileged classes of Spain, especially the priesthood, who foresaw in the ascendancy of the French the degradation of their worship and the loss of their revenues. Before the close of the year, the supreme Spanish Junta was established, and unlooked-for successes attended the patriot cause. A large French force under general Dupont was surrounded at Baylen; the French fleet mastered at Cadiz; and the Spanish troops in Denmark declared in favour of their oppressed countrymen.

The year 1809 was remarkable for events, but not important results. In England public attention was engrossed by a parliamentary inquiry into the conduct of the duke of York in his office of commander-in-chief. The retreat of sir John Moore, and the battles of Corunna and Talavera, were the stirring occurrences of the Peninsula. Austria, availing herself of the diversion of the Spanish insurrection, determined once more to try the fortune of war. The struggle was brief, but sharp and decisive; terminating, after the sanguinary actions of Aspern and Wagram on the Danube, in favour of the French, who a second time entered Vienna in triumph. A peace followed, in which the Tyrolese, who had risen in favour of the Austrians, were unceremoniously abandoned to their Bavarian rulers. The efforts of the emperor Francis were sought to be aided by a powerful armament despatched to the Scheldt from England. This was the memorable WALCHEREN EXPEDITION, which, as it was the largest, so it was the most disastrous of all the British enterprises, and the blame of the failure of which is shared between the ministers and the officers they selected for the direction of the undertaking. Great public dissatisfaction was expressed at the ill success of this and other measures of government, which was heightened by the discovery that intrigues and dissensions had existed in the cabinet, terminating first in the resignation, then a duel between Mr. Canning and lord Castlereagh. The duke of Portland dying soon after, an overture was made to the whigs, to co-operate in forming a combined administration, which, being declined by that party, Mr. Percival became prime minister by uniting to his former office of chancellor of the exchequer that of first lord of the treasury. A national jubilee, to celebrate the fiftieth year of the king's reign, concluded the annual occurrences.

Parliamentary transactions hold a prominent place in the events of 1810; of which the expedition to Walcheren, contests respecting the privileges of the house of commons, the depreciation of the currency, and commercial distresses, took the lead in public interest. A THIRD PARTY had been gradually acquiring importance in the State, which disclaimed all connexion with aristocratic interests and associations*. Its chief seat, and even birth-place, was the city of Westminster; and grew out of the mal-administration of public affairs, the divisions and selfishness of the factions, the corruptions in the public offices, the inequalities and inefficiency of the national representation, the sale of seats, and the public defence of that sale in the lower house of parliament. Differing from the reform societies established about the close of the American war in 1780, it wholly eschewed co-operation with any section of the aristocracy, considering the entire generation of existing public men, whether Ins or Outs, as formed only to mislead and betray, and wholly undeserving the confidence of the people. It had another point of distinction, which separated it from the republican societies formed at the beginning of the French revolution. Enlightened by that great social experiment, and disgusted by the usurpations of the French ruler, the popular party sought to realise no visionary dreams of liberty and equality. Its scope of reform was limited to the pale of the constitution, and consisted in the establishment of a government responsible to the nation, through the medium of virtual representatives in parliament, not the nominees of the Treasury, of borough proprietors, and decayed corporations.

In the course of the session this party took an active part in a contest with the house of commons. The dispute itself was ridiculous in its origin, and consisted in a manifest perversion of a clause in the Bill of Rights. However, it excited great heat and a violent ferment in the metropolis. The house claimed the right forcibly to arrest and imprison an individual, not a member of parliament, for an infringement of its privileges. This was denied by one of its own members, who was himself arrested and imprisoned in the Tower. A riot ensued, and some lives were lost, of which the details will be found in the Occurrences of the year.

Transactions abroad were not deeply interesting. The conduct of the war in the Peninsula Buonaparte abandoned to his generals. Marshal Massena overran Portugal; but his progress was arrested at Torres Vedras by sir Arthur Wellesley, who, in the conduct of the Portuguese campaign, displayed that rare union of skill and cautious enterprise that had made him famous in India and afterwards in Europe. With the view of raising up a successor to the "empire of Charlemagne," which Napoleon boasted he had, under the "favour of Divine Providence," re-established, he separated from the empress Josephine, and married an Austrian archduchess. One of his marshals was elected crown-prince of Sweden, and now fills the throne of that kingdom. The province of Venezuela declared itself independent of the mother-country: the example was followed by other trans-Atlantic states, and was the commencement of a series of sanguinary revolutions in Spanish America.

The year 1811 was memorable for the commencement of the Regency of the prince of Wales, at first with restrictions on the executive power; but after the expiration of a year, in full sovereignty. It terminated the responsible government of George III., who never recovered from his mental incapacity, to the exercise of the regal functions. No change followed in the policy of the government or in its established administration. In the course of the parliamentary session there were protracted discussions on the state of the currency, and on the commercial difficulties resulting from the Orders of Council, which, with the conflicting Berlin and Milan decrees, interrupted trade with America and other neutral states. The monetary difficulties of the country were very great, foreign exchanges were unusually depressed, two prices were apparently on the eve of being established, and several landlords in England and Ireland demanded payment of their rents in gold, or in paper of equivalent value. A parliamentary report of the past year had ascribed the depreciation of paper money to the redundant issues of the Bank of England; and suggested that, after a time to be fixed, the Bank should be compelled to resume payments in specie. Ministers had sufficient influence to procure a vote of the house of commons negating the conclusion of the Bullion Committee; and the futile expedient was resorted to of passing an act to interdict the sale of guineas, for money or bank-notes, for less than their current denomination. Internal difficulties were augmented by the disturbed state of the manufacturing districts, arising out of the stagnation of industry, and the substitution of machinery for manual labour. The exasperation between the employers and employed rose to such a height, that assassinations were not unfrequent; and armed men, called Luddites, instigated by secret associations, went about in the night perpetrating daring outrages. These afflictive disorders continued through the spring and summer of the following year, and were not suppressed till after a severe example had been made of the ringleaders.

In the foreign transactions of the year there was nothing of remarkable interest. The birth of a son seemed to crown the utmost wishes of Napoleon Buonaparte, and afford an earnest of a long line of successors to the imperial dynasty. The war in the Peninsula he affected to treat with indifference, and represented the protraction of hostilities as a politic means of enfeebling the British power. In an address to the Legislative Body, June 16, he said, "When England shall be exhausted—when she shall at last have felt the evils which for twenty years she has with so much cruelty poured upon the Continent—when half her families shall be in mourning—then shall a peal of thunder put an end to the affairs of the Peninsula*." Dis aliter visum!—it was otherwise decreed.

Upon the termination of the limitations on the Prince Regent, in 1812, an entire change of administration was expected, and that the prince would call to his councils those with whom he had through life been personally and politically connected. These expectations were entirely frustrated. In a letter to the duke of York the prince expressed himself satisfied with his present advisers, and further, that he "had no predilections to indulge, or resentments to gratify." Notwithstanding this ominous intimation, a correspondence was entered into with the Opposition, more, as it would seem, in satisfaction of an old obligation, than from choice, and the issue of which is stated in the Occurrences.

The whigs declining, as their principles bound them to do, a copartnership with Mr. Percival, that gentleman was continued at the head of the ministry; but shortly after he fell a victim to a revengeful assassin, who with more passion than reason had assumed the adjudication of his own supposed wrongs. Another and more favourable opening was thereby left for them, but with no better result; and in consequence of the failure of which the protracted administration of lord Liverpool was established in power. In this latter negotiation lords Grey and Grenville appear to have claimed concessions from the sovereign, which, if not unimportant, were hardly warranted by their political position and the times. George III. had effectually shaken off the domination of the aristocracy, which could no longer, as in the reigns of his predecessors, dictate to the crown the choice of its servants. Moreover, a third party, as before noticed, had arisen, which had severed from the great families the auxiliary aid of the populace. Up to the present reign the Ourts were always supported by the people; because, whether whigs or tories, while out, they generally professed popular sentiments, and in virtue of which the people mostly used to restore them to power, after a due course of trial and contrition. Now, however, the people were indifferent from which section of the aristocracy the sovereign selected his advisers—whether they were lords or commoners, or supple lawyers. The last, as most subservient to the court, were generally preferred in the time of George III. By the schism between the aristocracy and their former supporters the crown became independent of either, and had only to secure a parliamentary majority, which it was not difficult to command, with its vast increase of patronage, during the American and French wars.

Turning to the foreign transactions of 1812, the most important was the grand expedition of the French into Russia, upon the issue of which the attention of all Europe was fixed. In this campaign the French emperor appeared determined to dazzle by the splendour no less than the magnitude of his preparations. He left Paris in May, to join the armies. His progress was an intoxicating triumph; the inhabitants of the countries through which he passed, crowding his line of route, gazed upon him as a preternatural being. At Dresden, he had convened an assemblage of sovereigns, many of them of his own creation. Seated in the palace of one of the capitals of Germany, surrounded by a gorgeous court, with his young imperial spouse at his side, he seemed more like a monarch receiving his vassals, than a soldier of fortune raised to an equality with kings. The adulation was excessive and universal. Meanwhile, his vast forces were directing their march from ~~the~~ points towards Poland. Austria, Prussia, Italy, the German confederation, all contributed their quotas towards this great enterprise. A human force of greater moral and physical power was perhaps never concentrated. Nothing had been apparently left to chance, yet everything was unforeseen. The gathering of a grand army—a march—a great battle—a victory—an armistice—and the submission of Alexander to his arbitrary fiat, were the anticipations of Napoleon. All turned out the contrary. The enemy fled before him like the horizon; and his mighty host was worn down by continual marches and obstinate battles: then followed the burning of Moscow and the frightful retreat through regions of frost and snow. With the resources of civilization in warfare Buonaparte proved himself more conversant than with those of despotism, aided by illimitable wastes, that afforded neither shelter nor sustenance to invaders.

After various attempts at an amicable settlement, England, in the course of 1812, became involved in war with the United States of America. Differences had first arisen relative to the Orders in Council, but these were revoked contemporaneously with the declaration of war by Congress. The remaining points of dispute referred to the right of search, claimed by England, not only for goods but British seamen on board neutral vessels. As the sovereignty of the seas depended on upholding these maritime rights, the British government was as strenuous in their enforcement as the French emperor of his continental system. A spirited land and naval war was the result, which was carried on, with various alternations of success and defeat, both at sea and in Canada.

The year 1813 was one of great events, signalised by the liberation of Germany from French rule. France never recovered her continental ascendancy, nor hardly an equality of power, with her antagonists, after the overwhelming disasters of the Russian expedition. The campaign of Saxony was opened with a numerous army, consisting chiefly of young conscripts, who fought bravely, and even won the battles of Lutzen and Bautzen, but unattended with any decisive issue. Russia and Prussia alone seemed almost a match for the French emperor. In addition to these, the crown-prince of Sweden was preparing to enter the lists against his old master; and fear, or immature preparations, alone kept back Buonaparte's father-in-law. As a preliminary to taking a part in the war, Austria offered her mediation, and an armistice was agreed to. It lasted upwards of two months, and terminated without an amicable arrangement. Proud and inflexible, Napoleon refused to give up Italy and Belgium, and retire within the boundaries of the Rhine. Hostilities recommenced, Austria joining the allies, who had now a vast numerical superiority; and, after some severe fighting, they succeeded in dislodging Napoleon from Dresden, who concentrated his forces in the neighbourhood of Leipzig. Here the great battle was fought, in October, which decided the fate of the French empire. The defeats of Buonaparte, like his victories, were on a grand scale. In the Russian campaign he had lost nearly half a million of men. Out of 280,000 he had led into Saxony, he returned to the Rhine with only about 70,000. Other disasters entered into this year's account. The duke of Wellington hung upon the French frontier, having by his victories driven them out of the whole of the Peninsula, with the exception of Catalonia. At Amsterdam and the Hague the old rallying cry of "Orange-Boven" was raised, and the liberation of Holland was secured by the arrival of a Russian and English force. In Italy the pope was restored, his holiness being conducted back to Rome in great pomp, amidst the joyful acclamations of the people. About the same time Ferdinand VII. was liberated from his confinement at Valençay, and permitted to return to Spain. All things seemed fast returning to their ancient course. Thrones and altars that had been subverted emerged from the revolutionary chaos, and were compared to the gradual reappearance of mountain or promontory after the Deluge.

The Dagon of France was struck down as by a miracle; and, exhausted by their immense losses, the French were anxious for peace. The flower of the population had been destroyed in the wars, and there was hardly a family that had not to mourn the loss of one or more of its members. In two years the tide of victory had rolled back its reflux course from the ruins of Moscow almost to the walls of Paris. The author of these great calamities, on reaching his capital, heard sounds to which his ears had been unaccustomed. There was not only a talk of peace, but of guarantees against the abuses of power. Buonaparte bore himself loftily, declaring that he alone was "the representative of the people," that he "was the state," and dissolved the Legislative Body. This arbitrary demeanour neutralised the zeal of all parties. It was the despotism of one man, and the thrones of his relatives, that were in jeopardy, and the nation would not rise to defend them. Habits of uncontrolled authority had gained so much upon Napoleon, that he was incapable of listening to any advice which was not in accordance with his own plans. He seemed stunned by the suddenness of his reverses, perplexed amidst the multiplicity of objects demanding his attention; and, though he planned much and talked much, nothing was practically done; and when the allies entered France, they found his means of defence no further advanced than when he crossed the Rhine on his retreat.

The almost expiring struggle of France began in January, 1814. From having been accustomed to send out her conquering legions to dictate laws to her neighbours in their capitals, she now saw her frontier passed by powerful armies, from those very states which she had compelled to purchase peace by submitting to her rule or co-operating in her plans. Of all the nations now leagued against her, there were none, England excepted, which had not acted in alliance with her. "A year ago," as Napoleon emphatically told the senate, "all Europe was marching with us; now all Europe is marching against us." The campaign opened with little chance of successful resistance. Buonaparte left behind him 80,000 troops in Dresden, Hamburg, and other German cities; which, had they been withdrawn in time, would have almost doubled the number of his veterans. As it was, he was compelled to meet the allies with not more than 100,000 men, while the armies of Russians, Austrians, and Prussians, that had already penetrated into France, amounted to 250,000. In reserve was the crown-prince of Sweden at Cologne, and vast reinforcements on their way, along the high roads leading from Warsaw, Berlin, and Vienna. After joining the army, Buonaparte displayed his wonted activity and military science; but the superiority of his opponents reduced him to the necessity of carrying on a partisan warfare. By the celerity of his movements and the vivacity of his attacks, he at first repulsed and disunited the allied armies; but at other points they were successful; and, trusting to their vast masses, they soon reunited, and resumed the offensive. While the fighting was going on, negotiations were in progress at Chatillon, and terms were offered to the French emperor which he ought promptly to have accepted; but, elated by a temporary advantage at Troyes, he rejected them, and, after a suspicious procrastination, proposed others that were inadmissible. Unable to oppose the invaders in front, he boldly dashed into their rear, hoping to draw the enemy from the capital by alarming the Austrians for their communications with the Rhine. A manœuvre which had often won Napoleon victories, entirely failed under different circumstances. Leaving him to pursue his speculative movement behind them, the allies continued their march to Paris, which they entered by capitulation, March 31st. Important events speedily followed. Buonaparte was declared to have forfeited the throne by a decree of the French senate; and the allied sovereigns issued a declaration, stating that they would no longer treat with him nor any of his family, but that they would "recognise and guarantee the constitution which France should adopt."

Upon the 30th of May the important Treaty of Paris was concluded, and exhibited an illustrious example of moderation and wisdom on the part of the conquerors. Nothing was taken from France that she ought to possess, except the man whose vaulting ambition had plunged her into her present humiliating abyss. There was no attempt at conquest, dismemberment; or dictatorial interference with the internal affairs of the French people. The Bourbons, as a matter of course, and the shortest way to a speedy settlement, were restored. Austria, Prussia, and Holland were the chief gainers; these states were re-established in their former greatness; but England and Russia, whose persevering and united exertions had mainly contributed to the successful issue, reaped no advantage, save the glory of the deliverance of Europe from military domination. Even Napoleon himself was magnanimously treated. In a less civilised era he would have been put to death, made a public spectacle of, or imprisoned: he was neither; he was suffered to retain his title of Emperor; to select the place of his retirement, which was given to him in full sovereignty; and a princely revenue, payable by France, was settled upon him and the members of his family.

Immediately peace was concluded the allied troops evacuated France. The germ of new troubles, however, soon appeared. In the twenty years of their exile the Bourbon princes seem to have slept; "they had learnt nothing and forgot nothing." The French people were changed; but they were unchangeable, and, with incredible weakness, they set about restoring superstitions that had become ridiculous, and forms of government that were detestable. All that had been done in their absence they affected to condemn, or consider the work of violence, usurpation, and injustice. Louis XVIII. claimed to be absolute by right of birth, and tendered to the French, as so many manumitted slaves, a Constitutional Charter, as his own free and voluntary offering. The clergy renewed their exactions and their mummeries; actresses were refused the rites of Christian burial; the processions and festivals of the church revived, and an outward sanctity sought to be established inimical to the healthy pastimes and recreations of the people. Intimations were thrown out about a restitution of emigrant property, and excommunication threatened against the purchasers of church lands and national domains, by which the titles of eight or ten millions of landed proprietors were placed in incertitude, and jeopardy. It was, however, in the military class that sentiments existed most dangerous to the restored government; and the number of which order, since the peace, had been greatly augmented by the return of prisoners from England, the Italian army, and the garrisons of Germany. Almost without exception, the French soldiery retained a chivalrous veneration for the chief who had so often led them to victory, and under whose banner, notwithstanding recent disasters, they still hoped to retrieve their own honour and that of their country.

In this state of things Buonaparte landed in France, March 1st, 1815. A less able and determined adventurer would have failed at the threshold of the enterprise in which he had boldly embarked, without concert with any party in France, trusting entirely to the popular sentiment in his favour. He was not sought for by the great political leaders nor the middle ranks of the French people. They were dissatisfied with the Bourbons; but they had been not less so with the imperial government—its destructive wars and violations of the constitution by the extinction of the freedom of the press—of trial by jury—arbitrary imprisonments—compulsory exile—and other despotic acts. Even the French marshals—Ney, Massena, Soult, St. Cyr, Macdonald, and Victor, stood aloof from Napoleon, till carried away by the enthusiasm of the men they commanded. It was the soldiery and the multitude, as Buonaparte himself acknowledged, that brought him back to the Tuileries. "I am not alone (as has been pretended) the emperor of the soldiers; I am that of the peasants, of the plebeians of France*." The young and enthusiastic colonel Labedoyere was the first to lead the way in the path of defection; marshal Ney, the "bravest of the brave," deserted by his troops, was the next to follow his example, and proclaim the "cause of the Bourbons for ever lost." After these accessions of strength, the only difficulty to surmount was the distance from Lyons to Paris:—"the tri-coloured flag flew from steeple to steeple, till it reached the towers of Notre Dame"—and the Emperor alighted at the Tuileries, three weeks after landing at Cannes, like a man dropped from the clouds, without the firing of a musket.

At this juncture, the allied congress, being assembled at Vienna, was busily occupied in completing the settlement of Europe. The sudden advent of Napoleon threw ridicule over their proceedings; and, like men interrupted over a joyous feast, they sullenly laid aside the compasses and maps on which they had been marking out the territorial allotments of the great European family. Not a moment's hesitation, however, was felt about the course to be pursued. Buonaparte at Paris, supported by the French army, endangered the quiet and safety of all crowned heads. His fraternal circular, in which he informed the allied sovereigns that France could not be happy without him, was unanswered—by some returned unopened. He was declared an outlaw; and Russia, England, Austria, and Prussia, entered into a solemn compact to raise 150,000 men each, and never lay down their arms till the integrity of the treaty of Paris had been re-established, the intruder ejected, and placed in a condition never again to disturb the repose of the world.

Upon the necessity of expelling Napoleon the unanimity was extraordinary. In England, there was hardly any diversity of opinion, and the measures of ministers for the purpose were supported by vast majorities in both houses of parliament, and almost the unanimous voice of the nation*. There were, however, a few individuals in each house, distinguished for talent and integrity, who were opposed to a renewal of the war, and the debate on the message of the Prince Regent of May 22nd was signalled by the opposition of sentiment on this point between lords Grey and Grenville, who had for ten years been politically united. The Grenvilles were as decidedly belligerent as in 1793, when they affirmed "that no nation ought to remain neutral †;" and with this party were included Mr. Grattan and Mr. Plunkett, the two leading members of the Irish representation.

The struggle was fortunately brief, though ardent. It lay between the French army and the European nations, and was terminated by the memorable battle of Waterloo, justly termed "glorious," because bravely and skilfully won, and securing victory's noblest trophy in a lasting peace.

Here we may pause: in the language of Montesquieu, "let us reflect upon so many wars undertaken, so much blood shed, so many people destroyed, so many great actions, so many triumphs, such political combinations, such consistency, such courage: what has been the issue of it all?" Europe might as well have remained quiet in 1790, continued to advance, as she was then doing, by peaceable arts in the career of improvement, and escaped the tempest of strife, carnage, and desolation of the intervening period. The resting point of France was determined by the Constituent Assembly of 1789: at that point she has now settled, and to which she has been always tending, like a body propelled from the centre, amidst the anarchy of her revolution, and the barbaric illusions of the empire. Her errors are lessons of wisdom, which exhaust political science. Power could not have been wielded by a more able chieftain than Napoleon; yet it intoxicated and destroyed him. Democracy could not have had more generous and virtuous advocates than Brissot, Vergniaud, Roland, Condorcet, Bailly, and Lavoisier.

sier, yet it brought forth Demons, nurtured by popular ignorance, who destroyed them. The conclusion is, that man is neither an angel of light, nor a spirit of darkness; he can neither be governed by abstract philosophy, nor a rod of iron, but demands a middle regimen, adapted to his middle nature in the chain of creation.

EVENTS AND OCCURRENCES.

A.D. 1803. RENEWAL OF THE WAR.—Under very different aspects did the present year, compared with that which preceded it, commence. In January, 1802, the funds were high; a long peace proportioned to the ardour with which it had been desired was anticipated; and France, thrown open, became an eager object of curiosity, pleasure, and commercial enterprise. In January, 1803, there were strong forebodings of war; the stocks began rapidly to fall in price, and no commercial treaty had been concluded with France. Before the summer England grappled singly with her gigantic foe. The chess-board was instantly cleared; each combatant seemed eager to strike the first blow. England took the colonies and ships, and swept the seas of the enemy; France made prize of the electorate of Hanover, arrested all the English in her dominions, and shut her ports, and those of Belgium and Italy, against British commerce. Domestic events were rendered interesting by the continuance of the Bank Restriction Act, by executions for high treason in England, the suppression of a wild insurrection in Ireland, and the renewal of the volunteer associations to resist a menaced invasion.

Jan. 12. The Hindostan East India-man wrecked off the Reculvers, eighteen persons drowned; the cargo valued at 100,000*l*.

19. Cow-pox INSTITUTION.—A meeting was held at the London Tavern, to consider the best means to be adopted for exterminating the small-pox, when it was resolved to establish a society, to be called "The Royal Jennerian Institution," and a committee of fifty-three gentlemen was appointed to carry the intention of the meeting into effect. It was stated that the present annual deaths in the metropolis from the small-pox were 3000, and in the whole empire 40,000; that the cooling practice of Sydenham, invented 150 years ago, had tended to lessen the devastation; but that the small-pox inoculation, though it had rendered the disease milder, had increased the mortality by spreading the contagion. Drs. Letom, Hawes, and Denman, the duke of Bedford, and Messrs.

Wilberforce, Travers, Abernethy, &c., took a leading part in the proceedings.

Feb. 1. The French government definitively organised the protestant churches at Paris; a consistory of twelve members was appointed, and three national edifices granted for the celebration of protestant worship.

7. A bill brought in for the continuance of the Bank Restriction Act. The chancellor of the exchequer stated that, as twenty millions of specie had lately been drawn from the country for grain, the removal of the restriction might have the effect of throwing all the remaining bullion out of the country. It became law, and long continued such, lord King only objecting to the principle.

TRIAL OF COLONEL DESPARD.—On the 7th colonel Despard, and on the 9th twelve of his associates, were tried at the sessions, Horsemonger-lane, before a special commission, of which lord chief justice Ellenborough was the principal, on an indictment for high treason. The wild nature of this plot, concocted at an obscure public-house, and the inadequacy of its means, have already been noticed. (p. 632.) Despard was a man of a respectable family, whose mind had become affected from government having delayed to liquidate some alleged claim for his professional services. Upon the trial lord Nelson and Sir Alured Clarke bore testimony to his military deserts, while serving under them. After a trial which lasted eighteen hours the colonel was found guilty, and clearly proved to have been privy to designs for shooting the king, and taking possession of the Bank, the public offices, the prisons, and the two houses of parliament. On the 21st this unfortunate man, with six fellow-conspirators, was executed on the top of the new goal in Southwark. The colonel declined spiritual assistance, and conducted himself with great firmness. From the scaffold he addressed the spectators in an audible voice, expressing his conviction of the "final triumph of the principles of liberty and justice over despotism and delusion." The populace cheered, but it was only a momentary impulse; the platform fell, and the whole were launched into eternity. After hanging half an hour they were cut down, and the ceremony of decapitation performed. There were some hooting and hissing when the colonel's head was held up. He was interred in the cemetery belonging to the parish of St. Fiacre, on the south side of St. Paul's cathedral.

12. A great mortality at Paris, in consequence of catarrhal fever (influenza); the interments officially reported to amount to 400 per day. It was ascribed by medical men to sudden changes in the temperature of the atmosphere.

16. A royal message delivered to the House of Commons on the pecuniary embarrassment of the prince of Wales; it terminated in granting 60,000*l.* a-year to the prince for three years and a half.

21. Jean Peltier, a French journalist and advocate of the Bourbons, tried before lord Ellenborough, at the suit of the crown, for a libel on Buonaparte. He was found guilty, though eloquently defended by Mr. James Mackintosh.

26. A proposal made at the instance of Buonaparte, at Warsaw, to the Bourbon princes; to relinquish their claims to the throne of France, but they all refused.

Mar. 1. Military college of High Wycomb projected.

The Caledonian canal begun.

8. A royal message delivered to parliament, which was considered as the prelude to war. It informed the houses of considerable preparations being in a state of progress in the ports of France and Holland, and that his majesty had deemed it expedient in consequence to adopt additional measures of precaution. An address was voted, and an addition of 10,000 seamen.

Died in his 77th year, unmarried, Francis the third duke of Bridgewater. He was immensely rich; his return to the income-tax was 110,000*l.* a-year, the greater part acquired in pursuits not more profitable to himself than his country. His canal property, yielding at his death from 50,000*l.* to 80,000*l.* (Ann. Reg. xlv. 500) a-year, he left to earl Gower.

13. An extraordinary scene at the Tuilleries between the first consul and lord Whitworth, the English ambassador. Buonaparte, in the presence of a numerous court, and in vehement terms, accused England of not fulfilling the treaty of Amiens, in the non-evacuation of Malta. War he threatened as the only alternative of continued refusal.

21. Being the anniversary of the battle of Alexandria, a piece of Turkish ordnance taken by the French, but re-taken by the English, was placed on an elegant carriage in St. James's Park.

April 6. Duel at Ousik-farm between captain Macnamara, of the navy, and colonel Montgomery, a much esteemed man of fashion; the latter was killed, and the former wounded: it arose about the quarreling of their dogs.

MINISTERIAL NEGOTIATIONS.—An opinion had been gaining ground that good intentions and mediocrity, rather than pre-eminence in talents, were the qualifications most desirable in the ministers of a great country. This was the strength of the Addington ministry, none of whose members were remarkable for shining abilities, nor derived peculiar advantages from birth, title, or territorial possessions. It was that would now be termed a middle-class government, from which the great hereditary leaders of parties stood aloof, and by whom it was tolerated, rather from the difficulty of agreeing among themselves, than confided in or supported. Unconnected with the ministers were three descriptions of public men, headed by Mr. Fox, lord Grenville, and Mr. Pitt, by the union, of whom the administration could at any moment be overthrown. Mr. Pitt's section was the most powerful and least hostile, and it was with them the minister sought to strengthen himself, by opening in the course of April a negotiation. It was soon however discovered that an insuperable obstacle or misunderstanding existed. The minister sought Mr. Pitt as an auxiliary, but Mr. Pitt sought the dissolution of the ministry, and that upon him should devolve the sole authority of forming another. Upon this discovery the negotiation of course terminated, and the only accession of strength Mr. Addington secured was in the incorporation of Mr. Tierney (made treasurer of the navy) and Mr. Hobhouse, who, to the surprise of their former friends, and very much to the mortification of the Pittites, joined the ministerial ranks. In the upper house Mr. Addington was weaker than in the lower; here his chief strength was in the lord chancellor and chief justice Ellenborough, till they were reinforced by the elevation of lord Hawkesbury to the peerage. Among other ministerial changes in the summer was the appointment of Charles Yorke to be secretary of state in the room of lord Pelham, who succeeded the late earl of Liverpool in the chancellorship of the duchy of Lancaster.

May 5. An extraordinary forgery was practised in the city—a note, purporting to be from lord Hawkesbury, addressed to the lord mayor, acquainting him that the differences between this country and France were amicably adjusted: in consequence of this communication the stocks rose from 63 to 71. The stock exchange commission declared the language of that day void.

11. The first consul drawing a phœton with four horses in hand was thrown from his seat in the park near St. Cloud. The shock was severe, but no serious injury was sustained. When he recovered he said "it was best for people to confine themselves to their own occupations."

12. Lord Whitworth left Paris: he landed at Dover on the 20th, where he met general Andreossi, minister to the court of London, about to embark for France.

17. An Order in Council appeared in the Gazette, dated the 16th (the morning of the French ambassador's departure), directing that general reprisals be granted against the ships, goods and subjects of the French republic. Also a proclamation directing an embargo to be laid on all ships in our ports belonging to the French or Batavian republics. A bounty of 5*l.* per man offered for every seaman entering the fleet.

18. DECLARATION OF WAR.—The king issued a declaration of this date (Ann. Reg. xlv. 734) setting forth the grounds of the war against France. It began with contrasting the liberal commercial spirit of England with that of France, connected with which it mentioned the fact of persons being sent from France to reside in British ports in the capacity of consuls when no commercial treaty between the two countries existed, and who occupied themselves in taking soundings and plans of our harbours and other places of the kingdom. The military occupation of Holland, the violation of the independence of Switzerland, and the territorial annexations of France in Italy, are commented upon. Notice is then taken of the principle assumed by France that England has no right to interfere with any proceeding of the French, that is not an infringement of the treaty of Amiens, and the incompatibility of such a principle with existing European treaties. The gist of the dispute, Malta, is next brought on the tapis; and the surrender of the island according to treaty is alleged to have become impossible by France and Spain having destroyed the independence of the order of St. John of Jerusalem. Intimations are then thrown out that France had, by the mission of general Sebastiani to the East, manifested designs, contrary to the treaty of Amiens, of violating the integrity of the Turkish empire by a fresh attack upon Egypt. Buonaparte's attempts to interfere with the liberty of the press in England, the indignities he had offered to our ambassador, and his affirmation "that Britain cannot singly contend against France," conclude this important state paper. Except his interference with the English press, and sending spies into the country, the grounds of hostilities appear to have been more circumstantial than usual. "They concerned Austria and Prussia more than England. It was the personal demerit of the first consul that mainly excited the national spirit in favour of hostilities." He was obviously intoxicated by his remarkable successes and elevation. His rapacity and arrogance were offensive to the pride and good sense of the nation, and above all, his gasconade that England could not singly contend against him was sufficient to render the war popular, touching a chord that vibrated through all classes of Englishmen.

22. On the ground that two French ships had been captured prior to a declaration of war, Buonaparte issued a decree for the detention of all the English, from the age of 18 to 60, at present in France. About four months after the number of persons detained under this infringement of international law amounted in France to 11,600, and in Holland to 1300.

23. DEBATE ON THE RENEWAL OF THE WAR.—This subject was discussed in both houses on motions for addresses to the king. Doubts were expressed by some members of the justice, and by others of the expediency, of going to war, at least without further attempts at conciliation, but the predominant feeling was strongly in favour of resisting, by open hostilities, the haughty and encroaching spirit of France. In the Commons, Mr. Grey moved an amendment which, while it assured his majesty of their support in the war, expressed disapprobation of the conduct of the ministers. It was supported by Fox and Whitbread, and opposed by Pitt, Windham, Canning, Lascelles, Sir R. Peel, and Sergeant Best. Amendment rejected by 398 to 67. In the lords the unanimity was still greater; for an amendment moved by lord King to omit the words which so decidedly imputed to France the guilt of breaking the treaties was negatived by 142 to 10. The minority of ten were, the dukes of Bedford and Lancaster, the earls of Derby, Cowper, Besborough, Thanet, Albemarle, Stanhope, Guildford, and lord King.

26. At the anniversary of the charity children of the metropolis upwards of 7000 attended St Paul's.

28. The king, as elector of Hanover, issued a proclamation, stating that he abided by the treaty of Luneville, in respect of his German states, and that, in quality of elector of Hanover, he would take no part in the war.

MEASUREMENT OF A DEGREE.—M Swanberg and three other Swedish astronomers measured a degree of the meridian, and found it to be 57,209 toises. This is 196

12. The electorate of Hanover surrendered by capitulation to the French under general Mortier; valuable magazines fell into the hands of the enemy, who also despoiled the country by the levy of contributions. Mortier took up his abode in the electoral palace, on which George III. had just expended 50,000*l.* for the better accommodation of the duke of Cambridge. This acquisition giving the command of the Elbe and the Weser to the French, these rivers were closed against English commerce; and subsequently, in retaliation, blockaded by a British squadron.

7. The English ambassador left Holland, the Dutch being unable to preserve a neutrality in the war. An order issued to arrest all the English in the Batavian territories.

13. Mr. Addington brought forward the support, which included upwards of twelve millions of war-taxes. Among the ways and means was a property-tax, so called, though differing from the former income-tax only in the proportion now demanded being less, and no particular disclosure being required in incomes from land and the interest of money.

18. Plan of an army of reserve brought forward in the house of commons, to consist of 50,000 men, being 34,000 for England, 10,000 for Ireland, and 6000 for Scotland. They were to be raised by ballot, and not to serve out of the United Kingdom. As another means of internal defence, a bill passed into a law for raising a levy en masse in case of invasion.

21. English colonial produce and merchandise prohibited in France.

The Dutch legislative body agreed to place their army under a French commander.

29. The livery of London assembled in common hall, after expressing their readiness to support the government in a "vigorous prosecution of the contest," passed resolutions deprecating a tax on income.

30. The court of common council resolved to raise 800 men for the service of government.

Died at Florence the King of Etruria, the first of the royal creation of Buonaparte.

During the preceding and present month most of the printing-presses in Britain were employed by the partisans of ministers in printing exaggerated representations of the life and conduct of the first consul, for the purpose of exciting a national war-

...of ... and absurd fables were thus diffused in millions of sheets, which inflamed the passions of the people and answered the misleading purposes of the fabricators. The reckless proceedings of Buonaparte afforded some ground for these attacks, but many of them were wholly drawn from that copious repository of eastern stories, colonel sir Robert Wilson's "Narrative of the British Expedition to Egypt."

July 5. A horde of ... committed the most terrible ravage in the department of Gers. The communes Aiguau, Plaisance, and Ladrivege suffered in a most extraordinary degree.

8. Robert Atlett, assistant-cashier of the Bank of England, indicted at the Old Bailey for embezzling exchequer bills: he was acquitted on a point of law, the bills having been informally signed. The exchequer bills purloined amounted to 322,000*l.*, of which 91,000*l.* that had been pawned was redeemed by the Bank for 70,000*l.*

9. The roof of the tower in the centre of Westminster-abbey caught fire and fell in, damaging the choir.

20. Great meeting at Lloyd's for promoting a subscription for the war, Brook Watson in the chair.

21. A correspondence between Mr. Addington and the prince of Wales, the latter soliciting in the present crisis a more conspicuous rank than colonel. The king refused the application, saying that his royal highness would have sufficient opportunity for distinguishing himself at the head of his regiment.

The house of commons voted a grant of 60,000*l.* and a pension of 16,000*l.* to the prince of Orange in compensation for the loss of the Texel fleet, which had been taken possession of by the English in his name.

23. INSURRECTION IN DUBLIN.—While measures were being taken for defending the country against invasion, a new insurrection broke out in Ireland, which occasioned a considerable but short-lived alarm. It originated with a youthful enthusiast of considerable parts, named Emmet, brother to a gentleman who had been deeply implicated in the seditious proceedings of 1798, and had in consequence been expropriated. This rash attempt to disturb the public tranquillity was made upon the 23rd, when a crowd of country people entered the metropolis, and marched through some of the principal streets, armed with pikes and fire-arms; and, actuated by the feelings of desperadoes, they unfortunately met the carriage of lord Kilwarden, chief justice of Ireland, who, accompanied by his daughter and the king's daughter to the castle. The king's daughter seized the horses, dragged the venerable judge and Mrs. Wolfe from the carriage, and butchered them in a barbarous manner. Being attacked in their turn by about 120 soldiers, some of them were killed, others seized, and this insurrectionary riot suppressed. Emmet, the leader, and others afterwards suffered death for their temerity.

26. Great meeting of merchants, bankers, and others on the Royal-exchange; 5000 persons present, who agreed to a declaration expressive of their determination to "stand or fall with their king and country," Jacob Bosaquet in the chair, seconded by the secretary of the East India Company. "God save the king," and "Rule Britannia," being called for, and nine cheers given, the meeting dissolved.

Aug. 2. A meeting of the freeholders of Middlesex took place at Hackney, to consider of a loyal address: it was carried unanimously, and, on the motion of sir W. Curtis, it was agreed that only one of the county members (Mr. Byng) should accompany the sheriffs in presenting the address, sir F. Burdett having given offence by some observations tending to discourage the national enthusiasm in defence of the kingdom.

20. The drought greater than had been known since 1762. At Pevensay a flock of 300 sheep, being after a long thirst driven to a pond, drank so immoderately that upwards of 100 of them died almost immediately.

23. The distress occasioned in Hamburg by the blockade of the Elbe became every day more apparent. Upwards of thirty suicides were committed in the space of a week.—Ann. Reg. xlv. 423.

Sept. 2. Astley's amphitheatre burnt; damages 30,000*l.*, insured only for 1700*l.*

3. John Hatfield, the notorious swindler and seducer (see 532), executed at Carlisle for forgery. He was originally a rider to a wholesale linen-draper, and in early life had contrived to marry a natural daughter of lord Robert Manners, with whom he got 1500*l.* Deception formed so rooted a part of the nature of this impostor that he threw away many opportunities of settling himself comfortably in life from an unconknown woman, and was at length driven to the gallows. He was thrown into the water, and was drowned in attempting to repeat his experiment. When the body was found, it appeared that, having gone down with his arms in a horizontal, instead of a perpendicular position, they were dislocated by the resistance of the water.

18. Robert Emmet, tried at Dublin, and found guilty of high treason, was executed the day following. Emmet was a young Irish barrister, of oratorical talent, but of an enthusiastic temperament.

23. BATTLE OF ASSY in the East Indies, in which major-general Arthur Wellesley completely defeated the combined Mahratta forces commanded by Scindiah Holkar and the rajah of Berar. It was a well-contested action, in which the English suffered considerably, and the Mahrattas had 1200 men killed and wounded.

Oct. 3. John Silvester elected recorder of London, and Newman Knowlys common sergeant; the recorder's salary was raised from 600*l.* to 1000*l.* per annum.

19. A public fast-day which was observed in the metropolis with the utmost decorum. The volunteer corps of London and Westminster assembled at an early hour, and proceeded to their several places of worship, "where they received (Ann. Reg. xlv. 442) the instruction of appropriate sermons, and the clergy displayed on the occasion a most laudable zeal to strengthen and improve those generous and manly sentiments with which their audiences were inspired."

26. The volunteer corps of London were reviewed by the king in Hyde-park; Elfi Bey, the French prince, and general Dumouriez were present; the number of spectators was estimated at 200,000; the corps reviewed amounted to 12,401, cavalry and infantry.

28. A grand review of the Westminster, Lambeth, and Southwark volunteer corps in Hyde-park, consisting of 14,676 men, cavalry and infantry: they gave great satisfaction to the king, who expressed his approbation through the commander-in-chief. The number reviewed on both days was 27,077; the total number of volunteers enrolled in the metropolis and out-parishes was 46,000.

the recess and the continuing the suspension of the habeas corpus act, and the extension of martial law in Ireland, and for granting certain exemptions from assessed taxes to volunteers in England.

James Mackintosh, esq., appointed recorder of Bombay and in the month following received the honour of knighthood.

30. Fort Dauphin having been taken by the English, the French force, commanded by Rochambeau, surrendered, by which the principal part of St. Domingo fell into the hands of the negroes, commanded by their black chiefs Dessalines, Christophe; and Clervaux.

By the falling of a cliff near Harwich the skeleton of an enormous animal, thirty feet long, was found, supposed to be the mammoth; one of the molar teeth weighed seven pounds.

Dec. Peace concluded in India with the rajah of Berar, and Scindiah, the Mahratta chief.

INVASION OF ENGLAND.—The grand project of Buonaparte was a descent on Britain; for which purpose he collected a vast flotilla of gun-boats, and assembled an army ready to cross the Channel the first favourable opportunity. His bombastic threats had the effect of rousing the national spirit. Volunteer and yeomanry corps were formed in every part of the kingdom, and the number of this description of force returned was 379,945 men.

SALE OF LOUISIANA.—In the course of the year the French government assigned their late acquisition of Louisiana to the United States of America for three millions of dollars, by which the States acquired 430,000 square miles of territory, augmenting their territorial area to 1,680,000 square miles. It was an advantageous purchase, consolidating their dominion, removing from them a restless neighbour, and a source of dispute with Spain, which had begun about the warehousing of American goods in New Orleans.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—At Paris, Madame Clarion, 81, a once popular French actress, and the friend of Marmontel. John Thoresby, the celebrated topographical writer. At Paris, M. de la Harpe, 85, author of "An Ancient and Modern Course of Literature." At Hamburgh, Klopstock, 79, the celebrated German poet. Sir William Hamilton thirty-six years British minister at Naples, and distinguished by his antiquarian researches. Henry Swinburne, a celebrated traveller. William Woodfall, 58, a well-known journalist, and the first who undertook and succeeded in publishing the parliamentary debates on the morning following the proceedings. John Hoole, 76, the translator of Tasso. James Beattie, LL.D., 68, poet and moral philosopher. Ralph Grifiths, LL.D., 83, the founder of the "Monthly Review," which he conducted for 54 years. Joseph Ritson, a conveyancer of Gray's-inn, and well known for his publications and criticisms on the old English ballads.

A. D. 1804.—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS.—

The war did not stop the progress of works of national utility. The West India docks, occupying a surface of thirty acres, were now completed, and warehouses erected for the safe deposit of merchandise unexposed to fire or plunder, as no lights were suffered, nor any person allowed to remain within the walls after dark. The excavation of the dock for loading, occupying twenty-four acres, was proceeding with spirit. The profits on this undertaking were already such as to warrant a dividend of ten per cent. to the subscribers. The London docks forming in Wapping for the accommodation of the whole trade of the port (East and West India shipping excepted) were in an advanced state, as well as immense warehouses for the bonding of goods. The East India dock was only just commenced. The Commercial-road, beginning at the north-west corner of the West India dock, and coming out at White-chapel near Aldgate, was nearly paved and finished: the tolls received on this spacious thoroughfare averaged from 70*l.* to 80*l.* weekly, and were daily increasing. The Grand Junction canal before noticed was another great commercial undertaking in a forward state. The sum subscribed for this concern was 1,350,000*l.*; its progress was rather impeded by the drought of the preceding summer, but it was expected to be finished by the end of the year.

JAN. 13. CURIOUS CASE.—Francis Smith, officer of excise, was tried at the Old Bailey for wilful murder. It seems the neighbourhood of Hammersmith had been alarmed by what was supposed to be a ghost. The prisoner went out with a loaded gun, with intent to apprehend the person who personated the ghost; he met the deceased, who was dressed in white, and immediately discharged his gun and killed him. Chief Baron Macdonald, Mr. Justice Rooke, and Mr. Justice Lawrence, were unanimously of opinion that the facts amounted to the crime of murder; for the person who represented the ghost was only guilty of a misdemeanor, and no one would have had a right to have killed him even if he could not otherwise have been taken. The jury brought in a verdict of manslaughter, but the Court said they could not receive that verdict; if the jury believed the witnesses, the prisoner was guilty of murder; if they did not believe them, they must acquit. Upon this they found a verdict of guilty. Sentence of death was pronounced, but the prisoner was pardoned on condition of a year's imprisonment.

28. Some workmen digging to repair the pipes in Leadenhall-street discovered a beautiful tessellated pavement, with a figure of Bacchus, sitting on a tiger at full speed, holding in his left hand a Thyrsis dressed with ivy, and in his right a goblet.

Feb. 5. DEATH OF JOSEPH PRIESTLEY, LL.D., F.R.S.—This eminent divine and philosopher was born in the neighbourhood of Leeds, where he was for six years pastor of the Unitarian congregation of that town. Subsequently he formed part of the domestic establishment of the earl of Shelburne, where he continued those curious researches in pneumatic chemistry by which he acquired great celebrity, and earned the prize of Copley's gold medal. Dr. Priestley entered warmly into the theological, political, and metaphysical questions that agitated his contemporaries. He became an early convert to Dr. Hartley's theory, that refers all the phenomena of the intellectual powers to physical sensations. His attacks on the Established Church, and his warm admiration of the first outbreak of the French revolution, made him during this heated period an object of persecution, and he severely suffered in the Birmingham riots of 1789. The compensation he received was inadequate to his losses, and, finding himself the victim of party animosity, he withdrew to America, as a more tranquil asylum. Even here he felt the effects of intolerance, until Mr. Jefferson became president, when he had the good fortune to outlive all disquiet on account of his Socinian tenets. He expired at Northumberland, in Pennsylvania, in his 71st year. He was an indefatigable writer and controversialist; and his chief works are enumerated among the "Men of Letters" of this period.

14. A bulletin issued at St. James's intimated the return of the king's mental malady. That the attack was not severe might be inferred from the chancellor of the exchequer's declaration on the 29th, that "there was no necessary suspension of the royal function," and by that of the lord chancellor on March 14th, that "the lord's commissioners were warranted in expressing the royal assent to several bills which had already passed both houses of parliament." It was May, however, before the king was in a state fit for public business, or could enjoy the comforts of his domestic circle.

16. Robert Astlett, the bank-cashier (vide July 8, 1803), who had been tried on a second indictment, and on whose case the opinion of the judges had been taken, was this day adjudged guilty; and on the Monday following sentenced to death. He was subsequently respited during the royal pleasure.

PLOT AGAINST THE FIRST CONSUL.—In the course of this month a plot was discovered at Paris for the assassination of Buonaparte, and the overthrow of the consular government. The principals in this conspiracy were general Pichegru; Georges, an enthusiastic loyalist, and Lajolais, a confidant of general Moreau. How far Moreau was privy to the scheme does not appear, further than that his house had long been the rendezvous of the disaffected, and that he had held secret interviews with Pichegru on the Boulevards since his return to Paris. Pending the trials Pichegru was found strangled in prison; Georges and some of his accomplices were publicly executed; Moreau was sentenced to two years' imprisonment, which were commuted for banishment to America. Buonaparte pardoned Riviere and the marquis Fohgnac, the last at the instance of his wife. These proceedings were not terminated till the end of July. During their progress captain Wright was shipwrecked on the French coast, and being brought to Paris was recognised as the same who had landed Georges and the other conspirators from England in Normandy. Wright was examined before the court, but declined answering any questions, as it might "implicate his majesty's ministers." He was detained as a prisoner of war in the temple till the end of 1805, when he put an end to his existence after reading an account (as alleged) of the capitulation of the Austrian general Mack at Ulm.

Mar. 3. Rev. Lockhart Gordon and Loudon Gordon tried at Oxford for the abduction of Mrs. Lee from her house in Bolton-row, Piccadilly. Judge Lawrence stopped the trial, as it appeared that, though Mrs. Lee at first resisted, she subsequently acquiesced in the forcible carrying away, and actually threw a charm of camphor, which she wore against the seductions of pleasure, out of the chaise window. The affair made much noise, the lady being rich, and a natural daughter of lord Le Despencer.

10. Died, in his 29th year, Thomas Pitt, the second lord Camelford. He was shot by captain Best in a duel on the 7th instant, near Holland-house. His lordship, whose character was eccentric, acknowledged himself the aggressor; but a coroner's jury brought in a verdict of "wilful murder" against Best, who was reputed a fatal marksman, and had, a short time before, killed a man by the accidental discharge of a pistol.

EXECUTION OF THE DUKK D'ENGHIEN.
2 U 2

—This prince, eldest son of the duke of Bourbon, was seized, under an order of Buonaparte, at Ettenheim, in the neutral territory of Baden, and carried the same day to the citadel of Strasburgh, where he remained till the 18th. On the 20th the duke arrived at Paris under a guard of gendarmes, and, after waiting some hours at the barrier, was driven to Vincennes. A military commission appointed to try him met the same evening in the castle. The charges against the prince were, the serving in the armies of the emigrants against France; second, of being in the pay of England; and third, of being privy to the conspiracy of Georges. The last was the only criminal charge, and it was not proved: it was Pichegru, and not the prince, who had been mistakenly described as having been seen in company with the conspirators in Paris. Notwithstanding, the prince was found guilty. His sentence was carried into immediate execution; he was shot in the castle-ditch at Vincennes, about six in the morning of the 21st. It was a foul atrocity in all the parties concerned; for, whatever might be the plots against the life of the first consul, they cannot be allowed, on any sound principles of justice, to be pleaded in defence of the judicial assassination of the innocent. The violent seizure of the accused on neutral ground—the composition of the military tribunal before which he was arraigned—the hurried and midnight proceedings, and the nocturnal execution—show that it was determined to reach a retaliatory victim, through every barrier of international law, justice, and humanity. Before his death the prince sought an interview with Buonaparte, which was refused; he wrote a letter to the first consul, which was not delivered till after the catastrophe. The prince was only thirty-two years of age, which, with his reputation for courage and talents, heightened the interest felt in his fate.

Apr. 16. Mr. Pitt made a motion, censuring the naval administration of the country; it was negatived by 201 to 130.

18. A solemn requiem performed in the French chapel, Portman-square, for the late duke d'Enghien; present, many of the English nobility; and of the French, monsieur and the duke of Berri and Orleans. The prince of Condé, grandfather of the late duke, was unable to attend.

23. On a motion by Mr. Fox for the appointment of a committee to revise the ministerial bills for the defence of the country, Mr. Pitt made a violent attack on ministers. Motion negatived by 256 to 204.

29. Massacre of the whites in Hayti by the blacks under Dessalines.

30. Mr. Addington brought forward the budget, in which the necessary supplies were stated at upwards of thirty-six millions for Britain only. Additions to the war-taxes were proposed, a loan of ten millions, and a vote of credit for two millions and a half.

According to a recent enumeration, it appeared that in the metropolis there are 346 places of public worship: namely, 112 parish churches, 58 licensed chapels and chapels of ease—19 for foreign protestants, 12 for Roman catholics; 133 meeting-houses and methodists' chapels of various sects dissenting from the church, 6 quakers' meeting-houses, and 6 synagogues.

May 1. FIRST CONSUL MADE EMPEROR.—

Addresses having been previously procured from the armies, municipalities, and other bodies, a motion was made by M. Carre in the tribunate (the body in which laws originate) for conferring on Napoleon Buonaparte the rank of emperor, with hereditary succession in his family according to the law of primogeniture. The single vote of Carnot formed the only opposition to this regal issue of the republican convulsions. The decree of the tribunate was adopted by the senate; and power given to Buonaparte, if he had no male issue, to adopt an heir from the children of his brothers. The titles of prince, princess, and imperial highness, were conferred on all members of the Buonaparte family. A number of generals were raised to the rank of marshals, and letters sent to the bishops, dictating a religious ceremony for the occasion.

5. Surinam capitulated to the British.

7. Mr. Pitt had an interview with the king, when he received authority to form a new administration, limited only on two points: first, that the catholic question should not be revived; and next, that Mr. Fox should be excluded from his arrangements.

9, 10, 11. Doubts existing in the public mind as to the real state of the king's health, his majesty, on each of these days, drove through the principal streets of London and Westminster, attended by the queen and princesses.

12. ADDINGTON MINISTRY DISSOLVED.—Mr. Pitt was this day gazetted first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer. The Addington ministry never possessed inherent strength; it was considered a temporary expedient till the two leading parties of which its predecessors were composed should either reconcile their differences with the court or between themselves. Mr. Pitt, who had taken an active part in its formation, could not, with propriety, appear as an oppositionist; and he stood apart from the Grenvilles, who went out with him, in supporting the peace and other measures of the late premier. The accumulating difficulties of the government, however, demanded a more efficient and experienced administration; and Mr. Pitt, whose popularity had increased during his retirement, certainly united, more than any other person, the suffrages of the people in his favour. His elevation, notwithstanding, was accompanied with some considerable loss of reputation for political good faith and inflexibility of principle. Catholic emancipation was abandoned; and the "old" opposition, as it was termed, under Mr. Fox, by whose aid Mr. Pitt had recovered the helm, was thrown overboard. The Grenvilles, or "new" opposition, were consistent; they refused to form part of the ministry unless Mr. Fox was included (Ann. Reg., xlvii. 124). Not having the co-operation of either the old or new opposition, Mr. Pitt made up his staff out of the Addingtons and his own devoted adherents. Of Mr. Addington's administration, the following cabinet ministers retained their situations in that formed by Mr. Pitt:—

Earl of Chatham, Master-General of the Ordnance.

Lord Castlereagh, President of the Board of Control.

Lord Hawkesbury, secretary for foreign affairs under the late ministry, became home secretary under Mr. Pitt's. The new arrangements, therefore, stood as follow:—

Mr. Pitt, Premier.

Lord Harrowby, Secretary for Foreign Affairs.

Earl Camden, Secretary for the Colonies.

Lord Mulgrave, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Thus a majority of the late cabinet ministers who were retained formed a majority of Mr. Pitt's administration. In the government of Ireland there was no change, except of the chief secretary, Mr. Wickham, who, retiring, was succeeded by sir Evan Nepean. In the public offices the changes were William Dundas, secretary at war, vice Mr. Bragge; George Canning, treasurer of the navy, vice Mr. Tierney; George Rose and lord Charles Somerset, joint paymasters of the forces, vice Mr. Steele and Hiley Addington; duke of Montrose, postmaster-general, vice lord Auckland; William Huskisson and William Sturges Bourne, secretaries of the treasury, vice Vansittart and Sargent. The new ministry was a triumph of the king, who, by his immovability on this as on a former occasion, defeated every attempt of the political leaders, singly or combined, to force upon him either men or measures he disliked. From ambition, or other motive, Mr. Pitt succumbed to the prejudices of the sovereign in respect of the catholics. As respects Mr. Fox, probably the minister made a less reluctant sacrifice to royal antipathies, as he may have entertained, as well as the monarch, from long political rivalry with that gentleman, insuperable objections to being included with him in the same cabinet.

20. Buonaparte proclaimed emperor of the French. Thus terminated the French republic under all its phases. It had lasted 4136 days, only one day less than the duration of the English commonwealth from the death of Charles I.

22. A new coinage of five-shilling dollars and half-guineas issued.

25. A public fast-day. "The sober silence of the streets," says the Annual Register, "was only interrupted by the bells of the parish-churches calling the inhabitants to prayers."

26. William Cobbett, the editor of the "Political Register," was tried in the court of King's Bench for a libel on the earl of Hardwicke, lord Redesdale, and others of the Irish government, and found guilty.

20. Mr. Western introduced into the commons a bill for the alteration of the corn-laws: exportation to be allowed when the price of wheat was at or below 48s. per quarter of eight bushels; and importation when the price was 63s., but not under: the average prices to be taken from the maritime districts of England and Scotland.

27. The king held a grand levee, the first since his indisposition.

28. Mr. Wilberforce's bill for the abolition of the slave-trade, after a limited time, read a third time. It was supported by Pitt and Fox, but was thrown out in the lords.

General Hamilton killed in a duel at New York with Aaron Burr, the vice-president. It arose out of political differences; and the fatal result caused deep regret in America, Hamilton being hardly less respected than the great Washington.

July 11. At Bedford sessions an overseer was sentenced to two months' imprisonment, and fined 20*l.*, for turning out his female servant while suffering the pains of labour.

12. William Draper Best, serjeant-at-law, was indicted for an assault with intent, &c., on Rebecca, the wife of James Minifie, a person of reduced circumstances, and client of the defendant. The alleged assault took place in the chambers of the learned counsel; but it appearing that the plaintiffs had subsequently tried to borrow 100*l.* of Mr. Best, who denied ever having touched the person of Mrs. Minifie, lord Ellenborough considered it a conspiracy to extort money, and the jury gave a verdict of "not guilty."

13. Three men stood in the pillory in Smithfield, for a conspiracy in fraudulently assuming the characters of merchants, and mutually drawing bills on each other, which they got discounted. After standing the usual time they were carried back to Newgate, there to be imprisoned twelve months.

23. Georges, and eleven of his fellow-conspirators, guillotined at Paris.

31. Parliament prorogued by the king.

Aug. 9. The poll for Middlesex declared; Mr. Mainwaring 2828, and Sir Francis Burdett 2823, being a majority of five for the successful candidate. A subscription of 5225*l.* had been raised to defray the election expenses of Mainwaring, but he had declined the contest unless raised to 10,000*l.*

Intelligence having been received that commodore Dance, with the homeward-bound East India fleet, had gallantly repulsed an attack of the French admiral Linois, the directors voted rewards to the amount of 50,000*l.* to the officers and seamen. The value of the fleet preserved was estimated at eight millions.

11. Francis II., to preserve equality with his French neighbour, in lieu of being the elective emperor of Germany, assumed the title of hereditary emperor of Austria.

25. The lady of colonel Thornton, on the York course, rode a race for 1000 guineas. It was a four-mile heat, and run in nine minutes and fifty-nine seconds, Mrs. Thornton coming in second.

28. M. d'Oubril, the Russian chargé d'affaires at Paris, demanded his passports, the French not having executed the convention with Russia for the evacuation of Naples.

Sept. 1. Rev. Mr. Massey obtained 10,000*l.* damages against the marquis of Headfort for crim. con.: the offence was perpetrated on the sabbath while the husband was performing divine service.

6. At a court of pie-poudre, Bartholomew fair, a young gentleman paid 3*l.* 16*s.* for taking away an actress when she was going to perform; and 5*l.* for crim. con. to the husband, the lady being married.

12. Thermometer at 80° in the shade.

20. Bank directors determined on a bonus of five per cent. to the proprietors, and also to pay the property-tax. Salaries of directors raised from 150*l.* to 300*l.* a-year.

29. Their majesties entertained with a naval fête and Dutch fair at Weymouth.

The ancient village of Reculver, in Kent (the Regulbium of the Romans) much injured by the equinoctial tides; part of the churchyard washed away.

Oct. 2. CATAMARAN PROJECT.—This was one of many contrivances for destroying the French flotilla, which was collecting in vast numbers on the opposite coasts of the Channel for the invasion of England. The experiment was made under the direction of Lord Keith on 150 gun-boats moored outside of Boulogne pier. The instruments relied on were copper vessels of an oblong form filled with combustibles, and so constructed as to explode in a given time. These vessels were to be towed and fastened under the bottoms of the enemy's boats by a small raft, rowed by one man, who, being seated up to the chin in water, might possibly escape detection in a dark night. (Ann. Reg., xlv. 141.) But the attempt entirely failed; the enemy opened their tiers and suffered the explosive vessels to pass into the rear, where they harmlessly blew up. Ministers were much ridiculed for countenancing this futile scheme, especially lord Melville, whom Mr. Pitt, either from inability to procure the services of earl Spencer, or from boon-companionship, had placed at the head of the admiralty.

5. ATTACK ON A NEUTRAL STATE.—Some cargoes of treasure being expected from the South American mines at Cadiz, and information having been obtained, captain Moore, with the Indefatigable, and three other frigates, without any previous declaration of war, was despatched to intercept them. The British officer fell in with the expected squadron, when the Spaniards refusing to surrender an engagement ensued, and the Spanish admiral's ship, Mercedes, blew up with a dreadful explosion, the whole crew, forty excepted, perishing; among them an American family, consisting of the mother, four daughters, and four sons; the unfortunate father and another son being on board one of the other vessels, and spectators of the catastrophe. The remaining three frigates struck in succession, after a considerable loss in killed and wounded. The lading of the captured vessels was of immense value, consisting of gold and silver bullion and rich merchandise. Indignation, however, was generally excited by this piratical enterprise, both at home and abroad; the more so as its fatal results might have been avoided by sending out such a superior force as would have justified the Spanish commander in the prompt surrender of his vessels; whereas the equality of strength rendered a sanguinary combat inevitable. The chief justification of this violence was in the fact that Spain aided France in the war, by subsidies, paid in lieu of a contingent of troops, that she was bound by the treaty of 1796 to furnish to our enemy.

8. The negro Dessalines crowned emperor of Hayti (the native name of St. Domingo), and an imperial court formed with all its etiquette and appendages.

A party of French troops crossed the Elbe and arrested Sir George Rumbold, the English resident at Hamburgh, on the pretext of his participating in intrigues for the overthrow of the French government, and for which our ministers, Drake and Smith, had been dismissed from the courts of Bavaria and Wirtemberg. A remonstrance of Prussia procured his liberation, but not the restitution of his papers.

A Roman sepulchre discovered at Ashby Puerorum, in Lincolnshire.

Reg.* xlv. 19.) of the military force of the United Kingdom:—there were 130,000 in Britain, and 50,000 in Ireland, on permanent pay; of this total of 180,000 the militia amounted to 84,000, and the regulars to 96,000; volunteer force in Britain 340,000; in Ireland 70,000; making a total of 410,000. The sea forces were 25,000. The gross force of the united kingdom was nearly 700,000 men in arms.

A.D. 1805. THIRD COALITION AGAINST FRANCE.—The storm of invasion alleged to be gathering over England was diverted by the new confederacy on the continent. It was ill concerted and worse conducted than any anterior combination against the power of France. The distant co-operation of Russia was secured, but without the aid of Prussia there was little chance of success, and Austria began the war without any certain knowledge whether the court of Berlin would be hostile or auxiliary in the contest. Buonaparte, by the wariness of his plans and the energy of their execution, disappointed all the calculations of his opponents. By the surrender of Ulm the armies of Austria were ruined without a battle; her capital was taken without resistance; and scarcely had the remnant of her forces joined the Russians in Moravia, when she was compelled to hazard an engagement which laid her prostrate at the feet of the conqueror. The battle of Aus-terlitz terminated the hopes of the allies, and was followed at the close of the year by the treaty of Presburgh. During the struggle on the continent England acquired new laurels on her favourite element by the victory of Trafalgar—the greatest of her naval triumphs; and, though dearly purchased by the death of admiral Nelson, terminated the cherished hopes of France to rival the maritime power of Britain. In parliamentary occurrences the chief were the charges brought against the first lord of the Admiralty for malversation while treasurer of the navy. Lord Melville had been the staunch supporter and confidential friend of Mr. Pitt; and the charge of peculation against him seriously affected the popularity of his ministry, already weakened by the desertion of the Grenvilles and the hopes as prospects of the war. Lord Sidmouth, after holding office a few months, resigned, not concurring in the minister's scheme of sheltering the state culprit.

Jan. 2. Emperor Napoleon addressed a letter of this date to the king, commencing, "Sir and brother," setting forth the futile nature of the war, and his desire of peace. It was coldly responded to by Lord Mulgrave, in a communication of the 14th addressed to Talleyrand, informing him that the object of his majesty was the "future safety and tranquillity of Europe," and that the emperor of Russia participated in his sentiments, having evinced "a lively interest in the safety and independence of the continent."

Died suddenly of apoplexy, at Baylis, near Salt-hill, in his 73rd year, Alexander Wedderburn earl of Rosslyn, an eminent lawyer, but of shifting political predilections. He was one of the chief promoters of the American war, and presided at the trial of the rioters in 1780 with a zeal against the accused unbecoming a judge.—(Lam Mag., No. 21, p. 74.) First a whig, he became a tory under lord North; relapsed into whiggism pending the Regency question, and again deserted the whig to join the war-faction in 1792, receiving soon after the great seal, of which Mr. Pitt had sufficient influence to deprive the king's favourite, Lord Thurlow, who had long by his cross-purposes and underhand practices been a great stumbling-block in his administration. Lord Rosslyn was twice married, but left no issue; sir James Sinclair Erskine, his nephew, succeeded to his lordship's title and estates.

11. MINISTERIAL CHANGES.—Mr. Pitt, not having strengthened himself by an alliance with any party, found it expedient to become reconciled to the late premier, who was raised to the peerage by the title of viscount Sidmouth, and made lord president of the council in the room of the duke of Portland. Lord Mulgrave succeeded the earl of Harrowby as foreign secretary; the earl of Buckinghamshire was nominated chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster; and others of the Addingtons were sworn of the privy council, among them Mr. Vansittart.

15. Parliament opened by the king, who adverted to the war with Spain, and his confederate intercourse with the continental powers, especially Russia.

30. The New London Docks opened.

Feb. 1. Abergavenny, outward-bound East Indiaman wrecked; 300 persons drowned, and the loss estimated at 200,000*l*.

20. A public fast-day.

23. Dr. Charles Manners, late bishop of Norwich, installed archbishop of Canterbury, vacant by the death of Dr. Moore.

25. ROYAL FETE.—The king, having taken up his abode at Windsor Castle, determined to give, after the old English fashion, a house warming. Upwards of 400 of the nobility and other persons of rank were invited, who mostly appeared in full court suits. Glass chandeliers and lustres of great value were displayed, as well as the silver chandeliers, and four beautiful tables, saved from the French invaders in Hanover. The ball-room, instead of being chalked, was painted with appropriate devices. This royal banquet is supposed to have cost 50,000*l*. The entertainments were kept up to a late hour; the royal family withdrew about half-past three in the morning; but the company did not leave till six. Next day the queen gave a grand public breakfast at Frogmore to about 200 persons of distinction; dancing commenced at three, which continued till six, when the guests sat down to an elegant collation.

28. The tunnel, two miles in length, through Blesworth-hill, near Northampton, completed, opening by the Grand Junction-canal a communication with the metropolis.

Mar. 4. First stone of the East India-docks laid by captain Huddart and John Woolmore, esq.

9. Dr. Henry Bathurst promoted to the see of Norwich.

It was determined in the Marshalsea-court that a tenant holding to the amount of 10*l*. a year must give six months' notice to quit, without agreement.

11. The sheriffs of London committed to Newgate by order of the house of commons, for gross partiality, in favour of sir Francis Burdett, in the late Middlesex election.

Apr. 6. CHARGES AGAINST LORD MELVILLE.—Public attention was strongly excited by disclosures in the Fourth Report of the commissioners of naval inquiry, impugning the conduct of the first lord of the admiralty while treasurer of the navy, between the years 1786 and 1800. It was brought before the house of commons on the 6th, by Mr. Whitbread, under three heads of charge. These were, his lordship's applying the public money to other uses than those of the naval department; his conniving at a system of peculation in Mr. Trotter (paymaster of the navy), for whose conduct he was responsible; and his having been a participator in that peculation. Mr. Pitt proposed to refer the subject to a select committee, but, on the suggestion of Mr. Fox, changed his purpose to a motion for the previous question. On a division there appeared, for Mr. Whitbread's resolutions, 216; against them, 216; when the speaker gave his casting vote in their favour. An address to the king was then moved for the dismissal of lord Melville from the admiralty, but, at the desire of Mr. Pitt, the motion was postponed. In the interim his lordship resigned, and his name was crossed from the list of privy councillors, and Mr. Trotter (the paymaster) was dismissed. Various proceedings followed till the end of June, terminating in the impeachment of lord Melville of high crimes and misdemeanors.

11. England concluded the treaty of Petersburg, the basis of a third coalition against France.

Bhurtpore surrendered to lord Lake, who concluded a treaty with the rajah, stipulating for the payment of twenty lacs of rupees to the East India Company.

23. On the motion of Mr. Grey, Peter Stuart, the editor of the Oracle, was brought to the bar of the house of commons for a libellous paragraph, and reprimanded by the speaker.

30. It appeared, from Mr. Trotter's account with Messrs. Coutts's, that his dividends from funded property had increased from 80*l.* per annum, in 1791, to 11,308*l.* in 1802.

The Spanish Inquisition interdicted the circulation of 102 literary works. Locke's "Essay on the Human Understanding" was condemned on the ground that its doctrines were destructive of moral ideas. Pope's works were censured as obscene, heretical, and blasphemous against his holiness of Rome.

May 7. Died, at his house, Berkeley-square, in his 69th year, WILLIAM PETTY, marquis of LANSDOWNE, a general in the army. This eminent nobleman had long held a conspicuous place in public and private life, and taken an active part in most of the earlier transactions of the present reign. He was a whig, but was not for fettering the crown in the choice of its ministers by factious combinations. While premier, in 1782, he introduced Mr. Pitt, then twenty-three years of age, to the office of chancellor of the exchequer. His lordship's entailed estates, worth 35,000*l.* per annum, descended to his eldest son; and 10,000*l.* a year, and 100,000*l.* in specie (Annual Register, xvii. 477), were willed to his second son, lord Henry Petty, soon after chancellor of the exchequer.

10. Lord Grenville introduced into the lords the subject of the Irish catholic claims. He was supported by lord Moira, and opposed by lords Sidmouth, Hawkesbury, and Redoubt. Catholic petition rejected by 178 to 49.

13. Same subject brought forward in the commons by Mr. Fox, and eloquently seconded by Mr. Grattan, who made his first speech in the British senate. Mr. Pitt, who resigned in 1801 on the ground of his inability to carry a measure in favour of the catholics, declared that his sentiments remained unaltered, but that, so long as the king was opposed to catholic emancipation and the popular feeling against it, he should consider it his duty not only to oppose the introduction of the subject, but deprecate its agitation. Motion negatived by 336 against 124.

18. Being Saturday night, the bishop of London compelled the curtain at the Opera-house to drop at 12 o'clock, before the ballet was finished. He also tried to prevent the desecration of Sunday by evening routs and concerts in the metropolis.

25. DEATH OF WILLIAM PALEY, D.D.—This eminent theologian and moralist was a native of Peterborough, and slowly rose, from being an assistant in a Greenwich academy, to be archdeacon of Carlisle and a prebendary of St. Paul's; preferments below his deserts, and unequal to the important services he rendered in support of our lay and ecclesiastical establishments. There is perhaps no public writer who has so essentially contributed to the political mind of the community, and afforded so many ingenious and scrutable arguments in defence of the exigencies, along with the defects, of public institutions. It is the sacrifice of principle to expediency that chiefly renders Paley objectionable as a general teacher of ethical and social science. His style is clear and masculine, but not always neat; his illustrations apt and striking; his applications practical; his judgment shrewd and penetrating. At the university he refused to sign the petition for relief in the matter of subscription to the Articles; observing, with more point than decorum, that "he could not afford to keep a conscience;" a burst, probably, of the levity not unusual with him, rather than of a rule of life. Mr. Pitt is said to have wished to bestow a mitre upon Paley, but was thwarted in a high quarter, on the ground that the doctor was not sufficiently orthodox for the episcopal bench.

26. Emperor of France crowned king of Italy in the cathedral of Milan. Napoleon himself took from the altar the iron crown of Charlemagne, and placed it on his head amidst shouts of acclamation.

June 4. Genoa annexed to France.

11. Lord Melville appeared within the bar of the commons to answer the charges against him. He solemnly denied having derived any private benefit from the practices of Mr. Trotter; "but confessed he had applied the sum of 10,000*l.* in a way he could not reveal consistently with private honour and public duty." His lordship's speech made little impression, and the house determined on a criminal prosecution.

15. Miss Paterson, an American lady, and wife of Jerome Buonaparte, prohibited landing in France by the French emperor.

21. The commons voted to the duke of Athol in perpetuity an additional grant of 3500*l.* per annum, in compensation for the sovereignty of the Isle of Man, which the duke's ancestor had sold to government, forty years before, for 70,000*l.*

25. Lord Melville's friends having made fresh discoveries, the proceeding by criminal prosecution was abandoned, and an impeachment agreed to.

The famous "Fairlop Oak," forty-eight feet in girth, and supposed to be 500 years old, injured by a party who had lighted a fire near it for amusement.

The preparations for invasion continued with unabated activity at Boulogne. The army assembled amounted 100,000 men, officered by the first military characters in the imperial service. On the other hand gigantic efforts were made to repel the attack, and a range of martello-towers erected on the most exposed parts of the southern coast.

July 1. H. Mitton Rowan, in the King's-bench, Dublin, pleaded the king's pardon for treasonable practices.

10. Lords Sidmouth and Buckinghamshire resigned, the former succeeded by lord Camden, the latter by lord Harrowby. The resignations were chiefly arose from a difference with the minister on the prosecution of Melville, Mr. Pitt's old colleague. Lord Channing became foreign secretary, and lord Barmingham was placed at the head of the admiralty.

12. Parliament prorogued, by commission.

23. Admiral sir Robert Calder captured two sail of the line of the combined French and Spanish fleet, off Ferrol. The rest of the enemy's ships got back to Cadiz.

29. Marquis Cornwallis, the new governor-general of India, arrived at Calcutta.

Salisbury-plain, lately an unprofitable waste (Ann. Reg. for 1805, p. 400), now in extensive tracts, presents the most gratifying appearance of cultivation and produce. A few years since there was scarcely an enclosure, or a spot of tillage, for upwards of twenty miles, between Andover and Blandford; the whole of which is now reclaimed, and under various crops of excellent promise.

Aug. 9. Austria joined the coalition.

12. Circus, St. George's-fields, burnt.

15. Grand fête at Stowe, given by the marquis of Buckingham to 400 of the nobility and others. The prince of Wales was present, accompanied by Mr. Fox.

25. Died, in his 62nd year, William Henry duke of Gloucester, next brother to the king, much respected for the virtues of private life. He had married an English lady, and conciliated popular favour by the education of his son in England.

Sept. 9. Gregorian calendar adopted in France.

21. Mr. Blight, a respectable ship-broker of Deptford, while sitting in his parlour, was shot by an unknown person. Mr. Patch, whom he had shortly before admitted to a share in his business, was soon after apprehended, tried, and convicted of the murder.

24. The French emperor left Paris to place himself at the head of his army at Strasburg.

Oct. 5. Died, at Gazeepore, after a long life devoted to the public service, CHARLES MARQUIS CORNWALLIS, governor-general of India. He was provisionally succeeded by the senior member of council, sir George Barlow. The marquis had only arrived in India in July, and had been sent with the view of terminating the wars of conquest waged against the native princes, and adopting towards them a more pacific line of policy than that of his predecessor, the marquis Wellesley. It was the wish of the East India Company, though its purpose was frustrated by the veto of the Board of Control, at which lord Castlereagh presided.

17. Urm capitulated to the emperor Napoleon, by which general Mack and 30,000 Austrians laid down their arms. They were the remains of a veteran army of 90,000. The archduke Ferdinand, at the head of a body of cavalry, alone succeeded in making good his retreat into Bohemia.

This first blow of the war was effected by the masterly tactic combinations of the French emperor, who suddenly invested Ulm, where his opponent lay, apparently spell-bound, without attempting to give battle or retreat. Buonaparte addressed the Austrian officers, and told them he wished for nothing upon the Continent. "France," says he, "desires only ships, colonies, and commerce."

20. Werneck, in Italy, with 15,000 men, surrendered to the French under general Murat.

24. VICTORY OF TRAFALGAR, in which the gallant Nelson fell, like Wolfe, in the moment of victory. The combined French and Spanish fleets, consisting of thirty-three sail of the line, had put to sea from Cadiz, under admirals Villeneuve and Gravina. The English fleet amounted to twenty-seven ships of the line, mostly of the largest rate. About noon the battle began; the signal being—since become a national proverb—"England expects every man to do his duty." In two columns, under Nelson and Collingwood, the British bore down, piercing the enemy's line, when the conflict became furious; but in a couple of hours nineteen ships struck their colours, including the French admiral's and two other flag-ships. The loss of the combined fleets was enormous: the Spanish admiral Gravina was mortally wounded; and Villeneuve, unable to bear his defeat, soon after put an end to himself. The loss of the English, in killed and wounded, amounted to 1589, and, including the hero of the Nile, cast a shade over this brilliant naval achievement.

27. Captain Wright died suddenly, in the Temple. His death has been attributed to the French government, but it had no interest in such a catastrophe (vide p. 659).

Nov. 4. Sir Richard Strachan with four ships, after a spirited fight, captured off Ferrol four French first-rates that had escaped from the battle of Trafalgar.

14. The French entered Vienna. Massena was advancing to the same point from Italy, driving before him the archduke Charles.

26. The stupendous aqueduct of Pont-croix, upon the Ellesmere canal, at the eastern extremity of the romantic vale of Llangollen, opened. It is 1007 feet in length and 127 in height; Mr. Telford the architect.

Dec. 2. BATTLE OF AUSTERLITZ, near Olmutz; the French emperor defeating the Austro-Russian armies, amounting to 80,000 men, commanded by general Kutusoff and prince Lichtenstein. It was called the battle of the "Three Emperors," and was well contested; but 100 pieces of cannon and 30,000 killed, wounded, and prisoners, attested the triumph of Napoleon. An immense number perished in a lake by the ice giving way. Davoust, Lannes, Soult, Berthier, and Murat most distinguished themselves among the French marshals.

6. An armistice concluded at a personal interview, on the high road of Hollitsch, between the emperors of Austria and France; to which the emperor Alexander acceded.

23. Vice-admiral sir Robert Calder tried by a court-martial for not bringing to action a second time the French fleet off Ferrol on the 23rd and 24th of July last, and found guilty of an error of judgment; for which he was sentenced to be reprimanded. Sir Robert was in his 60th year, forty-six of which he had honourably passed in the public service; and he deeply felt the reproach cast upon him.

24. Peace concluded in India with the Mahratta chiefs Holkar and Scindiah.

26. TREATY OF PRESSBURG.—Austria ceded the old Venetian states to the new kingdom of Italy, and acknowledged Buonaparte's new kings of Bavaria and Wirtemberg. The emperor lost in subjects more than 2,700,000 souls, and in revenue, 16,000,000 of florins. The total exclusion from Italy, and the cession of the Tyrolese frontier to Bavaria, were severe strokes upon the political consequence of Austria. Prussia, which had insidiously held back, watching the progress of the campaign, determined for the present to preserve peace with France, and concluded a convention with that power by which Hanover was provisionally exchanged for Anspach, Cleves, and Neufchatel.

There were committed for crimes in England and Wales, 4605; of whom 530 received sentence of death, and 68 executed; and 595 transported.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—William Buchan, M.D., 76, author of the "Domestic Medicine:" he sold the copyright of this popular manual to the booksellers for 700*l.*, and the sale of it produced them that sum annually (Ann. Reg., xlvii. 467). Of nervous fever, Frederick Schiller, the celebrated German poet. Robert Bissett, LL.D., 46, author of a "Life of Burke," &c. Richard Suett, 49, comedian of Drury-lane. Christopher Anstey, 81, author of the "New Bath Guide." At Paris. M. Anquetil du Perron, 73, a distinguished man of letters. Mrs. Crouch, 46, popular singer and actress. M. Chappe, the inventor of the telegraph: he drowned himself in a well from weariness of life.

A.D. 1806. FRENCH WAR WITH PRUSSIA.—The French emperor continued his restless career of change and territorial acquisition. The petty republics which he had essentially contributed to establish during the rage of democracy were converted into monarchies, or annexed to his rapidly-extending empire. His brothers, Joseph and Louis, were placed on thrones, and several of the electors and princes of Germany elevated to regality. By the establishment of the Rhenish Confederacy, of which he was declared protector, the Germanic federation was dissolved, and the emperor Francis publicly renounced his imperial supremacy. Prussia, not being allowed to form a counter-league in the north of Europe, rashly determined to try the fortune of war after her balancing policy between France and the coalition had left her without a single confederate. In a single battle the pride of victories, of military discipline and organization, inherited from Frederick the Great, was laid prostrate. Within a month Prussia was overrun by the French legions, her strongest fortresses surrendered, and her capital entered by the conqueror. Before the close of the campaign Buonaparte had penetrated beyond Warsaw in pursuit of the Russians, and projected the re-establishment of the kingdom of Poland. Domestic events were signalled by the deaths, first of Mr. Pitt, and then, within a few months after, of Mr. Fox; two statesmen who had long divided in a more equal degree the suffrages of the nation than the favour of the crown. A stronger disposition towards a continental peace and the reform of fiscal abuses formed the chief features that distinguished the Grenville ministry from their predecessors. A general election, however, at the end of the year showed that they had no support in the country adequate to supply the absence of the confidence of the court.

Jan. 1. The four vergers of St. Paul's made upwards of £2000. by the admission of the public to see the preparations for the funeral of Lord Nelson; "the doormoney" says the Annual Register, "is taken as at a puppet-show, and amounted for several days to more than 40% for each day."

5. Great hall of Greenwich-hospital thrown open to the public to view the coffin of admiral Nelson.

8. The English, under commodore sir Home Popham and generals sir David Baird and Beresford, obtained possession of the Cape of Good Hope, experiencing little resistance from Janssens, the Dutch governor.

9. The remains of Lord Nelson interred in St. Paul's cathedral: upwards of 160 carriages followed the burial-car: the prince of Wales and royal dukes, both houses of parliament, and the corporation of London, formed part of the procession.

The funeral service was performed by torch-light.

12. An attorney stood in the pillory, in front of Newgate, for defrauding a man of 140*l*. under pretence of getting him a place in the ordnance.

PARLIAMENT opened by the king. Congratulations on naval successes, regrets at the disasters of our allies, and an intimation that one million of the droits of admiralty would be applied to the public service, formed the substance of the royal speech. Intelligence of the dangerous situation of the minister caused the intention of moving an amendment to be abandoned.

20. Sir J. Duckworth captured three French ships of the line, part of a squadron that had escaped from the harbour of Brest.

23. DEATH OF MR. PITT.—The late premier was the second and favourite of three sons of the celebrated earl of Chatham. At an early period he gave earnest of future eminence, and his father used to say that "he would one day increase the glory of the name of Pitt." Till the age of fourteen his education was domestic, the earl himself sedulously co-operating with a private tutor in directing his mind to useful attainments; accustoming him especially to argue logically and harangue with elegance, fluency, and force. Young Pitt was thus nurtured in the arts of statesmanship by one of its first masters. At Cambridge he was conspicuous for classical and mathematical knowledge. He finished his educational course by entering himself student of Lincoln's-inn, and practising as junior-counsel on the western circuit, to which (Ann. Reg. xlix. 794.) he thought of returning in 1803, when out of office, as a brief mode of extrication from poverty. His maiden speech in the house of commons was in defence of Mr. Burke's civil-list reform bill: he also spoke with energy in favour of parliamentary reform, and made three specific motions on the subject; he was even chosen and acted as a delegate in one of the meetings held in Westminster for the furtherance of that measure. As a son of Chatham he eschewed the Rockingham, and attached himself to the Shelburne whigs, under whom he became chancellor of the exchequer at the age of twenty-three. This ministry being dissolved by the coalition of North and Fox, he was thrown into opposition, where he soon showed himself an adept in parliamentary warfare. Dextrously availing himself of the weak points in Mr. Burke's scheme of Indian government, he supplanted the coalitionists with the concurrent approbation of king and people. For seventeen years after—eight of peace and nine of war—he was prime minister of England. The character of his peace administration has been already described (p. 533): it was favourable to fiscal and commercial improvements. In war he was signally unsuccessful; except naval triumphs he did not reap even the melancholy glory of victories. It was for the protraction rather than the commencement of hostilities for which Mr. Pitt seems to have been most justly obnoxious to animadversion. Alarmed by the destructive aspect of the French revolution, excited and misled by inflammatory writings, the war was national at the beginning, and perhaps unavoidable by any minister; but the country might have been withdrawn from the arena in 1795, contemporaneously with Spain and Prussia, and Austria left singly to contend for the restoration of the seigniorial rights of the German princes in Alsace and Lorraine. But the unbending mind of Mr. Pitt would not allow him to terminate hostilities when aimless and hopeless; he had reluctantly entered into them, but having done so he must successfully conclude them; and rather than do otherwise, after they became unpopular, he withdrew from office, on the ground of inability to redeem his pledge to the Catholics of Ireland. Both in the commencement of the war, and in his internal policy, Mr. Pitt was controlled by circumstances. "He perceived the formidable co-operation of external and internal enemies; but the former could not be effectually resisted except by open war, nor the latter without coercive acts of the legislature; and he was persuaded that neither of these expedients, exclusive of his own earnest wish not to have recourse to them, would be approved till their necessity was obvious and incontestible."—(Bishop Tomline's Memoirs of the Life of Pitt, ii. 618.) Upon these points great differences of opinion prevailed, and still continue to divide politicians. The number of republican societies established throughout the empire was very great, and their activity incessant. This appears from the elaborate Report on Seditious Societies of Mr. Secretary Dundas (Ann. Reg. xli. 150), who minutely describes their ramifications through England, Ireland, and Scotland, and their treasonable correspondence with France, through agents established at Hamburg. But notwithstanding the severe and unconstitutional measures to which Mr. Pitt resorted to counteract their machinations, he was a sincere revolution whig of 1688, of a liberal denomination: upon principles of justice and sound policy, he was favourable to every species of domestic reform; there was no abuse in the Church, nor in the revenue department, nor in the laws affecting different religionists, nor even in parliamentary representation, to the removal of which he was not friendly, but he made his principles subordinate to his ambition. This was the ruling passion of his soul, as it was of his father to be at the head of the public administration. For this he lent himself to the bigotry of the court, to the selfish fears of the aristocracy, to dangerous inroads on the constitution, to popular ignorance and delusion, to intriguing and mercenary lawyers, and to the corrupt agencies of a war-faction whom a long course of lavish expenditure raised into an almost irresistible influence. He was obstinate; he was proud and haughty; but these all bent to the love of power. The African slave-trade, parliamentary reform, catholic emancipation, the friends of humanity, the "Friends of the People," and the Grenvilles, were all in turn abandoned or dashed aside if they endangered the possession or blocked up the passage to the treasury. It must have been an ignoble education that taught him to prefer place to principle; ministerial leadership to the glory of national ameliorations. Notwithstanding this suppleness of course, Mr. Pitt possessed great and uncommon endowments. Self-reliance, boldness, loftiness, discreetness, and perseverance, were the qualities that marked the outset and progress of his career. In a period of unexampled trial there was nothing in our political constitution, in finance or currency, in domestic or foreign policy, that he did not fearlessly put to hazard, to triumph in the struggle; evincing a consciousness of strength and rectitude, if not a resoluteness, approaching to hardihood. But though his plans were prosecuted with constancy and vigour, they were often ill conceived, and, from choice of instruments, badly executed. Events attested him to be more a mistaken than successful minister. He cannot be reckoned a great man because he neglected the only foundation upon which true greatness can be established. Public happiness, legislation, morals, science, and literature, owed little to him. He was not even a sagacious statesman, for he neither foresaw the beginning nor the end of the French war, and he conducted and defended it upon grounds irrelevant to its origin and character. His chief gift was eloquence; it was commanding, specious, logical, tasteful, and persuasive. It was, however, more the eloquence of an academician than of genius, of words than thoughts, of ingenious evasions and dexterous suggestions than of solid and original arguments. Its dignified and equable flow, as well as the sarcasm in which he excelled, indicated more of a cold, watchful, and subtle nature, than of generous feeling and noble enthusiasm. Mr. Pitt's voice was powerful and harmonious, constituting his chief exterior accomplishment. His figure was gaunt, his countenance harsh and severe, his action ungraceful and monotonous, his air collegiate, and, often walking with his mouth open, his face did not express the intellectuality of his mind. Save the oratory and statesmanship of this celebrated minister, there is nothing else to delineate. His life had neither spring nor autumn; to the joys of youth and the tranquil retrospections of age he died a stranger. Like the cathedral of Notre Dame to the Hunchback of Victor Hugo, Downing-street became his microcosm, out of which he had no existence. In private life he was improvident, but urbane, convivial, simple in his tastes, and void of ostentation. From the meanness of avarice he was totally free; but, disinterested himself, he was perhaps too slow in suspecting the contrary in some of his colleagues. He died, like admiral Nelson, who shed a parting glory over his public administration, in the 47th year of his age.

26. Buonaparte returned to his capital from Vienna. Paris immediately became a scene of splendid fêtes and rejoicings, on account of the late victories in Germany.

27. Mr. H. Lascelles moved in the house of commons an address to the king, to give directions for the interment of Mr. Pitt in Westminster-abbey, and the erection of a monument to his honour. It was supported by lord Castlereagh, Mr. Rose, and Mr. Wilberforce; opposed by lord Folkstone and Messrs. Fox, W. Smith, Ponsonby, and Windham. The last objected to the phrase "excellent statesman," given to the deceased in the proposed address. For the motion. 258; against it, 89.

31. Leave given to bring in a bill to ascertain the population of Ireland.

Feb. 3. Mr. Calhwright moved that a sum not exceeding 40,000*l.* be granted for the payment of the debts of Mr. Pitt, which was carried without opposition.

4. GRENVILLE MINISTRY.—So much were the strength and credit of the ministry dependent upon Mr. Pitt, that lord Hawkesbury declined the offer of becoming his successor, and it became necessary to make an entire change in the government of the country. The task of forming the new administration was confided to lord Grenville, who with the assent of the king called to his aid Mr. Fox. These leaders, however, could not command more than 150 members of the house of commons (Ann. Reg. xlviii. 22), and, not being cordially supported by the court, they were compelled to strengthen themselves by auxiliaries. For this purpose the Addingtons were incorporated; lord Sidmouth's influence over the king continuing undiminished, and his party considerable both in parliament and the country. Thus the new ministry consisted of three sections of politicians: first, the Grenvilles, consisting of the whig families (the Bentincks excepted) who had been the strenuous supporters of the war, but were favourable to catholic emancipation; secondly, the followers of Mr. Fox, who coincided with the Grenvilles chiefly in the policy of the latter question; thirdly, the Addingtons who were opposed to concession to the Irish catholics, but friendly to external peace and the reform of domestic abuses. Mutual concessions and compromises of opinion became inevitable; questions on which they differed were postponed, and those only on which there was a general agreement were agitated. Upon this basis the government was constituted as follows:—

Lord Howick, First Lord of the Admiralty.

Lord Henry Petty, Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Earl Spencer, Home Secretary.

General Fitzpatrick, Secretary at War.

Mr. Sheridan, Treasurer of the Navy.

Sir Arthur Pigot, Attorney-General.

Sir Samuel Romilly, Solicitor-General.

The first eight formed the cabinet, with the addition of chief justice Ellenborough, who was included as the friend of lord Sidmouth. In Ireland the duke of Bedford was lord lieutenant; Mr. Ponsonby lord chancellor; Mr. Plunkett attorney-general; Mr. Bush solicitor-general; Mr. Curran master of the rolls. Lord Hawkesbury, who had declined the premiership, obtained for himself, just before the new ministry was completed, the valuable sinecure of warden of the cinque-ports. The auditorship of the exchequer not being compatible with lord Grenville's new appointment, an act was passed to qualify him to hold both offices; his lordship not wishing to relinquish a sinecure for life of 4000*l.* a-year for the uncertain office of first lord of the treasury. A third question that originated much party discussion was the admission of the chief justice of England into the cabinet. This was considered an unconstitutional infringement of the independence of the judges, of which there was no precedent since the Revolution, except in the case of lord Mansfield, who, as a cabinet-minister, took an open part as the adviser of the crown.

6. At a meeting of the common-council of London it was moved that a monument be erected in Guildhall to the memony of Mr. Pitt, and the motion carried by a majority of 77 against 71.

8. Sir Francis Burdett having declined opposing Mr. Mainwaring's petition, the latter was declared M.P. for Middlesex.

18. Joseph Buonaparte entered Naples and assumed the sovereignty.

19. An iron bridge over the New-cut, Bristol, fell down and shivered to pieces.

20. Mr. Pitt's body laid in state this day and the next in the Painted Chamber, Westminster.

Mr. Fox, in a note to Talleyrand, apprised him of the offer of a Frenchman to assassinate Buonaparte. It led to some correspondence on the subject of opening a negotiation for peace on the basis of the treaty of Amiens, but ended without any satisfactory conclusion.

22. Mr. Pitt publicly interred in Westminster Abbey: the funeral was thinly attended. Dr. Vincent, the dean, read the service; and the herald, after pronouncing over his grave the titles of the deceased minister, declared non sibi sed patriæ virit.

At the Middlesex sessions the marquis de Chambonas was convicted and sentenced to six months' imprisonment in Newgate for defrauding of several sums of money Bertrand de Moleville, the author of "Memoirs of the French Revolution."

MANAGEMENT OF PIGS.—The following experiment has been made by a gentleman of Norfolk (Annual Register, xlviii. 375). Six pigs of nearly equal weight were put to keeping at the same time, and treated the same as to food and litter for seven weeks. Three of them were left to shift for themselves as to cleanliness; the other three were kept as clean as possible by a man employed for the purpose with a curry-comb and brush. The last consumed in seven weeks fewer peas by five bushels than the other three, yet weighed more when killed by two stone and four pounds upon the average.

24. General Thomas Picton tried in the court of king's bench before lord Ellenborough for ordering, while governor of Trinidad, the torture to be inflicted on Louisa Calderon, a girl eleven years of age, to extort the confession of a theft. The torture employed was that called picketing, consisting of suspension by one wrist, the foot resting on a spike. Defence set up was that the general only acted conformably to the Spanish laws under which the island was governed. The jury found him guilty.

Mar. 3. Debates in both houses of parliament on the cabinet appointment of the chief justice Ellenborough. Resolution of censure negatived without a division in the lords; and by a majority of 222 against 64 in the commons.

7. The skeleton of a crocodile ten feet and a half in length found at Doddridge in Gloucestershire in a solid stratum of limestone twenty feet thick, and embedded fifteen feet below the surface.

13. Two French ships of war, commanded by admiral Linois, captured by sir J. B. Warren.

26. Mr. Fox informed Talleyrand of the readiness of England to treat for peace, but only in concert with Russia.

28. Lord Henry Petty opened, in a perspicuous statement, the Budget. The annual charge of the debt was now upwards of 27,000,000*l*. The requisite supplies were stated at 43,618,472*l*; and among the proposed means was a loan of eighteen millions, and war-taxes to the amount of nineteen millions. The income-tax was raised from one and a half to ten per cent., including all property above 50*l* a-year; and, though highly unpopular, was continued during all the subsequent years of the war. Some salutary regulations were introduced for correcting abuses in the revenue department. There had been a gradual accumulation of undated accounts, amounting, when ministers came into office, to 534 millions. The satisfaction expressed at these economical reforms was only abated by a new impost on pig-iron, the exemption of the funded property of the king from the income-tax, and the additional annuities granted to the royal family.

Apr. 1. The king of Prussia declared himself sovereign of Hanover.

3. Mr. Windham, who had always opposed the volunteer system, brought forward his plan of limited service. He proposed that the infantry should be enlisted for seven years only, with liberty to renew their services for another seven years, receiving an increase of pay. Cavalry and artillery to be enlisted for ten years, the second period six, and the third five years. The plan was strenuously opposed, but passed into a law. Lord Castlereagh said the prosperity of the country was such that ministers "reposed on a bed of roses;" a state of bliss that became the subject of popular caricatures.

5. Richard Patch tried at Horsemonger-lane, for the murder of his partner, Isaac Blight. He was found guilty, as before stated (p. 666), and executed on the 8th, without exciting any commiseration from the aggravated nature of his offence. He was in his 38th year, and obdurately refused to confess, though he did not deny his crime.

General Miranda sailed from New York to the Spanish main with 360 adventurers of different nations.

18. American congress passed a mon-impoverished the English manufactures, and caused the imprisonment of thousands of natives, and other violations of their natural rights.

CHARGES AGAINST MARQUIS WELLESLEY.—Mr. Paul, a gentleman who had recently returned from India, made several attempts in the course of the parliamentary session to establish charges of mal-administration against the late governor-general. On the 22nd he stated the heads of the charges he intended to bring forward. They chiefly referred to the system of territorial acquisition and wasteful expenditure in which lord Wellesley had indulged, in his Indian government, from 1798 to 1805. During this period the assets of the Company had increased from twelve to thirty-one millions. But the profitable results of the impeachment of Mr. Hastings deterred all parties, and even the attempt, from encouraging a similar mode of procedure. Mr. Paul, whose temper was every way suitable to the arduous task he had undertaken, persevered, however, till his death in his hopeless task.

28. Lord Howick moved for, and obtained an increase of pay, for seamen.

29. Trial of lord Melville, by impeachment of the commons, began in Westminster-hall.

May 12. First stone laid of Hallybury-college, near Hertford, for the education of the civil servants of the East India Company.

Parliament granted to earl Nelson, brother of the late gallant admiral, and his heirs, 5000*l.* per annum, and 120,000*l.* to purchase a family estate.

29. The king directed an inquiry into the conduct of the princess of Wales. About two months after, the commission of inquiry made its report to the effect that the alleged pregnancy and delivery of the princess had been disproved.

June 5. Louis Buonaparte, a younger brother of Napoleon, elected king of Holland.

10. ABOLITION OF SLAVE TRADE.—Sir Arthur Pigott, having previously introduced a bill restraining this iniquitous traffic, Mr. Fox moved a resolution, "That this house, conceiving the African slave-trade to be contrary to the principles of justice, humanity, and sound policy, will, with all practicable expedition, proceed to take effectual measures for abolishing the said trade in such manner and at such period as may seem advisable." On a division, the resolution was carried by 114 against 15. On the motion of lord Grenville, the lords concurred in the same resolution by a majority of 41 to 20. But it was not till the next session that this protracted labour of humanity was consummated by an act of parliament.

12. Lord Melville acquitted of the charges brought against him, the substance of which has been before stated (p. 622). The number of peers voting was 135.

27. Buenos Ayres taken possession of by sir Home Popham. The armament for this enterprise had been fitted out at the Cape of Good Hope, without any authority from the government at home; but the gallant commodore was so elated with his success, that he immediately despatched a circular to England, stating that a whole continent had been opened to British commerce.

The tyrannical conduct of Dessalines, the self-constituted emperor of Hayti, having excited an insurrection, in which he was killed, Christophe, who had been a negro slave, and by trade a tailor, succeeded to the supreme power.

July 4. VICTORY OF MAINDA.—A British force, commanded by sir John Stuart, consisting of 5000 men, landed at Euphemia, to co-operate with the duke of Calabria and the Neapolitans. The French were 7000 strong, and commanded by general Regnier. Confident in his strength, and sure of success, the French commander descended from his position and commenced the attack, but when the bayonets crossed he was undeceived; his line, immediately giving way, abandoned the field, and were pursued with great slaughter. This victory yielded the British army, however, nothing more solid than glory; for, the enemy being reinforced, sir John Stuart was compelled to retire to Sicily.

10. An alarming mutiny broke out among the native troops in India at Vellore. It chiefly rose from an alteration in the shape of the turban, and an apprehension of the sepoys that they would be compelled to become christians. It was suppressed by a regiment of dragoons, who cut down 600 of them, and shot 200 more.

12. CONFEDERATION OF THE RHINE formed, and the French emperor declared its protector: it consisted of the kings of Bavaria and Wirtemberg, the elector of Baden, the archbishop of Ratisbon, the landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt, the grand duke of Berg, and other German princes, who renounced their connexion with the Germanic empire, and appointed a diet at Frankfort to conduct their common concerns. Upon news of this association the emperor of Austria renounced the iron crown, and absolved the electors and princes of the empire from the duties which, as imperial chief, he had a right to demand.

20. Peace between France and Russia signed at Paris; but Alexander refused to rarity, &c. of the seal, and that D'Ossun had concealed his last designs.

Sept. 11. Medrim summoned by Emmanuel at Paris, and to which he put various questions: the substance of the answers obtained were, that the Jews allowed of polygamy, divorce, and marriage with other sects, but varied by laws.

Sept. 12. Spaniards retake Buenos Ayres.

26. General abhorrence excited by Buonaparte causing a bookseller named Palm, of Nuremberg, to be shot for vending a book reflecting on his government. Napoleon ordered 6000 copies of the iniquitous sentence on Palm to be distributed to deter others from the like offence.

Sept. 12. DEATH OF LORD THURLOW.—Edward Thurlow was one of three sons of the vicar of Ashfield in Suffolk, to whom the father used to say that a good education was all he could afford to give them, and their success in life must depend on the use they made of it. About Edward he felt no apprehension, being convinced that he would "fight his way," which he did very unscrupulously. An accidental brief he obtained in the great Douglas cause brought him into notice at the bar; and a strong and acute, but coarse mind, much assurance, with great laxity of principle, did the rest. He and Wedderburn, as solicitor and attorney-general were the chief supporters of Lord North in the house of commons, during the disastrous American war. As a personal friend of the king, Thurlow retained the great seal during the short ministry of the marquiss of Rockingham. Under an outer-crust of blunt honesty and seeming independence, he concealed a great deal of selfish cunning, suppleness, and intrigue. By brow-beating the duke of Grafton, whom he called the "accident of an accident," and other great lords, he made himself popular with the people, and perhaps with George III., who used to wink at his immoralities for the sake of his servility, though the king refused the same indulgence to Mr. Fox, who was not so dexterous a courtier. His double practices were however detected, pending the settlement of the regency, in 1788; when it was discovered that the tory chancellor, to keep his office, had been secretly intriguing with the whig heir-apparent. This appears to have damaged Thurlow in the estimation of the king, who consented to part with him, at the instance of Mr. Pitt, in 1792. "Your friend, lord Thurlow," said lord North to a gentleman known to the chancellor, "thinks that his personal influence with the king authorises him to treat Mr. Pitt with l'ameur. Take my word for it, whenever Mr. Pitt says to the king, 'Sir, the great seal must be in other hands, the king will take the great seal from Thurlow, and never think any more of him." (Law Magazine, vii. 76.) Even so, lord chancellor Thurlow was dismissed, and no more heard of in public life. He died after two days' illness at Brighton in his 72nd or 75th year, leaving no reputation beyond that of a successful political lawyer. He was never married, but he left three illegitimate daughters, to two of whom he bequeathed 70,000*l.* each, and to the third, who had displeased him by marriage, 50*l.* a month, so long as she lived apart from her husband. He had a son by a dean's daughter, but he died before reaching manhood. For his brothers Thurlow procured rich church preferments; one of his nephews, a minor, succeeded to his title and estate; and another he gave the clerkship of the Exchequer in chancery, a sinecure worth 900*l.* a-year. He was the last of the four law-lords whose deaths have been recorded in the present reign, who by industry and subtlety acquired peerages and large possessions, but which, by a singular coincidence, they failed to transmit to direct heirs. Dunning's title (Ashburton) expired in the first generation; that of Mansfield, Rosslyn (Wedderburn), and Thurlow, descended to collaterals.

13. DEATH OF MR. FOX.—This eminent and much-respected statesman expired at Chiswick-house, where he had thrice within five weeks undergone an operation for the dropsy. He was in his 59th year, and the second son of Henry first lord Holland, long the opponent of the first earl of Chatham, and whose pecuniary conduct as paymaster of the forces at one time formed the subject of popular animadversion (Ann. Reg. xi. 139). Mr. Fox, like his rival, the late premier, gave early indications of superior capacity; and like him was carefully educated for political life. Both these distinguished men began their career in the steps of their progenitors; but crossed in their course, one deviating into the courtly minister, and the other into the popular leader. Natural disposition was too strong for the paternal impulse; and the close ambition of Mr. Pitt threw him as aptly into royal favour as the ardent and ingenuous mind of Fox into the ranks of the people. While acting under the influence of his tory father Mr. Fox both spoke and voted against Wilkes. He soon, however, dropped into his congenial element, as the advocate of freedom. He supported Sir William Meredith's bill to give relief from subscription to the 39 Articles, and steadily opposed the war with the American colonies. It was the fetters of party that enchained his mind; and to the expediency of faction he sacrificed political rectitude. He coalesced with lord North to supplant the Shelburnes in authority; and on the question of the regency, in 1788, advocated a sort of tory doctrine of indefeasible right to the full exercise of the executive power by the prince of Wales, in which he was neither supported by constitutional analogy, a majority of the house of commons, nor of the people. Mr. Fox belonged to the Corinthian order of politicians (Butler's Reminiscences), and was averse to any organic changes in the constitution that might endanger the monopoly of power by the great families. He was probably more inimical to parliamentary reform than Mr. Pitt; and it was only when he despaired of shaking Pitt's ministry by any party combination that he made his peace with Horne Tooke, and avowed himself favourable to a change in the national representation. Mr. Fox entered public life among the aristocracy, lived, and had his being among the order; and with them closed his career. It was by their prevailing influence against the crown that he twice became minister; and by them he was supported throughout. In power he had always their interest in view; of which the patronage he sought to obtain them by his oligarchical India bill was an instance. He supported the property-tax, on the principle that men ought, as far as possible, to be retained in the stations which they once occupied; and that it is quite as reasonable the lower orders should want as that the higher should be deprived of their usual enjoyments. On the breaking out of the French revolution he took a firm and fearless part; but it is likely he undervalued the temporary suffering, and even danger, of that great social fever, though he did not over-estimate its lasting benefits. In the Grenville ministry he had too brief and limited a share to be accountable for its measures; for he began to feel in March the approach of the malady that terminated his existence. The acquirements of Mr. Fox were more classical than scientific. Political economy and finance he did not profess to understand; though in one of his speeches he helped to bring into public notice the "Wealth of Nations," by referring to Dr. Smith, whose works were as little known at the time as those of Bentham many years subsequently. Mr. Fox was probably not much behind his contemporaries on economical subjects; for, though the prosperity of the empire mainly depended on its capital and industry, the laws that regulate them had not generally fixed the attention of statesmen. He was well acquainted with mankind from mingling freely in society. He thoroughly understood the political history of the country and its constitution, as settled at the revolution of 1688, according to which the executive ought always to be kept subordinate to a parliamentary majority, and which would have been a safe enough guarantee of the public weal, and that majority represented the national interests. Mr. Fox was an orator of the first and best class. His eloquence was argumentative, forcible, sententious, and unpremeditated; it was genuine, the eloquence of conviction, of a warm, just, and noble nature. Mr. Fox was a votary of pleasure. "Indolence," Mr. Nicholls says, "was his sultana queen." A kind, open, and generous heart, procured him many and attached friends; and as he had never much to reward them with, privately or politically, it is likely they were disappointed.

18. Bank of England declared a half-yearly dividend of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and a bonus of 5 per cent., besides paying the property-tax.

24. Buonaparte left Paris to place himself at the head of his army; the chastisement of Prussia being determined upon, who had long pursued a dubious course of policy, which left her singly, while engaged in hostilities with England, to contend against her powerful antagonist.

Oct. 4. Died, in his 73rd year, Samuel Horsley, bishop of St. Asaph, a prelate of great classical and mathematical acquirements, and an stringent theological controversialist. He was patronised by lord Thurlow, on the ground that those "who defend the church ought to be supported by the church." Dr. Horsley had gone to visit his old friend at Brighton, whom he found dead, and seems not to have long survived.

6. Negotiations for peace between France and Britain terminated, the latter requiring that Russia should be a party. The subscribers at Lloyd's gave a shout of exultation on receipt of the news of the failure of lord Lauderdale's pacific mission.

8. The following ministerial changes had taken place: viscount Howick succeeded the late Mr. Fox in the foreign secretaryship; Thomas Grenville became first lord of the admiralty; viscount Sidmouth lord president of the council; lord Holland privy seal; and George Young, who, with Mr. Francis, had at first been unaccountably left out of the ministry, was placed at the head of the India board.

10. Mr. Fox publicly interred in Westminster Abbey: his body was deposited immediately adjoining the monument of and Chatham, and within eighteen inches of the grave of Mr. Pitt.

14. BATTLE OF JENA.—After a variety of skilful movements, the French emperor had succeeded in turning the left of the Prussians, and placing himself between their main force and Berlin and Dresden. A general engagement became unavoidable. The French were posted along the Saale from Naumburg to Kahla, their centre being at Jena. The Prussians, under prince Ferdinand, were ranged between Jena, Auerstadt, and Weimar. On the morning of the battle a thick fog covered the ground; but about nine the sun shone out, when the fronts of both armies were found almost within musket-shot. Immediately about 250,000 men, with 700 pieces of cannon, were employed in mutual destruction. Courage and discipline on each side were nearly equal; but the French evinced superior military science. The seasonable arrival on the ground of Augereau, at the head of some of the regiments of Austerlitz, seconded by a brilliant charge of Murat's cuirassiers, completed the business of the day. Napoleon, from the height where he stood, saw the fight in all directions of the Prussians, and the French cavalry taking them by thousands. More than 20,000 Prussians were killed or wounded, and 40,000 taken prisoners, with 300 cannons. Prince Ferdinand died of his wounds. A panic seized the garrisons, and all the principal towns of Prussia, west of the Oder, surrendered to the enemy soon after the battle almost without resistance. The king, who is said to have been urged by the queen rashly to engage in the war, withdrew to Königsberg.

19. Parliament dissolved by proclamation.

25. Bonaparte entered Berlin. While in the Prussian capital he received a deputation from the French senate, complimenting him on his wonderful successes, but recommending peace.

30. Thirteen ships of the Jamaica fleet, of 109 sail, founder at sea.

31. Mr. Sheridan and sir S. Hood, in opposition to Mr. Paul, returned for Westminster; Sir F. Burdett and Mr. Byng for Middlesex; sir Charles Price, Sir W. Curtis, H. C. Combe, and J. Shaw, for the city of London.

Nov. 8. The strong fortress of Magdeburg, with a garrison of 22,000 men, capitulated to marshal Ney.

10. Died at Altona, of the wounds received at Jena, Ferdinand duke of Brunswick, father-in-law of the prince of Wales. He commanded the Prussians in 1792, and promulgated the indiscreet manifesto of that year. Bonaparte would not suffer the remains of the duke to be deposited in the vault of his ancestors.

12. A new institution, the "Refuge for the Destitute," opened at Hackney.

19. Mortier entered Hamburg, and sequestered all English property.

21. BERLIN DECREE.—This decree was the commencement of what was termed the continental system, in which Bonaparte declared the British islands to be in a state of blockade; all British subjects found in countries occupied by the French troops prisoners of war; all English property lawful prize; commerce in all British produce and manufactures prohibited; and all vessels touching at England or any English colony excluded from every harbour under the control of France. These infringements of national law the emperor justified on the ground that England had extended the right of maritime blockade to places not actually invested, and insisted that the law should be the same by sea as on land.

23. The Russians entered Moldavia and Wallachia, which occasioned a war with the Turks.

28. The French entered Warsaw.

Dec. 19. Three horses poisoned near Oundle, by eating the fibres of a yew-tree.

MEETING OF THE NEW PARLIAMENT.—The returns to the new parliament had increased, though not equal to expectation, the power of ministers in the house of commons. The whig party, which had been driven out of Yorkshire in 1784, recovered one of the seats for that great county. In Norfolk, after a hard contest, both members returned were whigs. In Liverpool they carried one seat against the slave interest; but in Southwark and Norwich they lost one each; and, by an attack of sir Francis Burdett on the memory of Mr. Fox, a seat for Middlesex was lost to the ministry. In both houses the ministerial addresses were carried without a division.

26. Battle of Pultusk, in which the French, under Lannes and Davoust, were roughly handled by the Russians, under general Bennigsen.

31. Treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, signed with the United States of America.

In this year Dr. Gall, a German, started a new theory concerning the brain, which he called craniology.

A large sarcophagus was brought from Egypt, supposed to be the tomb of Alexander the Great.

Committed for crimes in England and Wales, 4346; of whom 325 received sentence of death, 522 were transported, and 57 executed.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—James Barry, R.A., 65, an historical painter of merit, but whose eccentric genius had defeated the patronising kindness of Mr. Burke and his brother Richard towards him. Mrs. Carter, 89, translator of Epictetus. David earl of Macartney, chiefly known from his splendid embassy to China. Rev. John Brand, M.A., 63, author of "Popular Antiquities." Mrs. Anne Yearaley, a self-instructed votary of the muses, under the name of the "Milkwoman of Bristol." Mrs. Charlotte Smith, an elegant sonneteer, and author of some superior novels. John Buckley, 73, the last of the Muggletonians; a religious sect that originated in Cromwell's time.

A. D. 1807. STATE OF PARTIES.—A prominent feature in the domestic state of the country was a growing distrust of the political factions which had heretofore divided the national suffrages. The reputation of the Pitt party for public integrity had been impaired by the malversations of lord Melville. If they were not peculators themselves, they were regarded by the public as the abettors of peculation, by seeking to screen the accused from punishment. The impression left by this affair was heightened by subsequent discoveries. It was found that the public accounts had been left unaudited for years, and that De Lancey and others were defaulters to a large amount. Some hope, therefore, was entertained that a check at least would be put to fiscal abuses by the whig ministry. But there was little enthusiasm in their favour. Popular feeling, indeed, of any sort had entirely evaporated. The violence engendered by the French revolution had long since spent its fury, and had given place to general indifference on political subjects that did not directly affect the public purse, or concern the naval glory of the kingdom. But while the Grenville ministry could not reckon on the ardent support of the country, they had to contend against the secret disinclination of the court, and the active hostility of the veteran officials they had displaced. None of this party was eminent for talent or experience after the death of Mr. Pitt, but they controlled a powerful machinery. Many of the public journals were under their influence; and, from long practice in the art of governing opinion through the press, they perfectly understood how to work that formidable engine to the best advantage (Ann. Reg. xlviii. 33). They had intimate connexions in the city, in the bank, in the India-house, and in most of the municipal and trading corporations, and were able to give an impulse to these bodies whenever it suited their purposes. In all the public offices and departments the subalterns and clerks were indebted to the ex-ministers for their places; and it was by their return to office they chiefly anticipated further preferment. These obstacles might have been overcome by a popular course of administration. But the Grenvilles disappointed public expectation; and, at the time of the death of Mr. Fox, the little confidence with which it had commenced was greatly diminished. Neither peace had been obtained nor the war vigorously prosecuted. The minor imputations against them were the acquittal of lord Melville—a disinclination to investigate the charges against the marquis Wellesley—the increase of the income-tax—the admission of the chief justice of England to a seat in the cabinet—the retention of the auditorship of the exchequer by the first lord of the treasury—and a general eagerness, hardly exceeded by their predecessors, after the emoluments of the government. Hence their removal from office excited little regret, and the accession of the Portland ministry no hope. A war of recrimination and reciprocal exposure that followed the change of ministries helped still further to establish a public opinion independent of the rival parties. "Beware of popery and the encroachments of powerful families on the prerogatives of the crown!" exclaimed one faction. "Beware of the artifices of subtle courtiers and time-serving lawyers!" exclaimed the other: each accused the other of seeking the offices of government, not to serve the country, but to advance their interests and that of their dependents. The people appeared well disposed to believe both. Both parties, the Outs and the Ins, as they now began to be familiarly called, had so uniformly embarrassed government when it was not in their own hands, and yet so uniformly taken the opportunity of deserting the cause they had professed to maintain, that the people at large lost all confidence in public men. The effect of this change of public sentiment was strikingly evinced in the general election of the current year. The representation of the city of Westminster had always been considered the appropriate function of one or the other faction; but the independent electors united and determined to rid themselves of the domination of both. Sir F. Burdett and lord Cochrane became popular by disclaiming all attachment to all parties, and declaring their wishes to overturn abuses and nothing but abuses; to look only to the measures of men, not to their persons and connexions. Their election for Westminster was a complete triumph over aristocratic dictation and all factions whatever. It was the rise of a THIRD PARTY in the state, whose struggles continued for thirty years after, and have not yet terminated.

Jan. 2. Lord Greyville explained in the upper house the grounds of the rupture of the late negotiations with France. His lordship contended that the only proper basis of peace between the two countries was that of actual possession; since England being a great maritime, and France a great continental power, there could be no cession between them that could lead to permanent advantage. A similar discussion ensued in the lower house. Mr. Percival blamed ministers for protracting the negotiations, as no peace worth acceptance could be concluded with France so long as her councils were directed by Talleyrand and Buonaparte.

7. An order of council issued in retaliation of Buonaparte's Berlin decree, prohibiting the trade of neutrals from any one port to another, both being in possession of France or her allies.

Lord Minto sworn in governor-general of India, and general Hewitt commander-in-chief of the Company's forces.

28. Peace concluded with Prussia.

FREEHOLD ESTATES BILL.—Sir Samuel Romilly, on the 28th, moved the house of commons for leave to bring in a bill for making the freehold estates of persons dying indebted, assets for the payment of simple contract debts. As the law stood a person might contract debts to any amount not evidenced by bond or other special instrument, yet dying with property amply sufficient to satisfy these demands, his estate would pass to the heir-at-law, or by testamentary assignment it might pass to a stranger, and his creditors remain unpaid. The bill passed a second reading, but was thrown out on the third.

29. Lord Henry Petty introduced his new plan of finance. Its leading feature was to raise a loan for the present and future years of the war without any addition to the public burdens, by mortgaging the war-taxes. These taxes were to be pledged at the rate of ten per cent. for each loan, five per cent. for interest, and five per cent. as an accumulating sinking-fund to pay off the principal. It excited much discussion, and the resolutions embodying the minister's scheme were favourably received.

Feb. 2. Monte Video taken by assault by the English under sir Samuel Auchmuty.

5. The bill for the abolition of the African slave-trade passed a second reading in the lords by a majority of 100 to 36. It was supported by the duke of Gloucester, lords Holland, King, and Rosslyn; opposed by the duke of Clarence, and lords Morton, St. Vincent, Eldon, Westmorland, Hawkesbury, and Sidmouth; the last recommending a preliminary moral and religious instruction of the slaves.

8. Battle of Eylau between the French under Buonaparte and the Russians under Bennigsen. The slaughter was dreadful; about 40,000 on both sides killed and wounded, and neither could claim the victory. The Russians retired behind the Pregel, and the French on the Vistula, abandoning their design on Königsberg.

23. Holloway and Haggerty executed at the Old Bailey for the murder of Mr. Steele on Hounslow-heath, November 6th, 1802. They had been convicted on the 20th, on the evidence of an accomplice, and to the last protested their innocence. They were hardened offenders of infamous character, and little doubt could exist of their guilt. An immense crowd attended the execution, and a riot breaking down in the midst, caused a fatal pressure; twenty-eight persons were trampled to death, and many others dreadfully hurt.

CONDITION OF THE POOR.—On the 23rd instant Mr. Whitbread brought forward his plan in the house of commons for encouraging industry and relieving the poor. He expressed his concurrence in the principles of Mr. Malthus, and his conviction of the tendency of the poor-laws to deteriorate the condition of the labouring classes (Ann. Reg. xlix. 134). From returns made up in 1803, it appeared that upon a population in England and Wales of 8,870,000 not less than 1,234,000 were partakers of parochial relief; that is, nearly one-seventh part of the people was indebted to the other six, wholly or in part, for support. Mr. Whitbread's undertaking was very extensive. Its main principle was to exalt the character of the industrious orders; to give them consequence in their own eyes; to excite them to acquire property by the prospect of tasting its sweets; to render dependent poverty degrading in their estimation, and at all times less desirable than independent industry. For the attainment of these issues he proposed a system of national education by the establishment of parochial schools; not compulsory on the poor, which would destroy their object, but voluntary. The bill for this purpose fell to the ground, partly from a change of administration, and was finally thrown out of the lords, August 11th, on the motion of lord Hawkesbury.

Mar. 1. Sir John Duckworth repassed the Dardanelles, not having succeeded in his coercive mission to detach the Porte from the interests of France. About 250 men were killed and wounded in this enterprise; and the English, as they repassed the castles, were assailed by the fire of vast blocks of marble, one of which, weighing 800 pounds, cut in two the mainmast of the Windsor man of war.

5. Lord Howick introduced a bill for removing religious tests in the army and navy, and assimilating the practice in England to that already existing in Ireland. It was strenuously opposed by Mr. Perceval as endangering the church-establishment and opening the door to popery; and he strongly expressed his apprehensions of that "spirit of innovation which was stealing in by degrees." Bill read a first time.

6. Sir Home Popham sentenced to be reprimanded for withdrawing, without authority, the king's naval force from the Cape of Good Hope for the attack on Buenos Ayres.

13. Surrey canal-basin, Rotherhithe, opened for shipping.

18. Religious test bill postponed.

20. Alexandria in Egypt taken possession of by British troops under general Fraser.

25. Royal assent given to the bill for the abolition of the slave-trade.

PORTLAND MINISTRY.—The ministers first tried to modify lord Howick's bill so as to adapt it to the king's scruples without destroying its essence. Failing in this attempt they agreed to abandon the bill altogether; but at the same time, in vindication of their own characters, to insert in the proceedings of the cabinet a minute reserving to lord Grenville and lord Howick,—1st, the liberty of delivering their opinions in favour of the catholic question; 2nd, that of submitting this question, or any connected with it, from time to time, to his majesty's decision (Ann. Reg. xlix. 141). The ministers were called upon not only to withdraw the latter reservation, but to substitute in its place a written obligation pledging themselves never again to bring forward the measure, or to propose anything connected with the catholic question. Conceiving such an engagement inconsistent with their principles and their duty, and having communicated their sentiments to the king, they received next day their dismissal. Their successors were the following:—

Duke of Portland, First Lord of the Treasury.

Earl Westmorland, Lord Privy-Seal.

Mr. Canning, Foreign Secretary.

Lord Hawkesbury, Home Secretary.

Earl Camden, President of the Council.

Lord Mulgrave, First Lord of the Admiralty.

Earl Bathurst, President of the Board of Trade.

Mr. Dundas, President of the India Board.

Mr. G. Rose, Treasurer of the Navy.

26. NEW PARLIAMENT OPENED.—This day was looked forward to with considerable interest: the passions of the people had been excited, and their prejudices inflamed, by the cry of "No Popery!" Both the Ins and Outs tried to muster in great force. The opposition had a grand dinner in Willis's-rooms, at which 180 lords and commoners were present. The electors of Westminster also escorted their champion, sir Francis Burdett, in grand procession from his house in Piccadilly to the Crown and Anchor, where he dined with 1,000 of his friends. The divisions on the addresses soon attested the strength of parties: in the lords the ministerial address was carried by 160 to 67; in the commons by 350 to 155.

July 2. A proclamation issued by president Jefferson, owing to the affair of the Chesapeake, prohibits British ships of war from entering the American harbours.

A negotiation ensued between general Liniers, commander of the Spaniards, and the English general, which terminated in the withdrawal of the British armament from the La Plata. General Whitelocke's conduct became the subject of inquiry by a court-martial.

7. TREATY OF TILSIT concluded between France and Russia, the terms of which chiefly referred to their allies. The German territories of Prussia were restored to her, but her acquisitions in Poland were created into the duchy of Warsaw, under the protection of the new king of Saxony. Alexander agreed to acknowledge the rest of Buonaparte's kings and the confederation of the Rhine. Napoleon undertook to mediate a peace between the Porte and Russia; Alexander having undertaken to mediate between France and England, or, in the event of his mediation being refused, to shut his ports against British commerce. All the ports of Prussia were to be closed against England till a general peace.

11. CURIOUS CASE.—At Surrey assizes a man was tried for a rape on the wife of a publican of Guildford. It seems the accused had clandestinely, and in the dark, in the absence of the husband, introduced himself into the wife's bed, who did not discover the deception till after the intruder had completed his purpose. The learned judge, sir James Mansfield, said this could not amount to ravishment. The woman, by her own evidence, was consenting to the act, although her consent was fraudulently obtained, as she acted under the impression that it was her husband who was in bed with her. He consequently directed the jury to acquit of the capital charge, which they did. The prisoner was indicted and found guilty of an assault.

14. Parliament prorogued by commission.

Sept. 2. ATTACK ON COPENHAGEN.—The expediency of this unexpected enterprise against a neutral power long formed a topic of ardent debate. It was undertaken to prevent the Danish fleet falling into the hands of the French, which was supposed by the English minister to be highly probable, now their influence had become paramount in the north of Europe. The expedition consisted of a fleet of twenty-seven sail of the line and 20,000 land-forces, under the command of admiral Gambier and lord Cathcart. The Danes were wholly unprepared for the attack, and the only alternatives offered to them were the prompt surrender of their fleet to the British, on the assurance that it should be restored to them at the conclusion of the war with France—or the bombardment of their capital. The first proposition being rejected, a tremendous fire was opened on Copenhagen. The cathedral, many public edifices and private houses were destroyed, with the sacrifice of 2000 lives. "From the 2nd of September until the evening of the 5th," says Admiral Gambier in his dispatch, "the conflagration was kept up in different places, when a considerable part of the city being consumed, and the remainder threatened with speedy destruction, the general commanding the garrison sent out a flag of truce, desiring an armistice, to afford time to treat for a capitulation." This being arranged, the British army took possession of the citadel and dock yards, and the British admiral of the shipping, consisting of eighteen ships of the line, fifteen frigates, and some brigs and gun-boats, which he agreed, upon the part of his government, to deliver up when a general pacification should take place.

30. Louis XVIII. landed at Yarmouth under the title of the Count de Lille.

TRoubles in SPAIN.—An extraordinary manifesto issued by Charles IV. of Spain against his son, the prince of Asturias (afterwards Ferdinand VII.), charging him with a conspiracy against his life and crown. The ground of this charge was a clandestine proposal made by the prince to the French emperor to marry one of his nieces. By the interposition of the Prince of Peace (Godoy, the favourite of the queen of Spain and of her imbecile husband, and originally a private in the guards), the father and son were reconciled. Soon after the treaty of Fontainebleau was concluded between the sovereigns of France and Spain, by which Portugal was to be invaded and partitioned, because of her refusal to enforce the continental system of Napoleon by the exclusion of British commerce. This arrangement was the pretext for the introduction of French troops into the peninsula, and the commencement of many and important occurrences in subsequent years.

31. Russia issued a declaration annulling all connexion with England, and reviving the principles of the armed neutrality.

1802. SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.—The extraordinary events in the Peninsula made it the centre of political interest. Portugal deserted by her government, and Spain betrayed, the people of each rose in arms in defence of the national independence, endangered by weakness, treachery, and violence. The strange events in Spain chiefly concentrated public attention. Dissensions had arisen in the royal family, occasioned by the sway of a favourite, who for twenty years had governed the kingdom, and whose ascendancy had at length excited the jealousy of the heir-apparent. All the parties referred the arbitrament of their differences to the French emperor. Subtle, ambitious, bound by no principle, and intoxicated by success in every undertaking, Buonaparte sought to make the most of his umpireship. In lieu of awarding the prize to any of the disputants, he first inveigled them all into his power; then, under the mockery of an assignment, seized the crown of Spain for himself, which he placed on the head of his brother Joseph, transferred from the throne of Naples expressly to receive it, and whose place was filled by his brother-in-law Murat. Europe was indignant and Spain furious at these acts of perfidy and usurpation. Disowning the engagements of their princes and nobles, the Spanish people flew to arms; the military sympathised with the populace; those governors and generals whose patriotism was suspected or unknown they deposed or massacred. Success attending their first efforts at resistance, they were joined by the middle ranks; provincial juntas were formed, afterwards consolidated into a central or supreme junta, and before the end of summer the entire Peninsula, from Oporto to Saragossa, was in a state of organised insurrection against the French power. Portugal was freed from the invaders by the British victory of Vimiera. The interest felt in these stirring scenes rendered domestic occurrences of little consideration. All parties united in wishes for the success of the Spanish cause, though some, from misgivings of its ultimate triumph, were less hearty in their co-operation. In parliament the session was chiefly spent in rhetorical displays on the policy and character of the expedition to Copenhagen, and debates on the orders in council, issued to counteract the anti-commercial decrees of France.

23. A great part of Bristol inundated by the overflowing of the Frome.

Lord Castlereagh's plan was adopted for establishing a local militia of 200,000 men, to be trained for twenty-eight days annually. A clause was introduced into the mutiny act to permit men to enlist for life, contrary to Mr. Wyndham's scheme of limited service.

May 2. A furious insurrection at Madrid, occasioned by the departure of the royal family for Bayonne, and the liberation from confinement of Godoy by command of the French emperor. The whole population of the capital was engaged against 10,000 French troops, with Murat at their head, and a dreadful carnage ensued, terminating in the defeat of the insurgents, and the disarming of the city. After order was restored a military tribunal was instituted, and several hundreds of peasants, who had taken part in the riot, were barbarously shot.

5. INTRIGUES AT BAYONNE.—By great weakness on one side, and various subtle contrivances on the other, the entire royal family of Spain, along with Godoy, was congregated at Bayonne to wait the decision of Buonaparte. The queen, in a transport of rage, accusing Ferdinand of treason against his father, said, "I tell you to your face that you are my son, but not the son of the king; and yet without having any other right to the crown than that of your mother, you have sought to tear it from us by force." Charles IV. reproached the prince with being the author of the revolt in the capital, and threatened him and his adherents with the punishment of traitors if he did not instantly sign an abdication of the throne he had usurped. Ferdinand replied that he "had never intentionally offended his father, and that if his happiness, or that of the nation required it, he was ready to resign the crown." "Go and do so," rejoined the king. During this altercation Napoleon was present; and before the scene concluded Charles twice ran to Godoy the adjoining room to report the proceedings. Next day, the 6th, Ferdinand signed his abdication of the crown; and no sooner was his father in possession of this instrument than he hastened to avail himself of it by transferring all his rights to Buonaparte, on the two conditions, that the integrity of the kingdom should be maintained, and the Roman-catholic should be the only religion tolerated. A few days after the king and queen of Spain, with Godoy, set off for Fontainebleau; and Ferdinand, without parade or seeming repugnance, to Valencay, where he was received on his arrival by Talleyrand, the proprietor of the mansion. The ex-king amused himself with hunting, of which, like most of the Bourbons, he was passionately fond; and the young prince with embroidering petticoats for the Virgin Mary. Meanwhile, the Spaniards, enraged at the unprincipled intrigues of the French, and unmindful of the example of their degenerate princes and nobles, prepared for a gallant resistance; in two months the whole country was up, from Cadiz to St. Sebastian.

MISSION TO SWEDEN.—In the course of this month an English armament of 12,000 men arrived at Gottenburg to co-operate with his Swedish majesty, who adhered with desperate fidelity to his engagements with this country. The British general, Sir John Moore, forthwith proceeded to Stockholm to concert measures with the king, whom he found bent on the invasion of Norway. This wild project not agreeing with Sir John's instructions, and the monarch becoming irritated by opposition, the English general found it necessary, to avoid arrest, to escape in disguise. Finding nothing was to be done in this quarter he returned to England without landing a man in Sweden. The infuriated prince soon after committed the political error of disbanding 4000 of his guards on the pretext of want of zeal in the war against Russia.

June 4. The patriots of Cadiz having killed the governor Solano, compelled, in concert with admiral Collingwood, the French fleet in the harbour, consisting of five ships of the line, with 4000 seamen and marines, to surrender.

15. Palafox gallantly repulsed the French in an attack on Saragossa. The defence of this place was one of the most remarkable events of the war; for having no fortifications, except the old Moorish battlements, the conflict was carried on from street to street, and house to house. The most desperate courage was displayed by the women; and, after three months of unavailing efforts, Lefebvre was compelled to raise the siege.

28. Marshal Moncey repulsed at Valentia, and compelled to retire to Madrid.

July 4. Peace proclaimed with Spain. The Spanish prisoners in this country were liberated, clothed, and sent to join their countrymen; subscriptions were opened, and general enthusiasm diffused through the kingdom in aid of the patriots.

A grand dinner given to the Spanish deputies at the London-tavern: it was attended by the leading men of all parties, and by the heads of all the great companies, and commercial and banking firms in the metropolis; 400 noblemen and gentlemen sat down to dinner, and the toasts drank attested the enthusiasm inspired by the cause of Spain.

12. Major Campbell having killed captain Boyd in a duel, under circumstances that implied previous malice, he was tried at the Armagh assizes, convicted of murder, and executed.

16. In the case of Sir John Carr v.

Hood and Sharp, chief-justice Ellenborough said every man had a right to criticise the writings of another, and hold them up to ridicule, so that he cast no personal reflections on the author. If fair criticism injured the sale of a work, it was damnum absque injuria. Upon this the jury found for the defendants.

21. Battle of Vimiera, in which sir Arthur Wellesley defeated the French under the duke d'Abrantes with the loss of 3000 men and thirteen pieces of cannon. Junot took shelter in the lines of Torres Vedras.

Above 16,000 Spanish veterans, whom Napoleon had led to fight his battles in the north of Europe, upon being apprised of the state of their native country, immediately declared for the sacred cause, and, through the means of the English admiral Beatty, 10,000 of those patriots, commanded by the marquis Romano, were enabled to embark for Spain.

30. Convention of Cintra concluded between Sir Hugh Dalrymple and general Kellerman, by which it is stipulated the French shall evacuate Portugal with their arms, but leaving their magazines, be transported to France in British ships, having liberty previously to dispose of their private property in Portugal. Loud indignation being expressed at the convention in England, it became the subject of a military inquiry; but sir Arthur Wellesley giving his testimony generally in its favour, it may be safely inferred to have been advisedly concluded; and such was the result of the investigation.

Sept. 3. Russian fleet in the Tagus surrendered to the British under sir Charles Cotton, on condition of being given up six months after the conclusion of peace with France.

The army was divided into three grand corps; that of the east commanded by Palafox; of the north by Blake; and of the centre by Castaños.

27. Conference between the emperor of France and Russia at Erfurth; it continued some weeks, and was celebrated by grand fêtes, and theatrical entertainments. The two sovereigns appeared to have conceived and expressed the highest personal regard for each other. Napoleon presented Alexander with a sword, which the latter eagerly accepted as a mark of friendship, saying, "your majesty is well assured that I shall never draw it against you."

Oct. 12. The two emperors addressed a communication to England, proposing peace: it was replied to on the 28th, to the effect that the British government could only treat in concert with Sweden, and the existing government of Spain.

28. The emperor of Russia refused to treat with the Spanish insurgents, having acknowledged Joseph king of Spain.

Dec. 4. Madrid capitulated to the French emperor; the citizens were disposed to resistance, and some of the streets unpaved for the purpose; but their zeal not being seconded by the authorities, headed by Don Mola, the design was abandoned. Buonaparte was now at liberty to direct his attention to the British force, which was advancing towards the capital; one division from Corunna, under sir David Baird, and the other from the Portuguese frontier, commanded by sir John Moore. These divisions united at Salamanca on the 20th, but were compelled on the 30th to begin their disastrous retreat.

On the day that Madrid capitulated Napoleon decreed as follows:—1. That the inquisition be abolished. 2. That the number of convents in Spain be reduced to one-third. 3. That all feudal rights and services cease. 4. That the provincial barriers which impeded industry be suppressed, and the custom-houses removed to the frontiers. 5. The chief cut off the tusks and left the carcase to be devoured by bears.

A. D. 1809. PROSPECTS OF THE YEAR.—The diversion of the Peninsular war tempted Austria a fourth time to enter the lists against her colossal opponent, which had no better result than her preceding efforts against the power of France. Buonaparte acted with his wonted celerity and military science. Leaving his generals to complete the subjection of Spain and Portugal, he summoned to his aid the contingents of the Rhenish confederation, and precipitating himself into the heart of Germany, dispersed, in a succession of bloody battles, the Austrian armies. In four months he passed victoriously from Madrid to Vienna, and by the decisive battle of Wagram, in July, compelled Francis again to sue for peace. The co-operation of England was more remarkable for the magnitude of her exertions than the success or judgment with which they were conducted. It was a year of expeditions. Sir John Stuart made a descent in Calabria with a view to shake the French dominion in Naples, but unsuccessfully. The British arms were successful in Portugal, and acquired new laurels by the victory of Talavera. Against these advantages was the serious drawback of the disastrous expedition to Walcheren, which was the more lamentable as the same powerful armament landed in the Peninsula might have driven the French across the Pyrenees. For want of this co-operation the cause of the Spanish patriots had a very discouraging aspect towards the close of the year. Dissensions in the British cabinet led to an overture, at the instance of the king, to the leading whigs to form part of a combined ministry. This basis being promptly declined by lords Grey and Grenville, the Perceval administration was formed as the only alternative. These ministerial changes were preceded by the discovery of gross misconduct on the part of the duke of York, in his office of commander-in-chief; also in the conduct of other high functionaries in the sale of public offices, and even of seats in the house of commons. The attention of the other house of parliament and of the public was intently fixed on these irregularities.

Jan. 5. Peace concluded between Britain and Turkey through the mediation of Austria.

16. BATTLE OF CORUNNA.—The defeat of the Spaniards and the greatly superior force of the French rendered the retreat of the British unavoidable. From Astorga to Corunna, a route of near 250 miles, through a desolate and mountainous country, made almost impassable by snow and rain, harassed by the enemy, the soldiers suffered intolerable hardships from cold, hunger, and fatigue. Embittered by privations and chagrin the army became disorganised, and by their excesses rendered the people they had come to succour their enemies. However, the French were gallantly repulsed in all their attacks, and after the abandonment of their sick, and loss of most of their stores and military chest, the British, in a very distressed state, reached Corunna on the 11th. Soult took up a position above the town in readiness to make an attack as soon as the troops should begin to embark. On the 16th, the operation having begun, the enemy descended in four columns, when sir John Moore, in bringing up the guards, where the fire was most destructive, received a mortal wound from a cannon ball. General Baird being also disabled, the command devolved on sir John Hope, under whom the troops bravely continued the fight till at night-fall the French retreated with the loss of 2000 men, and offered no further molestation. In this expedition the British army lost their magazines and near 6000 soldiers, inclusive of the brave commander-in-chief, who was highly esteemed for private worth and soldierly qualities.

19. Parliament opened by commission.

23. Buonaparte arrived at Paris, having been recalled from Spain by the warlike preparations of Austria.

27. CHARGES AGAINST THE DUKE OF YORK.—Colonel Wardle, an officer of militia, brought forward in the house of commons a series of charges against the commander-in-chief, to the effect that Mrs. Mary Ann Clarke, who had been in favour, but was now out of favour with the duke, had long carried on a traffic in military commissions, not only with the knowledge, but participation, of his royal highness. He concluded with moving for a committee of inquiry, which, on the suggestion of the chancellor of the exchequer, it was determined should be of the whole house. The inquiry, therefore, commenced at the bar of the house, and lasted above two months.

during which numerous witnesses were examined; amongst whom was Mrs. Clarke herself; and the most extraordinary disclosures ensued. It appeared that this woman had not only considerable influence in the military, but also in the ecclesiastical concerns of the kingdom; having, upon one occasion, placed her own footman as a commissioned officer in the army, and, upon another, procured the honour of preaching before the king for O'Meara, an Irish clergyman. In short, there was hardly any department of the state to which her brookship did not extend; and the list of aspirants upon her ledger included persons of almost every station in society. So far colonel Wardle established his case; but he failed in showing that the duke had derived any pecuniary benefit from the traffickings of his mistress: he had, however, been clearly guilty of the almost equivalent and reprehensible part of knowingly suffering her to barter the patronage of his office for the support of herself and establishment. Public attention was entirely engrossed with the inquiry, and the house was never so well attended as during its progress, many of the members appearing highly edified by the sprightly sallies of the artful courtesan, who was the principal witness interrogated. Though the duke was acquitted of personal corruption by a vote of the house, the impression of his culpability among many independent members, and the public in general, was such, that he found it necessary to resign his employment. This seems to have been "considered sufficient atonement, and the whole business was got rid of on the 20th of March, by Lord Althorp moving that the house did not think proper further to prosecute the inquiry after the resignation of his royal highness, which was carried by 235 to 112. Sir Robert Dundas succeeded the duke at the horse-guards."

Feb. 8. James Madison elected president of the United States of America, Mr. Jefferson declining to be re-elected.

14. Saragossa surrendered to the French.

24. Drury-lane theatre burnt down with inconceivable rapidity; the reservoir of water in the roof was powerless in extinguishing the conflagration. It was insured.

28. Lord Falkland killed in a duel by Mr. Powell, of Devonshire: the quarrel originated in his lordship's levity in addressing Mr. Powell, with whom he was on terms of intimacy, by a nick-name, and persisting so to do after he had taken offence at it in a large company at Steven's in Bond-street.

Mar. 3. Fire in the quadrangle of Christ-church college, Oxford; damage estimated at 12,000*l*.

13. Gustavus IV. deposed by the Swedish diet, and his family declared to be for ever excluded from the throne. A new constitution was framed, and the duke of Sudermania elected king, under the title of Charles XIII. A change of policy ensued, peace being made with Russia, and English vessels excluded from the Swedish ports.

28. Upon opening the body of a sailor who had died in Guy's hospital, eighteen large clasp-knives were found in the stomach and intestines. The hafts of them were entirely decomposed, and the blades partly so. It seems they had been swallowed several years previously in drunken frolics, and at first without any sensible bad effect.

29. Oporto taken by Marshal Soult.

The loss of the French in the Peninsula, by war and disease, estimated at 183,000 men.—Gent. Magazine.

Mr. Whitbread stated in the house of commons that a service of plate, which Mrs. Clarke purchased of a pawnbroker, originally belonged to a prince of the Bourbon family.

Apr. 1. The thanks of the cities of London and Westminster voted to colonel Wardle.

2. A lieutenant Sharp of the Bedford militia not succeeding in his addresses to Miss Shuckburgh, first shot the lady, and then himself, in the park of sir S. Shuckburgh, where they were both found dead.

The arch-duke Charles issued a spirited address to the army, preparatory to opening the campaign against France. The whole Austrian army consisted of nine corps of 30,000 or 40,000 each, besides some of reserve and the militia. Buonaparte, in addition to the French corps, now congregated under his standard Bavarians, Saxons, and Poles.

11. Lord Cockrane made a successful attack on the French squadron in Basque Road, destroying in gallant style five sail of the line and three frigates.

20. Buonaparte defeated the arch-duke Louis at Abensberg; and two days after the arch-duke Charles at Eckmühl: in these two battles the Austrians lost 40,000 men with 100 pieces of cannon. In five days, by the celerity of his movements and admirable tactic combinations, Napoleon completely broke the power of Austria.

21. Captain Manby made a successful trial of a small mortar, to communicate by a line with shipwrecked vessels, and save the crew.

22. Sir Arthur Welleley landed at Lisbon to command the British army; the Portuguese to be commanded by marshal Beresford.

25. CHARGE AGAINST LORD CASTLEREAGH.—His lordship it appeared had endeavoured to procure a seat in parliament for his friend lord Clancarty, in exchange for a writership which had been placed at his disposal while president of the India board. The seat however not being deemed an equivalent for a writership (valued at 3000 guineas), and the parties not agreeing upon the difference, the negotiation broke off. Resolutions in condemnation of this proceeding were moved on the 25th, by lord A. Hamilton, which were negatived by 216 against 167. A similar fate attended a motion of Mr. Madocks, who charged Mr. Percival and lord Castlereagh with corruptly influencing the return of members of parliament. It originated a bill, introduced by Mr. Curwen, which passed into a law for better securing the purity and independence of parliament.

May 5. Russia declared war against Austria.

12. Hon. H. Wellesley obtained 20,000*l.* damages against lord Paget for crim. con. A duel of his lordship with captain Cado-gan, who had married a sister of lady Wellesley, was one of the incidents of this affair: it excited great interest, owing to the romantic attachment of lord Paget, who had in vain sought to stifle his unfortunate passion in the turmoil of the Spanish war, in which, during the retreat to Corunna, from his recklessness of life he acquired the reputation of "a rash and adventurous gallantry."

13. French entered Vienna.

21, 22. Bloody battle of Aspern between the archduke Charles and the French emperor. It was fought in the Marchfield on the left bank of the Danube, two leagues below Vienna, opposite the Isle of Lobau. It lasted two days, and the killed and wounded amounted to 20,000 in each army. At the close of the second day Buonaparte was compelled to retreat into the Isle of Lobau, where his army was placed in a situation of great jeopardy, the flood having carried away the bridge that connected the island in the middle of the river with the right bank of the Danube. Two months elapsed before he was able to repair the disasters of the battle, and again transport his army across the river.

Rear-admiral Harvey dismissed the service for disrespectful conduct to his superior officer admiral lord Gambier: subsequently restored.

26. Valentine Jones convicted in the court of king's bench of a fraud on government, in his office of commissary-general in the West Indies.

June 1. Professor Herbert Marsh revived the lectures on divinity in St. Mary's church, Cambridge.

A parliamentary report showed that great encroachments had been made in Windsor Forest: it now comprises twelve entire parishes and extends into five others. The whole quantity of land in the forest, according to the survey and map of 1789, was 59,600 acres.

7. Raab surrendered to the French.

8. DEATH OF THOMAS PAINE.—This celebrated person was the son of a quaker, and born at Thetford in Norfolk, in 1737. Losing his employment in the excise, he obtained an introduction to Dr. Franklin, which led to his emigration to America, where, by the force and acuteness of his writings, he essentially contributed to the establishment of the independence of the colonies. He returned to England and excited great interest by the publication of his "Rights of Man," in answer to Mr. Burke's "Reflections on the French Revolution." In France, he was chosen member of the national convention, but offended the extreme republicans by not voting for the death of Louis XVI., and narrowly escaped the guillotine pending the reign of terror. He returned to America in 1802, having a small farm in the neighbourhood of Baltimore, that had been given him by congress for the services he had rendered in the struggle with the mother country, and which having improved in value during his peregrinations in Europe, yielded him a decent competence for the remainder of his days. Habits of intemperance and the notoriety of his deistical opinions deprived him of the general respect to which he was entitled from natural benevolence and the possession of superior abilities. Few writers have excited greater contemporary interest than Thomas Paine, and he still retains a strong hold of the popular mind; but his political philosophy lies in a narrow compass, consisting of the application of a few abstractions to the complicated affairs of civil society, without reference to the diversity of human character and pre-existing habits, institutions, and associations. This limitation of scope doubtless helped to give point, conclusiveness, and plausibility to theories which were probably corrected in his own mind, as they were in the minds of many others by the lessons of practical wisdom subsequently afforded by the great experiment of the French Revolution.

10. Pope Pius VII. excommunicated Buonaparte for seizing the papal territories.

A parliamentary return showed that there are in England and Wales 3291 livings under 150*l.* per annum.

21. Parliament prorogued by commission.

A loan of 11 millions was this year contracted for at a lower rate of interest than money had ever before been borrowed on the public account. The abundance of capital consequent on the interruption to foreign trade, and the absence of any cause of apprehension either at home or abroad. It is likely contributed to the low rate of interest.

28. Daniel Lambert found dead in his bed at Stamford, where he had gone to exhibit himself during the races. He was in his 49th year, and the heaviest man on record, weighing 52 stone, 14lbs. to the stone.

29. A bottle taken up in Martinique, which had been thrown into the sea in lat. $14^{\circ} 48' N.$, long. $25^{\circ} W.$, showing that it had been floated by the current 2020 miles in 224 days.

A verdict of 1000*l.* was given in favour of the earl of Leicester against the proprietors of the Morning Herald for a libel.

At the beginning of the month sir John Stewart, the British commander in Sicily, made a descent on the coast of Calabria: it was at first successful, but the enemy collecting in force, and the Neapolitans manifesting no disposition to revolt from their present ruler, he re-embarked his troops.

July 3. An action brought by an upholsterer against colonel Wardle for 1400*l.*, for furniture sold to the defendant for the use of Mary Ann Clarke, and a verdict given for the plaintiff. It seems the undertaking of Mr. Wardle was in the November preceding the late investigation into the conduct of the duke of York; which threw some suspicion on the motives and characters of the parties who instituted that inquiry.

4. Three Middlesex magistrates convicted in a penalty of 500*l.* for the false imprisonment and impressment of a labourer.

6. VICTORY OF WAGRAM.—This battle was fought between Buonaparte and the archduke Charles; the loss of the Austrians was so great that they immediately sought an armistice of the French emperor.

13. Capt. Barclay finished his task at Newmarket of walking 1000 miles in 1000 successive hours, not walking more nor less than one mile in one hour. The captain had 16,000*l.* depending on his undertaking, and towards the close appeared to have become partly habituated to his interrupted rest.

20. William Cobbett, the author of the "Political Register," cast in an action at Winchester assizes for an assault on a boy-servant: damages 10*l.*

28. BATTLE OF TALAVERA.—The French, commanded by Victor and Sebastiani, were defeated by the British, commanded by sir Arthur Wellesley, aided by a corps of Spaniards under Cuesta. The action was severe, the loss of the British amounting to 6000 in killed, wounded, and missing; that of the enemy was much more considerable. Soon after the junction of Soult, Ney, and Morier, in the rear of the English, compelled them to fall back on Badajoz.

EFFECTS OF INTEMPERANCE.—A labourer near Oxford, who had retired into an out-house to sleep in a state of intoxication, was attacked by rats. The liquor and sleep had so overpowered him that he was incapable either of repelling them or calling for assistance. He continued in an agonised state till his groans drew a person to the place, who found a number of the vermin round the feet of the sufferer, seven of whose toes had been entirely devoured by them.—(Ann. Reg. li. 288.) A case still more horrible occurred in the neighbourhood of Dublin in the ensuing month. (Ibid. 318.) A man inebriated fell from a car into a hollow, where he lay on his face till discovered by a passenger. On turning him on his back and moving his coat, the whole surface of his body seemed a moving mass of worms: his face was much disfigured, apparently from some bruises inflicted either by a fall or a blow, and from every aperture of his head, his eyes, ears, mouth, and nose poured innumerable worms, as if the cavity of the skull was filled with them. His eyes were dissolved, and his face covered with maggots: he was not dead. After some time he was able to ~~was~~ and recollect the adventure of the preceding night. The humidity of the air and the heat of the weather had rapidly caused putrescence in the bruised parts lying in contact with the moist earth. Next day the miserable being died, it being impossible to arrest the progress of decomposition.

Aug. 13. A monument erected to the memory of sir John Moore at Corunna, by the marquis Romana, and his remains removed from the obscure place in the fortress, where they were first interred.

15. EXPEDITION TO WALCHEREN.—In the course of the summer was fitted out with great secrecy one of the most formidable armaments ever despatched from the shores of England. It consisted of an army of 40,000 men, and a fleet of 39 sail of the line, 36 frigates, and numerous gun-boats, bomb-boats, and small craft. The command of the first was given to the earl of Chatham, of the last to sir R. Strachan. The chief objects of the enterprise were to get possession of Flushing, the French ships of war in the Scheldt, and destroy their arsenals and dock-yards. The expedition sailed on the 28th of July, and on the 15th inst. Flushing surrendered, with a garrison of 6000 men. No advantage beyond this was gained. During the siege of Flushing, Bernadotte had arrived at Antwerp, put the place in a posture of defence, removed the ships higher up the river, and collected a Belgic force to resist the invaders. Owing to these preparations, the reduction of Antwerp was deemed impracticable by a council of war, and had the island of Walcheren been forthwith abandoned, the loss of the British would have been inconsiderable. In lieu of which, either from incapacity in the military commander, or from fluctuations in the council of ministers, this pestilential spot was not evacuated till the latter end of December. An epidemic fever, as was usual in the autumn, raged in the island, and of the fine army that had left Portsmouth a few months before, one-half were either consigned to inglorious graves or returned to England afflicted with chronic diseases, in the last stage of debility.

Sept. 3. By the order of Murat, king of Naples, the religious houses in his dominions are suppressed.

17. The new theatre of Covent-garden opened with Macbeth and The Quaker. The address was attempted to be spoken by Mr. Kemble, but such was the uproar, occasioned by an advance in the prices of admission, that it was wholly inaudible.

21. DUEL OF CANNING AND CASTLEREAGH. — Both these gentlemen having resigned their offices, a personal encounter ensued between them on Putney heath, in which Mr. Canning was wounded. Mr. Canning had some months previously addressed a letter to the duke of Portland, the head of the administration, informing his grace that he should resign the foreign secretaryship if lord Castlereagh continued to hold the secretaryship of war, for which department Mr. Canning thought lord Castlereagh unfit. The duke of Portland, either from not coinciding in opinion with Mr. Canning, or wishing himself from the infirmities of age, to retire from the ministry, delayed to act on the suggestion of Mr. Canning, though his lordship promised that it should be carried into effect. — (Ann. Reg. li. 305.) Meanwhile no communication was made to lord Castlereagh, and Mr. Canning continued to act with him in the cabinet, even while the important expedition to Walcheren was being prepared, without openly avowing any objection to the official competence of his colleague. Under these circumstances his lordship considered that he had been treated with duplicity, and demanded satisfaction.

Oct. 1. Lord Collingwood and sir J. Stuart took possession of Zante, Cephalonia, and the other Greek islands, restoring the Ionian republic.

15. Peace concluded between Austria and France. Trieste was the principal acquisition of France by this treaty, the chief territorial cessions being made to her allies, Bavaria, Saxony, and Prussia. The brave Tyrolese, who had taken arms in favour of Austria, were abandoned, and their gallant leader, Hofer, expiated his patriotism on the scaffold. A similar fate involved colonel Schill, who had raised the standard of revolt in the north of Germany: he was slain in defending Stralsund.

25. THE JUBILEE. — The King having entered the 50th year of his reign, it was celebrated throughout the empire as a national jubilee, with thanksgiving and other demonstrations of gladness. All deserters and military delinquents were pardoned, and crown debtors liberated from confinement. Divine service was performed in the churches, and splendid illuminations and other rejoicings in the evening concluded the festivities.

30. PERCIVAL MINISTRY. — The death of the duke of Portland, on the 30th, and the previous dissensions in the cabinet, broke up the administration. An overture to the Whigs, as before mentioned, having failed, it became necessary to resort to other materials. Mr. Percival became the new premier, uniting to his office of chancellor of the exchequer that of first lord of the treasury. The marquis of Wellesley was recalled from his embassy to Spain, to succeed Mr. Canning in the foreign secretaryship; viscount Palmerston succeeded lord Castlereagh as secretary at war; and the earl of Liverpool (late lord Hawkesbury) in his (lord Castlereagh's) other office of colonial secretary; the hon. R. Ryder succeeding lord Liverpool in the home department; Messrs. Wharton and Arbuthnot succeeded Mr. Huskisson and the hon. H. Wellesley as secretaries of the treasury. No change was made in the law offices, nor in the Irish government.

Nov. 19. The Spaniards, under Arizaga, signally defeated at Ocana; the consequence of which was the surrender of Cordova and Seville, leaving the French free access to Cadiz.

Dec. 1. The Spanish junta having become unpopular for want of success, it was determined to assemble the cortes, which had not met for three centuries.

11. At the election for chancellor of the university of Oxford, lord Grenville had 406 votes; lord Eldon 390; duke of Beaufort 258. All the bishops who had a vote voted for lord Grenville, except two, who voted for lord Eldon.

16. The O. P. riots at Covent-garden theatre, which had been sturdily kept up for months, terminated. It was settled that the boxes should continue at 7s.; that the pit should be lowered to the old price of 3s. 6d.; and the private boxes thrown open to the public. An increase in the prices of admission had been demanded on the ground of improvements in the new theatre, and had been chiefly resisted on account of the monopoly of the patent theatres.

17. The empress Josephine divorced from Buonaparte: as the marriage had never been solemnised except as a civil contract, the dissolution was more feasible.

25. The evacuation of Walcheren completed, after destroying the basin, arsenal, and fortifications of Flushing.

30. NEW MILITARY REGULATIONS.—No officer to be promoted to the rank of captain until he has been three years a subaltern. No officer to be a major until he has been seven years in the service, of which he shall have been at least two years a captain; and no major to be appointed lieutenant-colonel until he has been nine years in the service. No officer to fill any staff appointment (except aid-de-camp) until he has been four years in the service. No subaltern officer to be an aid-de-camp unless he shall have been present in the regiment at least one year.

A treaty of amity and commerce was this year concluded with America by Mr. Erskine, but disavowed by the British government, on the ground that the English minister had exceeded his powers.

MERINO SHEEP.—A small flock of this description of sheep was procured for the use of the king, by lord Auckland, the British minister at Madrid, in 1791. They excited little notice, and it was not till thirteen years after that they became an article of sale. It is now ascertained that the fleece does not degenerate, and is sold as clipped from the back, at 4s. 6d. a-pound. But we may further observe on this experiment (though the discovery belongs to a subsequent period), that though the fleece does not degenerate, the carcase, which is of little weight, does not improve; so that the farmer, whose remuneration depends on the sale of both, has found it his interest to return to the native, hastened, too, by the large importations of fine wool from Saxony, that have superseded both the Spanish and English staple of short wool.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—William Hawes, M.D., 73, a gentleman long known in the metropolis for active benevolence, and the founder of the royal humane society. Hugh Hewson, 85, formerly a barber in Lincoln's-inn-fields, and the original of Strap in Smollett's "Roderick Random." Earl of Dunmore, 78, father-in-law of the duke of Sussex, and in the female line related to the house of Stuart. David Barclay, 81, a grandson of the author of the "Apology for the Quakers," and lately an eminent merchant in the city. Matthew Boulton, 81, one of the proprietors of the famous Soho manufactory, and successful cultivator of the useful arts. John Henry Petty, marquis of Lansdowne, 44: his lordship was succeeded in his title and estates by his brother, lord Henry Petty, late chancellor of the exchequer. Sir Frederick Morton Eden, diplomatist, and author of a valuable "History of the Poor." J. Haydn, 76, the celebrated musical composer. Thomas Eccleston, of Scarisbrook, a successful improver of the agriculture of Lancashire. Anna Seward, 66, a lady of Lichfield, distinguished for literary talents. In the public hospital, at Kingston, Jamaica, and buried at the expense of the parish, Robert Hepburn Ker, formerly a baker in that city, and who by a late decision of the house of lords was found entitled to the dukedom of Roxburgh, and 100,000*l.* in the funds.

A.D. 1810. COMMERCE AND PUBLIC CREDIT.—The exclusion of British commodities from the continent and the united states of America began to produce a sensible effect on the staple interests of the empire. In several of the principal branches of national industry, especially in the cotton manufacture, there was great stagnation of demand, of which the consequences were numerous and extensive failures. The rate of exchange in foreign markets had been from 15 to 20 per cent. against this country. A rapid and unexampled rise had taken place in prices, not from the business of trade, but the extremely artificial state of the currency. Gold coins had almost wholly disappeared from the circulation: guineas were regularly sold at prices above their legal denomination, and paper currency was the only medium employed in commercial transactions and dealings of all kinds. The price of gold had risen from 3*l.* 17*s.* per ounce in bank notes to 4*l.* 12*s.* (Annual Register, lii. 126.) The rise in prices, or the depreciation in the currency, produced severe distress among the numerous classes living on wages and fixed incomes; it also lowered the exchangeable value of the public taxes, and the government loan fell so much below par, that some melancholy catastrophes followed among the contractors. These monetary derangements were brought under the notice of the house of commons by Mr. Horner, and became the subject of an able report. In this report the rise of prices and fall in the exchanges is traced to the redundant issue of an inconvertible paper money, for which the remedy suggested is the resumption of payments in specie by the bank of England. Besides commercial embarrassments, the chief topics of parliamentary discussion were the late expedition to the Scheldt, and a pertinacious struggle about the exercise of the privileges of the house of commons. Abroad, there were no events of striking importance. The struggles against French aggression in Spain had dwindled down on the side of the patriots to a partizan war, carried on by parties of guerillas, headed by Mina, El Empecinado, and other adventurous chiefs. The French, under Marshal Massena, overran Portugal, till their progress was arrested by lord Wellington, at the impregnable lines of Torres Vedras. A new scene of interest arose in South America; some of the transatlantic provinces of Spain proclaiming their independence of the mother country. The Spanish colonists were now found to be divided into two parties; the royalists, who adhered to the government, acting in the name of Ferdinand VII., and the republicans, who sought for independence on the plan of the United States.

Jan. 3. At the mansion-house, Mr. De Yonge was charged, under a statute of Edward VI., with selling guineas at 22s. 6d. each, 1s. 6d. above their legal price. See July 4, 1811.

6. Peace between France and Sweden.

18. Mr. Lyon Levy, an eminent Jewish dealer in diamonds, threw himself from the top of the Monument, and was killed on the spot.

23. PARLIAMENT opened by commission: the disasters of the past year were adverted to, and sought to be extenuated.

26. Lord Porchester's motion, in the house of commons, for an inquiry into the expedition to Walcheren, carried by 195 to 186.

Feb. 4. Died, in his 79th year, WILLIAM CAVENDISH, who distinguished himself by important discoveries in natural philosophy, especially the composition of water; by improvements in the eudiometer, and endeavours to ascertain the mean density of the earth. Mr. Cavendish was little known in the busy world, his life being spent in reading, study, and in experiments. He was great uncle to the present duke of Devonshire, and left funded property to the amount of 1,200,000*l*.

5. General Beckwith and admiral A. Cochrane took the island of Guadaloupe, the last possession of the French in the West Indies.

7. Captain Lake dismissed the king's service for putting a seaman ashore on the desolate island of Sombbrero.

11. The spire of St. Nicholas church, Liverpool, fell through the roof, killing 27 persons.

17. The Dutch settlement of Amboyna surrendered to a British force from Madras,

21. PRIVILEGE OF PARLIAMENT.—Pending the inquiry into the expedition to Walcheren, the house of commons became involved in a series of contests that did not exalt its reputation for wisdom. During the inquiry, Mr. Yorke, having from day to day enforced the standing order of the house for the exclusion of strangers, Mr. Sheridan moved its revision, when Mr. Windham took occasion to inveigh against the reporters for the press, which was replied to by Mr. Stephens, who had once belonged to this 'useful class. This discussion originated another outside the house, at a debating society called the British Forum, where a question was propounded,—“Which was a greater outrage on the public feeling, Mr. Yorke's enforcement of the standing order to exclude strangers from the house of commons, or Mr. Windham's attack on the press?” and it being unanimously carried against the former, the result was announced in a placard. This was brought before the house as an infringement of their privileges, being a comment on their proceedings, in contravention, as alleged, of the Bill of Rights. Upon this John Gale Jones, who acknowledged himself the author of the obnoxious placard, was committed to Newgate. Sir Francis Burdett next entered the lists: he denied the right of the house to imprison Mr. Jones, and published his argument, with his name affixed, in Cobbett's Weekly Register of March 24th. Pleased with the higher game, the house instantly fell upon the baronet, who was ordered to be committed to the tower, the speaker issuing his warrant for the purpose to the sergeant-at-arms. On the arrival of this officer at the house of sir Francis, he was informed that the legality of the speaker's warrant was denied, and that the baronet would not submit to it unless he were compelled to do so by force. A pause ensued in consequence of the doubts of the speaker regarding the extent of his powers; but these being obviated by the opinion of the attorney-general, the house of sir Francis was violently entered by the sergeant-at-arms, and the baronet forcibly conveyed to the tower. As the soldiery which had conducted the captive to his destination were returning, they were violently assailed by the multitude with stones and other missiles, when the military firing, three of the rioters were killed. On one victim the coroner's inquest returned a verdict of wilful murder against some persons unknown. Subsequently sir Francis brought actions at law against the speaker for issuing his warrant, against the sergeant-at-arms for executing it, and against the constable of the tower for detaining him in custody, but he failed in all; the courts of law, after ponderous legal disputation, refusing to take cognizance of the questions at issue. During his incarceration the baronet was cheered by numerous approving addresses, and at the end of the session he was suffered to return to his house, which he did privately by water, to avoid the risk of popular tumult; though somewhat inconsistently with this pretext sir Francis, without communicating his intention to his friends, suffered them to make preparations for a grand procession through the metropolis, which actually took place. Mr. Jones claimed a right to a trial, and refused to leave Newgate, but was got out by a stratagem, loudly complaining of the grievance of being both illegally imprisoned and illegally thrust out of prison.

24. Mr. Perry, proprietor of the Morning Chronicle, tried and acquitted in the court of king's bench. He conducted his own defence, on the charge of having published a libel, copied from the Examiner, reflecting on the king's character.

28. A general fast-day.

Mar. 2. A vote of censure passed the house of commons, on the conduct of the earl of Chatham, he having made a private communication to the king, without the intervention of a responsible minister, impugning the conduct of the navy in the Walcheren expedition. His lordship, in consequence, thought fit to resign his office of master-general of the ordnance.

* 16. Hanover annexed to Westphalia.

21. Lord Porchester moved, in the house of commons, a series of resolutions, strongly condemning the management of the Walcheren expedition. The debate continued by adjournment four days, and the house did not divide till the 30th, when there appeared for the resolutions 227, against them 275. Two amendments were then moved by general Crawford. The first, approving the conduct of ministers with regard to the policy of the expedition, was carried by 272 to 232; the second, approving the non-evacuation of Walcheren was also carried by 255 against 232.

Apr. 1. Buonaparte married to the archduchess Maria Louisa: on the 27th the bride and bridegroom set out on a tour through the northern departments.

17. A petition agreed to in the city of Westminster, occasioned by the imprisonment of sir F. Burdett, in which the electors reminded the house of commons of their refusal to inquire into the conduct of Mr.

Percival and lord Castlereagh, when charged with the sale of seats in the house, and with the avowal in the house that such practices were as notorious as "the sun at noon-day;"—practices, at the bare mention of which the speaker declared, that our "ancestors would have startled with indignation." A petition of similar tenor was agreed to by the Middlesex freeholders, but the house refused to receive either.

May 1. The American congress passed an act providing that if either Britain or France modified its edicts, so that they ceased to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, and if the other should not within three months after do the same, the non-intercourse act should cease with regard to the first nation, but remain in force with regard to the second: in consequence, the French revoked their edicts, and the American ports were opened to them in November.

9. News arrived that the Caraccas had declared themselves independent of Old Spain: it was the beginning of a series of revolutions that extended and long continued through the whole of Spanish America.

17. DEATH OF W. WINDHAM, M.P.—This gentleman was in his 60th year, and of considerable eminence in public life, but more remarkable for the novel and honest arduity of his opinions, than their political or philosophical accuracy. Abandoning some of his old confederates in politics, he joined, along with Mr. Burke and others of the practical school of politicians, Mr. Pitt, in opposing the speculative doctrines of the French revolution. He sided with the Grenvilles in reprobating the ephemeral peace of Amiens; and, on the return of that party to power, he again became secretary-at-war. Mr. Windham's eloquence was interesting from its point, raciness, and idiomatic force.

21. Mr. Brand's motion for an inquiry into the state of the parliamentary representation negatived by 234 to 115.

29. The crown prince of Sweden died suddenly while reviewing some regiments of cavalry. The populace, without reason, suspected he was poisoned, and in their fury murdered count Fersen, the marshal of the kingdom.

31. DUKE OF CUMBERLAND.—An extraordinary attempt was made upon the person of his royal highness, while asleep in bed. He received several blows about the head with a sabre, from an unknown hand, and jumping up to give an alarm he was followed by the assassin, who cut him across the thighs. Sellis, an Italian valet of the duke, and his supposed assailant, was found locked in his own room, with his throat cut, and spots of blood leading to his apartment. Next day a coroner's inquest was held on the body of Sellis, which, after sitting four hours to hear evidence, deliberated about an hour, and then returned a verdict of felo-de-se.

June 15. Mr. Brougham, in a speech of great length and ability, called the attention of the house to the attempts making to evade the act for the abolition of the African slave-trade.

21. Parliamentary session closed.

27. Almeida, garrisoned by 5000 English and Portuguese, commanded by general Coxe, surrendered to marshal Massena. It was the strongest fortress in Portugal, and would have made a protracted defence had not a bomb fallen on an immense magazine of powder, by which explosion a large portion of the town and garrison were blown up.

Sept. 1. Meeting at the exchange, Dublin, to pass resolutions favourable to a repeal of the legislative union. They were seconded by Mr. O'Connell, and most of the speakers seemed to assent to his opinion that Catholic emancipation was an object secondary to that of a separation of the two kingdoms.

17. A body of Neapolitan troops debarked in Sicily, to recover possession of that island, but were repulsed by the British, under sir John Stuart.

24. Spanish cortes assembled in Cadiz, which was beleaguered by Soult, and almost the only place of consequence in possession of the patriots.

28. Mr. Abraham Goldsmid found dead, with a pistol grasped in his hand, in his grounds at Morden-house. He had speculated largely with sir Francis Baring in the government loan of 14 millions, and omnium falling to a considerable discount, he was unable to bear the loss.

18. Lucien Buonaparte and family landed at Plymouth: his baggage and that of his attendants weighed thirty-three tons.

20. KING'S INDISPOSITION.—The king's mental disorder continuing, Mr. Percival submitted three resolutions to the house of commons for supplying the deficiency in the executive power. They were of the same import as those introduced by Mr. Pitt on a like occurrence in 1788-9; affirming, 1, the incapacity of the king; 2, the right of the two houses to supply the defect; 3, the necessity of determining upon the means of giving the royal assent to a bill for this purpose. The opposition on this occasion waving any declaration of the right of the prince of Wales to the regency, Mr. Ponsonby merely moved an amendment that the prince be addressed to take upon him the executive duties. It was rejected by 269 votes against 157. In the lords the same resolutions and a similar amendment were moved, which last was rejected by 100 against 74.

24. St. Paul's cathedral robbed of the whole of the church service of plate weighing 1760 ounces.

A.D. 1811. COMMENCEMENT OF THE REGENCY.—Although the present year was not marked with the rise or downfall of states, it was signalised by many events of importance. The long reign of George III. had virtually closed; the regal functions were vested during the remainder of the sovereign's life by legislative act in the heir apparent, at first with limited powers, and afterwards in full sovereignty. No change either in the policy of government, or in its responsible ministers, followed this transfer of the executive power. Among the minor occurrences of the first year of the regency was the revival of catholic agitation in Ireland, and of their claims for an equality of civil rights with their protestant fellow-subjects. An unsuccessful attempt was made in England to abridge the liberty of the dissenters under the specious pretext of excluding from the ministry the profligate and illiterate. But the chief topic of parliamentary discussion was the depreciation of the currency: on this question alone almost the entire month of May was consumed in long and anxious debates. The press groaned under the weight of pamphlets and periodicals, that almost hourly issued on the affirmative and negative side. Notwithstanding all the light shed on this intricate subject within and without the walls of parliament, the house of commons committed the mistake of denying the conclusion of the bullionists of a depreciation in paper money, though attested by palpable facts and obvious principles. Abroad, the restless energies of the French emperor were occupied in perfecting his continental system—in vain efforts to exclude British commerce—in the settlement of the Gallican church, disturbed by the contumacy of his bishops and the pope—and, in a tour to Holland, Amsterdam was declared to be the third city of the empire—Rome being the second, and Paris the first. In the Peninsula the war exhibited an alternation of victory and defeat to the contending parties. The Guerillas were troublesome to the French, who, however, succeeded in making themselves masters of nearly all the cities (Cadiz excepted) and strong places in Spain. Portugal was the chief scene of their disasters and humiliation. Conducted by lord Wellington, the British proved themselves not less able to win battles by land than sea. The appointment of this general in the course of the year to be commander-in-chief of the Anglo-Portuguese armies, and the introduction into the latter of better discipline and organization held out the promise of future victories.

Jan. 1. Hamburgh annexed to France.

8. The Thames nearly frozen, and the northern roads almost impassable by snow.

Feb. 5. REGENCY ACT.—By this act, which became law on the 5th, the regency was vested in the prince of Wales, under certain restrictions: he was restrained from creating peers, and from granting offices in reversion, or places and pensions, for a longer term than during the royal pleasure; the management of the king's household was vested in the queen, and regulations made respecting the king's private property. The restrictions were to continue till after February 1, 1812. Considering himself merely locum tenens, in the interim the prince declined making any change in the administration, or to accept any grant for an establishment in virtue of his new functions.

7. Judgment passed on Mr. Finnerty for a libel, charging lord Castlereagh with cruelty in Ireland, by which he was condemned to an imprisonment of eighteen months in Lincoln gaol.

It appears since the reduction in the duty on whisky 60,000 gallons of that spirit are weekly retailed in 1200 licensed dram-shops in Dublin.

18. Died at his apartments at Paddington, in a state of mental phrenzy, the duke of Albuquerque, ambassador from Spain. Chagrin at the misfortunes of his country, and some undeserved treatment he had received from the Spanish junta, are supposed to have produced this catastrophe.

Mar. 1. Commercial distress continuing to increase, the chancellor of the exchequer moved for the appointment of a parliamentary committee to inquire into its causes. On the 7th the committee made a report, ascribing chief part of the distress to excess of shipment of British manufactures to south America, the returns for which being principally in West India produce, there was no means in the present state of trade of realising them. An advance to the mercantile interest of six millions of exchequer bills was recommended, to be repaid by quarterly instalments; but the security required being onerous, only a portion of this advance was ever applied for.

3. WELLINGTON POLE'S CIRCULAR.—The affairs of Ireland which, since the Union, had had less prominence in the Imperial parliament, again claimed anxious attention. The roman catholics, with the view of prosecuting their claims, determined on forming in Dublin a standing delegation, consisting of ten persons elected from each county, charged with the business of acting for the whole body, in seeking the redress of grievances. This kind of organization alarmed the Irish government, and the chief secretary issued a circular letter to the magistrates, enjoining them to prevent the contemplated meeting of the catholic committee. This circular became the subject of parliamentary discussion on the 3rd, of which the consequence was, the withdrawal of the circular and the issuing of a proclamation having the same object, the enforcement of the convention act. Under this act several gentlemen were apprehended, tried, and acquitted. In October the catholic committee, to the number of 300, assembled, with the earl of Fingal in the chair, and voted a petition to parliament; but upon re-assembling, December 23rd, they were formally dispersed by a magistrate.

5. BATTLE OF BAROSSA.—A British force detached from the garrison of Cadix, commanded by general Graham, defeated two divisions of marshal Victor's army.

The action was severe, the loss of the enemy amounting to 3000 killed, wounded, and prisoners; that of the English, 1243. Both the English general and his troops were highly applauded for the spirit and ability displayed in this encounter.

RETREAT OF THE FRENCH.—Massena, finding it difficult to subvert his army in a devastated country, and despairing of driving "the English into their native element," began his retreat from Santarem, abandoning part of his baggage and heavy artillery. He retired towards the Mondego, marching in one solid mass, with his rear covered by one or two divisions, which successively occupied the strong posts offered by the nature of the country. He thus preserved his army from any great disaster, though watchfully and vigorously pursued by lord Wellington.

10. Badajoz surrendered to the French with a garrison of more than 7000 men. Lord Wellington, who was preparing to raise the siege, was much chagrined: writing to the regency of Portugal, he said, "The Spanish nation has lost in the course of two months, the fortresses of Tortosa, Olivença, and Badajoz, without any sufficient cause; at the same time marshal Soult with a corps of troops, which was never supposed to exceed 20,000 men, besides the capture of the two last places, has made prisoners and destroyed above 22,000 Spanish troops."

14. Died in his 76th year, the duke of GRAFTON. In the early part of the present reign his grace had possessed a large share of notoriety through the attacks of Wilkes and the invectives of Junius. Subsequently he distinguished himself by his steady opposition to the American war, and the revolutionary war with France. At a late period of life he determined, with a mind perfectly unshackled and influenced solely by regard to truth, to enter on a course of theological studies, which terminated in his becoming a unitarian.

19. The bank gave notice that it would receive in payment all dollars taken at the rate of 5s. 6d. each, instead of 5s. This had become necessary to prevent their withdrawal from circulation, owing to the rise in the price of silver.

20. The empress of France delivered of a son, who was created king of Rome. The discharge of 101 pieces of artillery announced the occurrence to the Parisians, who rent the air with acclamations. The emperors of Russia and Austria, and most of the continental states sent ambassadors extraordinary to congratulate Napoleon. Ground was soon after purchased near the Pont de Jena, to erect a superb palace, to be called the Palace of the King of Rome.

25. Buonaparte issued a decree, enjoining the culture of the beet-root, and the plant-woad, to supply the place of the sugar cane, and indigo: the success of the experiment was anticipated with so much confidence, that the prohibition of the sugar and indigo of the Indies, or English commodities, was announced for January 1st, 1813.

26. At the election of chancellor for the university of Cambridge, the duke of Gloucester had 470 votes, the duke of Rutland 356.

27. The Danes repulsed by the British in a bold but ill-conducted attempt to recover the isle of Anholt.

Mr. Walter Cox stood in the pillory, Dublin, for a libel in The Irish Magazine, recommending a separation between England and Ireland by a French force. He was cheered on coming down by the populace, and the police perished.

The stagnation of trade having thrown out of employment great numbers in the manufacturing towns of the west of Scotland, a subscription was opened at Hamilton for the relief of the destitute of that place. They however refused to accept it as alms, but said they would be happy to turn it by their labour. The subscribers accordingly agreed to expend the money in making a foot-path between Hamilton and Bothwell-bridge.

April 27. The statue erected to the memory of Lord Nelson in Guildhall opened to the public: the long inscription was penned by R. B. Sheridan, esq.

May 6. Wellington having blockaded Almeida, Massena attempted to raise it, but was skillfully repulsed at Fuentes d'Honor. The English became masters of Almeida on the 10th, the garrison evacuating the place in the night.

8. It appears that the manufacture of woollen cloth in the west-riding of Yorkshire has decreased in the past year 38,575 pieces. Of 1160 shearmen in the town and neighbourhood of Leeds, 400 are out of employment.

Some of the horses entered to run at Newmarket races were wilfully poisoned.

At Tortola, a planter named Hodge executed for murder, by whipping one of his slaves to death.

9. PROTESTANT DISSENTING PREACHERS.—Lord Sidmouth obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the Toleration Act. His aim seemed to be by requiring higher testimonials of fitness, to diminish the number of licensed non-conforming preachers of the illiterate class, who, from their popularity, were formidable rivals to the established clergy. But the dissenters took the alarm, and poured in such a broadside of petitions, as overwhelmed his lordship upon the first discharge. Lord Holland stoutly opposed the bill from its first introduction. He said it proceeded on the error that the right to teach and preach was derived only from the permission of government; whereas he held it to be the right of every man who thought himself able to instruct others, to do so, provided his doctrines did not disturb the public peace.

13. GOLD AND PAPER.—Nearly the whole of the month was occupied in continuous discussion on the state of the currency. On the 6th Mr. Horner introduced the subject to the house of commons in an elaborate speech; contending that paper money was actually depreciated, and the only remedy for which was the resumption of specie payments by the bank. On the contrary Mr. Rose contended that paper was not depreciated, and that if the restriction on the bank was removed, not a single additional guinea would be in circulation. Mr. Horner having moved a set of resolutions founded on his ideas, they were all rejected by a majority of three to one. On the 13th Mr. Vansittart moved a rival and ponderous string of resolutions (Ann. Reg. liii. 44), in which he endeavoured to show that the foreign political and commercial relations of the country were sufficient to account for the fall in the exchanges and the high price of bullion, and that it would be highly impolitic to fix any time for the resumption of cash payments by the bank. These passed by a large majority; thus denying, by parliamentary authority, the conclusion of the bullionists of the depreciation of paper; and which was undoubtedly the fact, as guineas were publicly selling for 27s., and landlords, in both England and Ireland, were requiring their rents to be paid in gold, or in such an amount of paper as was equivalent to gold at its selling price.

16. BATTLE OF ALBUERA.—Soult, advancing to the relief of Badajoz, made a vigorous attack on the Anglo-Portuguese army, commanded by marshal Beresford. After a severe, and at one time a doubtful contest, the French were repulsed with great slaughter. The loss of the allies was upwards of 6000; that of the enemy much greater. Six different nations were at once shedding their blood in this fierce encounter; British, Spanish, Portuguese and French, Germans and Poles.

An unfortunate encounter between the English sloop of war Little Belt, captain Bingham, and the United States frigate President, commodore Rogers: the former had 32 killed and wounded; the loss of the latter trifling. It originated either in mistake, or a naval point of honour not clearly explained.

20. Mr. Percival opened the ANNUAL

SUBJECT. A proposed duty on cotton wool was abandoned, owing to the opposition it met with from the manufacturers; and no other novelty in finance was proposed.

25. J. Drakard, of the Stamford News, for a libel on military flogging, sentenced to pay a fine of 200*l.*, be imprisoned 18 months in Lincoln gaol, and find security for good behaviour for three years afterwards.

June 6. Viscount Milton in the house of commons moved a resolution, censuring the restoration of the duke of York, by the prince regent, to the office of commander-in-chief. It was negatived by 296 against 47.

17. A national ecclesiastical council was opened at Paris, under cardinal Fesch, Napoleon's uncle. Its purpose was the supply of the numerous vacancies in the episcopal order, which the pope's determined refusal to institute the bishops of the emperor's nomination had occasioned.

A female, who had lately been in the poor-house at Bala in Wales, by a decree in chancery obtained the moiety of 150,000*l.*, as first cousin and next of kin to Mr. Jones of London, brandy merchant.

19. The regent gave a grand fête at Carlton-house to upwards of 2000 of the nobility and gentry, including the French princes and emigrant noblesse; rivalling in gaiety and splendour la vieille cour de Versailles. The public were admitted for several days afterwards to see the costly arrangements; the crowd was immense, and many accidents occurred; several ladies had their dresses torn from their backs, and were to be seen in groups in Carlton-gardens with dishevelled hair, and divested of much of their drapery, waiting a fresh supply of clothes.

28. The house of lords disallowed the claim of William Fitzharding Berkeley to the Berk ley peerage. By this decision the four eldest sons of the late earl were declared illegitimate, and the title devolved upon the fifth son, Thomas Morton Fitzharding, the first born in wedlock.

Tarragona surrendered to the French.

July 2. EARL STANHOPE'S BILL.—A discussion in the lords on earl Stanhope's bill, by which the passing of guineas for more, or bank notes for less than the current value was prohibited. It originated in lord King having demanded of his tenants payment in gold in lieu of bank notes. His lordship said he had adopted this precaution, in defence of his property, from that progressive depreciation of the currency, produced by the constantly-increasing issues of an inconvertible paper money, by the bank of England. Lord Lansdowne proposed that the circulation of the bank should not be increased beyond a fixed amount. Bill passed a third reading by 47 votes against 16.

4. King v. De Yonge.—Lord Ellenborough announced the opinion of the twelve judges in this case to be, that the defendant had not infringed the statute of Edward VI. in buying guineas at a price in bank notes above their reputed value. Judgment arrested.

24. Parliament prorogued. In the regent's speech, delivered by commission, strong approbation is expressed of those measures which enabled the government to prosecute the war with increased activity and vigour.

Much public indignation having been expressed at the frequency and severity of flogging in the army, a clause was inserted in the Mutiny Act of this year, giving to courts-martial a discretion they did not before possess, of substituting imprisonment in place of corporal punishment, when they should think fit.

The excessive heat of this month occasioned the conflagration of several forests in the Tyrol, with the consequent destruction of 64 villages, and the loss of 10,000 head of cattle.

Aug. 2. A brig arrived at Liverpool from Sierra Leone, owned and navigated entirely by negroes.

8. Eight newspapers suppressed at Paris.

26. CONQUEST OF JAVA.—Batavia, the capital of the Dutch settlements in the East Indies, with the whole island of Java in which it is situated, was added to our Eastern possessions. The expedition was fitted out at Madras under the direction of lord Minto, and the command entrusted to sir Samuel Auchmuty. It landed on the 4th, within twelve miles of Batavia, and on the 26th the works of Cornelis being gallantly carried, the Dutch commander, Jansens, agreed to the surrender of the whole island, together with the adjacent one of Madura, leaving not a vestige of oriental dominion to Holland.

Sept. 1. A comet of great brilliancy began to be visible in England, and continued to the end of autumn.

26. A well discovered in the keep of Dover castle, which exhibited a fine specimen of ancient masonry: it is five feet in diameter, and upwards of 400 feet deep. According to tradition, it is the identical well which Harold promised to deliver with the castle of Dover into the hands of William the Conqueror.

28. A pugilistic contest at Thistleton-gap, between Thomas Crib and Molneux a black: the former declared the victor. A French paper, copying an account of this exhibition, said, "Certainly the English nobility stand alone in their taste for this singular and degrading spectacle."

Oct. 10. At the quarter-sessions for Leeds a poor weaver appeared before the magistrates charged with deserting his wife and family. Upon being questioned he tried to justify his conduct on scriptural grounds; quoting the text that "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself;" thence inferring, that a stranger equally with his own children had a claim to the fruits of his industry. The bench in vain tried to persuade him that his own offspring required his first consideration; he obstinately adhered 'o the verity of his own interpretation in preference to that of the rest of mankind and the dictates of nature.

28. General Hill, by a forced march, surprised a French force at Arroyo del Molino, killing and capturing 2000 men, with all their artillery and baggage.

Nov. 11. The national society, for the education of the poor in the principles of the established church, instituted under the auspices of the regent.

30. RIOTS IN NORTHAMPSHIRE.—In this and the following month the interior tranquillity of the country was disturbed by a series of tumults in the district of the hosiery manufactory. They were occasioned by the discharge of many workmen, owing to the slackness of trade and the application of a wide frame for the weaving of stockings. Against these machines the attacks of the workmen were directed, their practice being forcibly to enter houses and break the frames. The riotous spirit extended into Derbyshire and Leicestershire, though the county of Nottingham was the centre of mischief. The rioters assumed the name of Luddites and acted under the authority of an imaginary Captain Ludd, which name appears not to have signified any individual, but a secret committee of management. In the ensuing year these outrages assumed such a dangerous character, that the legislature deemed it necessary to interfere with a new law for their suppression.

Dec. 7. HORRID MURDERS.—About twelve o'clock on Saturday night Mr. Marr, who kept a lace and pelisse shop in Ratcliffe-highway, sent out his servant to buy some oysters for supper while he was putting up the shutters. On her return she rang the bell, but nobody came to the door; she went to a neighbour, and they got into the house by a back-way, when they found Mr. Marr lying dead, near the window, with his skull broken, and Mrs. Marr also dead at the top of the stairs, shockingly mangled: the shop boy was lying on the counter with his brains dashed out, and an infant, only four months old, in the cradle with its throat cut. The perpetrators of this bloody business had been alarmed, seemingly, by the ringing of the bell, and suddenly escaped without carrying away any of the property. Mr. and Mrs. Marr had only been married eighteen months, and were highly respected.

13. A splendid specimen of Parisian typography has been dedicated to Buonaparte. It is an edition of Homer, in three volumes great folio, each consisting of 370 pages with the text only; 140 copies only were struck off. That presented to the emperor was on vellum.

19. Three other murders equalling in savageness those of the Marrs were perpetrated this night, between the hours of eleven and twelve o'clock, in New Gravel-lane, Ratcliffe-highway. Some wretches got into the residence of Mr. Williamson, who kept the King's Arms public house, and murdered Mr. Williamson, his wife, and his maid servant, and probably they would have committed other murders, had they not been disturbed at the alarm given by a lodger, who escaped from a window. A ruffian, of the name of Williams, was apprehended on suspicion, which he confirmed by hanging himself in prison; and he was buried in the public highway.

FRANCE.—The French emperor was this year chiefly occupied in plans for the entire exclusion of British commerce from the continent, and raising a navy that might be able to contend with England for the dominion of the sea. With this object was his scheme of a marine conscription, which consisted in converting the military to a naval conscription, in the thirty maritime departments of the empire. For the purpose of recruiting the navy, youths from the age of 13 to 16 were to be selected and trained to nautical manœuvres, and placed at the disposal of the minister of marine.

A.D. 1812. FRENCH WAR WITH RUSSIA.—This year was memorable for the commencement of the decline of the autocracy of Napoleon Buonaparte. By the Treaty of Tilsit, Russia had engaged to shut her ports against England, if she refused her offer of mediation; but though Alexander's mediatorial interposition was evaded by the English ministry, he never entered heartily into the continental policy of France. The English trade with Russia was too important to that empire to be readily renounced. Many of the nobility derived a great share of their revenues from the sale of products of which Britain was the principal market, and its connexion with the mercantile interest of England was extremely intimate. On this account English goods had never been committed to the flames in that country, and British colonial produce was admitted into the Russian ports on neutral bottoms. Other sources of difference arose between the two empires. Buonaparte never for a moment rested from his system of territorial aggrandisement. On the mere pretext of convenience the duchy of Oldenburgh was annexed to his northern frontier. Disagreements on these points produced the gigantic contest of 1812, into which the two powers, without any formal declaration of war, suddenly entered with a fixed resolve, on one side to conquer, and on the other never to submit. The results were the burning of Moscow, and the disastrous retreat of the French. In the peninsula also, they sustained great reverses, being defeated at Salamanca and compelled to retire from Madrid, which, however, they soon re-entered. Buonaparte having relaxed his Berlin and Milan decrees in favour of America, the example was followed, June 23rd, by the revocation of the British orders in council. They had produced great distress among the commercial classes; but unfortunately, five days before the revocation of the orders in council, the Americans had, by an act of Congress, declared war against England. The chief domestic occurrences of the year were, an unsuccessful attempt, after the death of Mr. Percival, to form a more liberal and efficient administration; the assembling of a new parliament; and disturbances on account of machinery, and the high price of provisions.

Jan. 3. By a decision of the court of Teinds, none of the established clergy of Scotland will have a smaller stipend than 150*l.*, and 80*s.* 8*d.* for communion elements, besides a messuage and glebe in the country parishes.

5. French repulsed at Tariffa.

7. Parliament opened by commission.

8. Valencia surrendered to the French, under Suchet, with 18,000 men, after a feeble defence by General Blake.

16. Mr. Percival moved resolutions for the settlement of the royal household under the regency, by which a considerable addition was made to the charge of the civil list. An additional provision was soon after made for the younger branches of the royal family.

18. Benjamin Walsh, M.P., a stock-broker, found guilty of stealing from sir T. Plumer 22 bank notes of 1000*l.* each. The case being reserved for the opinion of the judges, they determined that the stealing was not felonious: he was of course pardoned, but expelled the house of commons for a gross breach of trust.

19. Lord Wellington carried by storm Ciudad Rodrigo, and for which achievement the cortes conferred upon him the ducal title of Ciudad Rodrigo.

FRENCH EMPIRE.—According to the almanac of the French board of longitude, the population of the French empire amounts to 43,937,144. Of this number 28 millions speak the French language, 6,453,000 the Italian, 4,063,000 the Dutch or Flemish, 967,000 the Breton, and 108,000 the Basque. The population of the states connected with the system of France, in which number are included the kingdom of Italy, Switzerland, Spain, and the Confederation of the Rhine, is estimated at 38,141,541.

In the course of the month France, with 20,000 troops, took forcible possession of Swedish Pomerania.

Feb. 1. Restrictions on the prince regent ceased.

At the Leeds sessions several methodist preachers were refused licenses to preach, as required by the Toleration Act, on the ground that they were not attached to a separate congregation.

13. THE MINISTRY.—For some time the public mind had been entirely engrossed in speculating on the ministerial changes likely to ensue on the termination of the restrictions on the regency. In the course of the month all uncertainty on this subject was removed. On the 13th inst. the regent, in a letter to the duke of York, after expressing his satisfaction with the conduct of, and paying high compliments to his present advisers, declared that he "had no predilections to indulge, nor resentments to gratify;" intimating, however, a desire that his government might be strengthened, by the co-operating of those with whom his "early habits had been formed," and authorising the duke to communicate his sentiments to lords Grey and Grenville. As might have been, and probably was anticipated, these noblemen at once declined forming any part of an administration notoriously established on anti-catholic principles. In their joint reply to the duke of York, they said, "we must express without reserve the impossibility of uniting with the present government. Our differences of opinion are too many, and too important, to admit of such union. His royal highness will, we are confident, do us justice to remember, that we have already twice acted on this impression—in 1809, on the overture then made to us, under his majesty's authority; and last year, when his royal highness was pleased to require our advice respecting the formation of a new government." Prior to this correspondence, marquis Wellesley had communicated his intention of relinquishing his official situation, avowedly, because he found Mr. Percival's preponderance in the cabinet becoming too decided. He now, therefore, resigned the seals of foreign secretary, which were entrusted, on the 25th, to lord Castlereagh.

March 6. Daniel Eaton tried and convicted of blasphemy, in publishing some of the writings of Thomas Paine: it was his sixth prosecution, and upon being brought up for judgment, in May, he was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment, and to stand in the pillory.

14. Treaty of alliance concluded between France and Austria, stipulating the mutual guarantee of their territories, and of assistance in case of attack. A similar treaty with Prussia was ratified on the 5th at Berlin.

18. Public signature of the new constitution for Spain; 184 members of the cortes signed two copies of this instrument, and upon the 20th took the oath of fidelity, in which they were joined by the members of the regency.

19. DEATH OF JOHN HORNE TOOKE, M.A.—This gentleman had long been known in the political world, and distinguished himself in a newspaper contest with the masked champion Junius. After laying aside his clerical function he attempted to prepare for the bar, for which he was well qualified, but was refused admission to the inns of court. He was a strenuous partisan of Wilkes, though they quarrelled when Wilkes sought to make his patriotism subservient to the payment of his debts, by raising a public subscription for the purpose. Mr. Tooke was an active promoter of the various societies instituted for the attainment of parliamentary reform, and was one of the accused in the State Trials of 1794, when he conducted himself with spirit and ability. He was twice a candidate for Westminster in opposition to the aristocratical interests of that city. For a short time he was in parliament, but entered too late in life to acquire distinction, and his eligibility was objected to on the ground of being in holy orders. His "Diversions of Puiley" acquired him much celebrity as an acute and original philologist. The enjoyment of his hospitalities at Wimbledon used to be impaired by his fondness for personal satire, in which he occasionally indulged at the expense of his guests, under cover of a most imperturbable countenance. He was in his 76th year, and though few men had suffered more from bodily pain, and undergone more enmity and obloquy, he always spoke of life as a source of enjoyment.

26. Caracas swallowed up by an earthquake: at 4 p. m. the city stood in all its splendour, a few minutes later 4500 houses 19 churches, besides public buildings, were crushed to atoms, burying in their ruins 8000 inhabitants.

Apr. 6. Badajoz carried by storm. In the siege of this place the allies, under lord Wellington, lost 4550 men. The French garrison, with its commander Philippon, became prisoners of war.

ATTACKS ON MACHINERY.—The disturbances among the manufacturing classes, which began last year in the hosiery district, had extended into the neighbouring counties. Their chief seat was the cotton district of Lancashire and part of Cheshire, and the clothing district of the west riding of Yorkshire. They had now assumed an alarming aspect; men went about armed and disguised in the night, destroying not only the machinery but the property of individuals. A system of organization and military training was adopted, and secret oaths administered. Near Huddersfield, a principal manufacturer was shot in broad day, in the public highway, by four Ludlites; and a mill, defended by soldiers, was attempted to be stormed in the night by an armed multitude: several of the assailants were killed and wounded in the attack. At Manchester, three persons were shot, without any knowledge or even suspicion who were the murderers. There were also riots in the west of England, and in other parts, occasioned by the uncommonly high price of provisions. These outrages were fortunately confined to the country. The metropolis was free from popular tumults, though the frequency of murders, burglaries, and street robberies, induced the legislature to institute inquiries into the state of the police.

30. A drawing-room held by the queen, after an interval of two years: in the evening a splendid entertainment was given by the regent at Carlton-house.

May 9. Buonaparte left Paris to join the grand army in Poland.

11. ASSASSINATION OF MR. PERCIVAL.—During the examination of evidence at the bar of the house of commons, relative to the orders in council, the Chancellor of the Exchequer entering the lobby about five in the evening, a person named Bellingham fired a pistol at him, the ball of which pierced his heart. He staggered, fell, and in a short time expired. The assassin was found to be a Liverpool broker, who having sustained some commercial losses in Russia, for which he thought the government was bound to procure redress, and his memorials on the subject being disregarded, he had worked up his gloomy mind to the monstrous conviction that he was justified in taking away the life of the prime minister. Bellingham was tried at the Old Bailey, and on the 18th executed: he met death with firmness; was attentive to religious rites, but refused to express any contrition for his crime. The untimely death of Mr. Percival drew forth a strong expression of sympathy, and an ample provision was made by parliament for his widow and family. His loss, however, was more a private than public calamity. He was a respectable lawyer, possessed of more subtlety than wisdom; had been a vehement supporter of the war; was superficial in knowledge, and intolerant in his notions.

15. The government of Buenos Ayres prohibited the importation of slaves; expressing their existing inability to abolish slavery in the state without violating the rights of property, and letting loose on society a set of people debased by their abject situation.

19. General Hill assaulted and took Almaraz.

26. At Felling coal-mine, near Gateshead, 93 persons killed by an explosion of hydrogen gas. On the preceding day, in a coal-mine at Orrel, near Liverpool, ten persons were killed by an explosion.

June 9. LIVERPOOL MINISTRY.—The negotiations which had been going on since the death of Mr. Percival, for the reconstruction of the ministry, were at length terminated. The whigs, by their untractable demeanour, seem to have lost a favourable opportunity for expelling the remnants of the no-popery faction from power, and establishing themselves in authority. After the loss of his colleague, lord Liverpool sought to strengthen the ministry by a union with the marquis Wellesley and Mr. Canning, but these gentlemen were favourable to the catholic claims, and the overture was unsuccessful. Pending the negociation, the house of commons came to a resolution (May 21st.) to address the regent to form a strong and efficient administration; thus implying that, in the opinion of parliament, a ministry should be formed of a liberal character. The task of reconciling the jarring elements was consigned to the marquis Wellesley, but lord Liverpool and the whigs at once refused to succumb to the premiership of this nobleman, who resigned his undertaking in despair, lamenting that "the most dreadful personal animosities," and "questions the most complicated," interposed difficulties that could not be surmounted. Lord Moira was next entrusted with the irksome duty, and coinciding with lords Grey and Grenville in political sentiment, it was thought every obstacle to a final adjustment was removed. These noblemen, however, evinced considerable fastidiousness, if not haughtiness, on the occasion. Not satisfied with the concession to them by the regent of all the leading questions of policy, they claimed to interfere with the royal household, and to demand dismissals there which had never before, under similar circumstances, been required. Upon this point Mr. Canning made a curious disclosure in the house of commons. Lord Moira, having put directly to the prince the question, "Is your royal highness prepared, if I should so advise it, to part with all the officers of your household?" the answer was, "I am." "Then," said his lordship, "you shall not part with one of them." (Ann. Reg. liv. 90.) This sally determined the prince to retain his old ministers, and in consequence the country, for the ensuing 18 years, continued to be governed by a tory, in lieu of a whig administration. The amusing part of the narrative is, that lord Yarmouth, and his father, the marquis of Hertford—the lord-chamberlain and vice-chamberlain, whom the whigs wished to remove—had intended to resign immediately they had accepted the seals of office. The earl of Liverpool's ministry was constituted as follows:—

Earl of Liverpool, First Lord of the Treasury.

Nicholas Vansittart, Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Viscount Melville, First Lord of the Admiralty.

Viscount Sidmouth, Home Secretary.

Viscount Castlereagh, Foreign Secretary.

Earl Bathurst, Colonial Secretary.

Earl of Buckinghamshire, President of the Board of Control.

Marquis of Camden, no office.

These formed the cabinet. Not of the cabinet were—

Viscount Palmerston, Secretary at War.

Earl Clancarty, Board of Trade.

F. Robinson, Treasurer of the Navy.

Lord C. Somerset and Charles L. Long,

Joint Paymasters-General of the Forces.

Earl of Chichester and Earl of Sandwich, Joint Postmasters-General.

Richard Wharton and Sir Charles Arbuthnot, Secretaries to the Treasury.

Sir W. Grant, Master of the Rolls.

Sir Thomas Plumer, Attorney-General.

Sir William Garrow, Solicitor-General.

Both the parliament and the public acquiesced in the new arrangement, satisfied apparently that the regent had not been to blame, and the earl of Moira, whose chivalry had mainly brought it about, was appointed governor-general of India.

15. Two rioters, found guilty by a special commission, executed at Chester, and eight at Manchester.

16. The total number of incumbents in England and Wales found to be 10,261; of whom 4421 are resident, and 5840 non-resident.

17. At the sale of the library of the duke of Roxburgh, the Decameron of Boccaccio, a single volume in small folio, printed in 1471, was knocked down to the marquis of Blandford for 2260*l.*

18. The congress of the united states of America declared war against England. This determination was carried in the representative chamber, by 79 against 49; the votes for war being chiefly from the southern states to Pennsylvania, inclusive; those for peace from the eastern and northern, beginning with New York.

A new constitution established in Sicily, upon the model of that of England, under the auspices of lord William Bentinck, the captain-general of the island. The king voluntarily resigned his authority to his son, as regent. The queen, who headed a party in opposition to this change, and who had wickedly proposed to Buonaparte to make a second Sicilian vespers of the English, was sent into retirement.

22. Mr. Canning moved, and lord Castlereagh seconded, a resolution, that the house of commons would next session take into consideration the state of the laws respecting the catholics; which was carried by a majority of 225 to 106 members. On a similar resolution proposed in the upper house, the previous question was put by lord Eldon, and carried by only 126 to 125 peers.

23. The orders in council of January 7, 1807, and of April 26, 1809, revoked in respect of America, in consequence of the revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees. It caused general rejoicing in the manufacturing districts, and an immediate impulse was thereby given to trade.

EXPEDITION INTO RUSSIA.—Napoleon had now fairly entered on his great enterprise. After passing through Dresden, and visiting in rapid succession Dantzic and Königsberg, he reached on the 23rd the Niemen, the frontier river of Russia. Upon this line upwards of half a million of soldiers were assembled, some thousands of provision-waggons, innumerable herds of oxen, and 1372 pieces of artillery. A proclamation to the army announced the opening of the campaign. Buonaparte told them, in his usual confident and laconic style, that the "second Polish war would be glorious to the French arms like the first. Russia is driven onwards by fatality; let her destinies be fulfilled, and an end put to the fatal influence which for the last fifty years she has had on the affairs of Europe. Let us cross the Niemen, and carry the war into her territories." On the other side vast preparations had been made. Alexander, and under him Barclay de Tolly, his minister of war, a wary and calculating German, directed the Russian forces, amounting to about 300,000. Upon the bank of the Niemen Napoleon's horse stumbled, and threw him on the sand. "That," said some one, "is a bad omen: a Roman would go back." Buonaparte expected and sought a battle; the Russians retreat. Their plan was to draw the invaders from their resources, to make a stand only in favourable positions, to weary them with endless marches over parched and sandy plains, trusting to the increasing difficulties of advance and the inclemencies of the season to stop their career.

30. Mrs. Siddons took her leave of the stage in an address written by Mr. Horace Twiss, after performing her favourite character of lady Macbeth, at Covent-garden.

EXTRAORDINARY CALCULATOR.—The curiosity of the public was much excited during the last three months by the extraordinary powers of calculation in an American child, under eight years of age, named Zerah Colburn. (Ann. Reg. liv. 507.) He was altogether unversed in the common rules of arithmetic, and could not perform upon paper a simple sum in multiplication or division, but by an internal operation of his own mind readily solved very difficult questions in ciphering. He not only determined the exact number of minutes or seconds in any given period of time, but discovered with remarkable despatch the square or cube root of very high numbers. Being asked to raise the number 8 up to the sixteenth power, he named the last result, 281, 474, 976, 710, 656, and was right in every figure. He was asked the square root of 106,929, and before the number could be written down, he answered 327. In numbers consisting of two figures, he would raise some of them to one-sixth, seventh, and eighth power, but not always with equal facility. He had a method of finding out a prime number, or a number incapable of division by any other, in a way peculiar to himself, and unknown to mathematicians.

July 1. The prisoners of war in England amounted to 54,517; of whom 52,649 were French, the remainder Danish.

18. Peace concluded with Russia; and by another treaty with Spain, the emperor acknowledged the authority of the Spanish cortes.

22. The count and countess d'Entraignes were savagely murdered at their house at Barnes, by an Italian servant, who immediately after committing the atrocious deed blew out his own brains with a pistol. He had only lived three months in the family, and was under orders to leave. The count was a French emigrant, and distantly related to the Bourbon family.

22. VICTORY OF SALAMANCA.—This was one of lord Wellington's most brilliant military triumphs. In their efforts to out-flank the allies, the French weakened their left and centre. The vigilant eye of the English general marked the error, and an attack was immediately ordered in force. After an obstinate resistance the enemy were everywhere driven from the field. Two eagles and 11 pieces of cannon were the trophies of victory. On both sides the loss in killed and wounded was considerable; that of the Anglo-Portuguese was 5200; that of the French much greater, exclusive of 7000 prisoners. Marshal Marmont was wounded, and four French generals killed. In the course of the year lord Wellington was appointed commander-in-chief of the Spanish armies, in place of Ballasteros.

Aug. 12. The English entered Madrid where they were joyfully received by the inhabitants.

16. The Americans, under general Hull, having invaded Upper Canada, were surprised at fort Detroit, and forced to surrender prisoners of war, to the amount of 2500, to the British, under general Brock.

17. The illuminations in London, on account of the battle of Salamanca, began and continued three nights.

Battle of Smolensko, between the French and Russians, after which the latter continued their retreat, first setting fire to the town. Marshal Kutusoff, who had returned covered with laurels from the Turkish war, assumed the command of the Russians.

19. Conflict between the English frigate Guerriere, captain Dacres, and the American frigate Constitution, captain Hull, in which the former, after a gallant struggle, owing to the superior weight of metal of the American, was forced to strike.

25. The French retired from before Cadiz, after bombarding it at intervals for two years and six months: the raising of the siege was one of the results of the battle of Salamanca.

27. A combined force, under general La Cruz and colonel Skerrett, expelled the French from Seville.

Sept. 7. BATTLE OF BORODINO.—This was one of the most sanguinary of Napoleon's battles. The hostile armies were estimated at 125,000 men each. That of the Russians was strongly posted on all the heights, in a semicircle of two leagues' extent, from the Mosqua to the old Moscow road, and defended by entrenchments. The attack commenced about sunrise, and continued till near nightfall. Few prisoners were taken, but the field exhibited the horrid spectacle of 40,000 men killed or mortally wounded, among them forty-three French generals; and on each side 55,000 cannon-balls were fired. The victory, if such it was, was dearly bought, and won by the French marshals. After the battle had raged with dreadful slaughter for some hours, there was a general cry for the guards to advance and finish the conflict. Buonaparte hesitated; he ordered the guards to advance, then commanded them to halt: he said, "he could not see clearly the state of his chess-board; that the hour of his battle had not yet come; that it would begin in two hours." But it never began: he kept aloof from the bloody strife, walking backwards and forwards, in evident mental and bodily anguish, for he was labouring under an attack of dysury. This is count Segur's representation, who was in the grand army. Murat declared, "That in this great day he had not recognised the genius of Napoleon." Ney was furious, and asked, "What business the emperor had in the rear?" Eugene said, "he had no conception of what could be the reason of the indecision of his father-in-law." In the evening of the 6th an express reached Napoleon, informing him of the defeat of Marmont at Salamanca.

15. BURNING OF MOSCOW.—After the terrible battle of the 7th, the French were impatient to reach the capital of Old Russia, where they expected to rest from their toils in peace and good winter quarters. About mid-day on the 14th the turrets of Moscow, glittering in the sun, were described. Immediately after news arrived that "Moscow was deserted." The French emperor was incredulous. Murat and his cavalry were the first to enter within the walls. They found every thing uninjured but inanimate. The only signs of life were a few straggling men and women, mostly drunk, and of disgusting aspect. In fact, the city had been entirely abandoned by order of the governor, count Rostopshin. All that had been left were the criminals and lunatics, who had been set free, and bands of incendiaries. A globe of fire, raised over the palace of prince Trubetskoi, was the signal to commence the conflagration. Immediately a dense smoke began to issue from a thousand places; houses that had been thought uninhabited, the exchange, bazaar, and other public edifices, burst into flames. Everywhere was heard the explosion of shells and combustibles. Russian police-officers were seen stirring up the fires with lauces dipped in pitch, and frantic men and women roaming amid the flames with flambeaux in their hands, spreading the work of destruction. Buonaparte, accompanied by the king of Naples, prince Eugene and Davoust, narrowly made their escape through burning streets, and from the elevated heights above the Kremlin, beheld in astonishment the whole extent of the capital around them a waving sea of fire. Napoleon at first had thoughts of stopping the progress of the flames, and ordered several of the incendiaries to be shot; but the plan was too well laid to be frustrated. Five-sixths of the houses of Moscow were of wood, and only one-tenth of the entire city was unconsumed. The terrible catastrophe saved the empire of Alexander, and destroyed that of its daring invader.

29. PARLIAMENT DISSOLVED.—A proclamation to this effect was unexpected, as parliament had nineteen months to run before its legal expiration, and no urgent reason seemed to call for its dissolution. The recent pledge given by the house of commons, to take into consideration next year the catholic claims was the chief motive assigned; but the more probable is, that the prince regent considered his assumption of the full exercise of the regal functions as equivalent to the commencement of a new reign. Whatever was the object the opposition gained no accession of strength by the appeal to the nation. In the metropolis, and the towns of Bristol and Liverpool, the candidates in that interest were defeated. The case in the latter showed the predominance of political feeling over commercial considerations; the electors rejecting the candidate who had been mainly instrumental in procuring the repeal of the orders in council, in favour of him who had taken an active share in their promulgation.

Oct. 10. New theatre Drury Lane opened, with an address written by Lord Byron, and delivered by Mr. Ellistson.

13. War declared against the United States of America.

19. Buonaparte began his retreat from Moscow.

25. The English frigate Macedonia, captain Carden, captured by the American frigate United States, after a desperate fight of two hours, in which the former had 104 men killed and wounded. Our naval disasters with the Americans were ascribed to the superior size, weight of metal, and number of men in their frigates, which made them equal in force to British ships of the line.

27. A man lighting the lamps on Blackfriar's-bridge was, by a sudden gust of wind, blown into the river and drowned.

Nov. 24. New parliament met, when the house of commons unanimously re-chose Mr. Abbot for speaker.

The Austrian prince of Latour Taxis, in celebrating the marriage of his daughter at Vienna, expended 46,000*l*. The festivities were kept up for three weeks. On certain days the guests took the diversion of hunting, for which purpose fifty of the largest wolves that could be procured were purchased, at an expense of 80*l*. each.

30. Parliament opened by the prince regent, who delivered his first speech from the throne. Amendments to the address were moved in both houses; in the lords by marquis Wellesley, and in the commons by Mr. Canning, but there was no division. A grant of 100,000*l*., to be laid out in land, to the duke of Wellington, the renewal of the gold-coin bill, and of 200,000*l*. for the relief of the sufferers at Moscow, were the chief parliamentary business previous to the Christmas recess.

Dec. 9 John and Leigh Hunt tried by a special jury for a libel on the prince regent, in the Examiner: they were defended by Mr. Brougham; but the jury, being strongly charged by chief-justice Ellenborough, they were found guilty. Upon the defendants being brought up in the following term to receive judgment, they were sentenced to two years' imprisonment, one in Coldbath-fields, the other in Surrey county gaol, to pay a fine of 500*l*. each, and find security for their good behaviour for five years.

RETREAT FROM MOSCOW.—The French remained nearly five weeks at Moscow, not leaving it till the 19th of October. This procrastination was the ruin of the army. The Russians were astonished at the apathy with which they waited the approach of their mighty winter, that they expected every moment to set in, and urged them to fly. "In a fortnight," they were. "Your nails will drop off, and your bones will fall from your stiff and half-dead bodies." The novelty of misfortune confounded the French emperor, and he was loth to bend to its stroke. He tried in vain to draw the enemy into a negotiation: his letters and messengers were received, but no answer returned by the inflexible Alexander. Around him the enemy was daily increasing in strength, especially in cavalry, and it was not till Murat had been defeated, and the first snow had fallen, that Napoleon determined on his retreat. The grand army was still formidable. Napoleon had entered Moscow with 90,000 effective men, and 20,000 sick and wounded: he quitted it with 100,000 effective men, 50,000 horses, 550 field-pieces, and 2000 artillery-waggons, exclusive of a motley host of followers, amounting to 40,000. All the plunder of Moscow that could be saved from the fire was carried off, together with the gigantic cross of Ivan the Great, for which the Russians had a superstitious veneration, connecting with it the safety of the empire. Their route lay through 300 miles of country already devastated. The French, not liking the Scythian mode of warfare, wrote to their opponents to carry it on less barbarously; but Kutusoff replied, that "he could not restrain the patriotism of the Russians." From that time both sides burnt the towns they left, to deprive the other of shelter. Disasters soon befel the French. By suddenly taking the new road to Kalouga, Buonaparte hoped to elude his pursuers; but there, to his dismay, on the 23rd of October, he found 120,000 men ranged in an unassailable position. A council of war was held in a weaver's hut, the result of which was, that it was necessary to retrace their steps towards Moscow, and advance by the way of Mojaisk towards Smolensko. This route brought them over the plain of Borodino, where they found the unburied remains of the 40,000 victims of that terrible day. It had all the appearance, says Segur, of an extinguished volcano. A trampled waste, covered with the stumps of trees, heaps of half-devoured bodies, fragments of broken armour, drums, and flags, torn, and dyed in blood. A murmur of horror ran through the ranks, and the hideous scene was hurried over. After passing the Kalouga, the winter began to do its work: alternate frost, sleet, and snow, made the weather insupportable. The night bivouacking became dreadful; every resting-place was a vast cemetery of men and horses. Whole trains of the latter were wont to drop at once in harness: in one night 30,000 horses perished. Overcome by cold, hunger, and fatigue, the soldiers died by hundreds, or helplessly gave themselves up by thousands to the sword or mercy of the Russians. Travelling mostly in a carriage, close wrapped up, Napoleon escaped many of the hardships of his followers: he hurried forward to Smolensko, in the midst of his guards, where he arrived on the 9th of November, having three days before heard of the wild conspiracy of Mallet, and two other ex-republican generals at Paris, to overturn his government. Immense difficulties still remained to be surmounted, the Russians concentrating at all points to cut off the retreat. On the 21st he learnt that they had taken Minsk and Borisoff. He had now, in the face of the enemy, to pass the Berezina, a river of great width, with marshy banks. Astounded by the perils around him, the emperor struck the ground with his staff, exclaiming, "It is written in heaven, that henceforth every step shall be a fault." He acknowledged to Daru their situation was calamitous, and commanded him to destroy all the reports of his ministers, lest they should fall into the hands of the Russians. But by a rare piece of dexterity he succeeded in deceiving Tchitchakoff, and passed the Berezina at an unexpected ford, discovered to him by a Polish officer, not, however, without losing nearly the whole of his remaining baggage and artillery. After taking leave of his marshals at Smorgony, December 5th, Napoleon privately withdrew from the army, and narrowly escaped on the same night falling into the hands of a Russian detachment. He reached Warsaw on the 10th, and Paris on the 19th, two days after the publication of his twenty-ninth bulletin. Murat was left in chief command, and continued the retreat to Wilna, from which they were soon forced to retire by the advancing Russians. Fatigue, cold, and hunger continued to the last to make dreadful havoc, and immense numbers perished in the hospitals for want of needful assistance. The Russians never relaxed in the pursuit till they reached the Vistula, and hardly a day elapsed in which they did not make prize of some of the fugitives. Up to the 26th instant, they estimated their captures at 41 generals, 1298 officers, 167,510 privates, and 1131 pieces of cannon. On both sides, including the inhabitants that perished from the burning of the towns, and from the compulsory evacuation of Moscow by its vast population, probably the lives of half a million of adults were sacrificed in this destructive campaign. The grand army was annihilated. Napoleon, says count Segur, entered Orcha with 6000 guards, the remains of 35,000; Eugene, with 1800 soldiers, the remains of 42,000;

Davoust, with 4000, the remains of 70,000. The rest strewed their leader's bloody track from the Niemen to Moscow,—

There shall they rot—Ambition's honour'd fools!

Yes, honour decks the turf that wraps their clay!

Vain sophistry! in these behold the tools,
The broken tools, that tyrants cast away
By myriads, when they dare to pave their way

With human hearts—to what?—a dream alone!

20. Napoleon, seated on the throne, gave audience to the senate and council of state, from whom he received the usual adulatory addresses. He reminded them that the rallying cry of their fathers was, The king is dead—long live the king. He cautioned them against legislating on the basis of metaphysical ideas, which had done so much mischief in France, in place of accommodating laws to the knowledge of the human heart and the lessons of history. (Ann. Reg. liv. 184)

The mendicity society was this year instituted.

PATENTS AND DISCOVERIES.—Mr. Miers of the Strand, for a method of generating heat without fuel.

Mr. Blenkinsop of Leeds, Yorkshire, for a locomotive engine, for conveying coals and other minerals.

Mr. Cooke for a machine to teach blind people music.

Chain cables were introduced into the navy.

Mr. Brande found the quantities of alcohol in different kinds of wine as follow:—Champagne 20, port 20 to 24, Madeira 19, claret 15, cyder and perry 12, ale 9, brown stout 8, porter 6.

A.D. 1813. LIBERATION OF GERMANY.—The contrast between the advance of the French into Russia, and of the Russians into Germany was great. The former was weakened by every forward movement, the latter received an accession of strength. It was force, not the ties of interest or inclination, that held together the several parts of the French empire, and immediately the compression was removed they sought to regain their former positions. Prussia was the first to join the emperor of Russia. The crown-prince of Sweden next abandoned his system of neutrality, and being placed at the head of the armies of the North issued a proclamation, calling on his troops to restore liberty to Europe. Against these three powers the French emperor opened the campaign. He was at first successful, but the issue being still doubtful he acceded to an armistice. At the expiration of the armistice Austria joined the allies, who, having settled their plan at Prague, advanced in full force and attacked Napoleon in Dresden. They were defeated with great loss, and compelled to retreat into Bohemia. But from this time the tide of fortune changed. General Vandamme was surprised and lost his whole corps; Macdonald shared the same fate, and marshal Blucher and the crown-prince beat the French opposed to them. At Leipsic Buonaparte concentrated his entire strength, and was completely routed. At this juncture Bavaria joined the allies, and Wurtemberg, another member of the Rhenish confederation, followed the example. Buonaparte was surrounded with enemies, and with great difficulty he forced his way to Mentz with the wreck of his army. Arriving at Paris in November, he soon received tidings of a counter-revolution in Holland, that Hanover was lost, Trieste possessed by the Austrians, and that the English, under Wellington, had invaded the south of France. The gigantic French empire was dissolved, and Europe emancipated.

Jan. 10. Fourteen Luddites executed at York.

11. By a senatus consultum 350,000 men were placed at the disposal of Buonaparte, to supply the losses of the Russian campaign.

25. A concordat signed between the French emperor and the pope at Fontainebleau. Differences had for some time subsisted between them, which Buonaparte, in the existing posture of affairs, wished to conciliate, and he paid a private visit to his Holiness for the purpose; but the Pope subsequently complained of having been overreached.

Feb. 1. Louis XVIII. issued an address to the French nation, calling upon them to throw off the yoke of the usurper.

18. MARITIME RIGHTS.—Immediately after the Christmas recess, the papers regarding the American war were laid before the house of commons. Among them was a declaration of the prince regent, which was important as comprising the principal maritime claims, which Britain was determined to maintain. The points which it was declared would never be conceded were—That any blockade is illegal, which has been duly notified, and is supported by an adequate force, merely because of its extent and the non-investment, at the same time, by land: that neutral trade with Britain can be made a crime, subjecting ships to be denationalised; the right of Britain to search neutral vessels in time of war, and to impress her own sailors found on board. An address was voted on the 18th, approving the maintenance of these rights, and the war with the United States.

22. A bill introduced for the appointment of a vice-chancellor, which had become necessary, owing to the arrear of business in the court of chancery. It became law, and sir T. Plumer was the first vice-chancellor appointed.

25. On the motion of Mr. Grattan, the resolutions for an inquiry into catholic grievances were carried by 264 to 224; but a bill founded upon them was lost, chiefly from the opposition of Mr. Abbot, the speaker.

Mar. 3. Mr. Vansittart proposed some financial resolutions, the tendency of which was an appropriation of part of the SINKING FUND to the public exigencies. This being the first encroachment on the notable provision of Mr. Pitt for the reduction of the national debt, and the chief boast of his fiscal administration, they excited considerable interest.

A treaty was laid before parliament, by which it appeared that the crown prince of Sweden had agreed to join the confederacy against France with 30,000 men, on condition that Prussia would guarantee to Sweden Norway in exchange for the loss of Finland. Norway had for ages been united to Denmark, and had no wish to be so transferred; but England became party to the compact, stipulating her naval co-operation, and also the payment of a subsidy of one million. All Britain obtained for her aid was the privilege of exporting her manufactures to Sweden for twenty years, subject only to a duty of one per cent.

15. An interview at Breslau, between the emperor Alexander and the king of Prussia. The king wept. "Courage, my brother," said Alexander, "these are the last tears that Napoleon shall cause you to shed."

16. Prussia declared war against France.

22. CHARTER OF THE EAST INDIA COMPANY.—A great many petitions had been presented during the session, praying for a dissolution of the commercial monopoly of the East India Company, on the approaching renewal of their charter. On the 22d the subject was brought before parliament by lord Castlereagh. After the examination of witnesses and a long discussion, an act passed renewing the privileges of the company for twenty years, but throwing open the trade to the East, that to China only remaining exclusively in the company. The territorial and commercial branches of the company's affairs were separated. The king was empowered to appoint a bishop in India, and three archdeacons to be paid by the company.

27. Mr. Pitt's monument in Guildhall opened: the inscription is by George Canning, M. P.

The conduct of the princess of Wales became this month a subject of investigation. It was found blameless, and the city of London presented to her royal highness a congratulatory address.

Apr. 13. Sir John Murray, with an Anglo-Spanish force, defeated marshal Suchet, with the loss of 3000 killed and wounded.

15. Buonaparte left Paris to open the campaign of Saxony. He tried before his departure to re-animate the spirit of the nation, by publishing a flattering exposé of the state of the empire, and appointed the empress regent. A great many German fortresses had surrendered to the allies, and Hamburg and Lubec had thrown open their gates.

28. The remains of Charles I. discovered in the vault of Henry VIII. at Windsor, enclosed in a plain leaden coffin, bearing an inscription, "King Charles, 1648."

Prince Kutusoff died: he was succeeded in the command of the Russian army by Wittgenstein.

May 2. Battle of Lutzen between the allies and Buonaparte. The loss supposed to be equal, about 10,000 killed and wounded on each side. Neither could claim a victory, but the allies retreated. On the eve of the battle marshal Bessieres was killed by a spent cannon ball.

5. A bill introduced by Mr. W. Smith, for the relief of those who deny the Trinity: it became a law, and it was a proof of growing liberality that the measure met no marked opposition in the lords, nor from the ministers or bishops; the archbishop of Canterbury merely observing that "the bill had not been called for by any attempt to impede the worship of the unitarians, or to enforce the existing laws against them."

Battle of Bautzen in Silesia. It lasted two days; the French losing 12,000 in killed and wounded. No great advantage was gained by either side. The students of the German universities, in the allied armies, and the young conscripts of Paris, rivalled each other in valour. After the battle a cannon-ball killed general Kirchener, and mortally wounded marshal Duroc, who was standing near the French emperor. In Duroc and Bessieres Buonaparte lost two of his most faithful officers and attached friends.

31. Mr. and Mrs. Bonnr, residing at Chislehurst, near London, savagely murdered with a poker by their Irish footman, who assigned no reason for the deed, further than that the idea struck him in the night, that he must kill his master and mistress.

June 1. Captain Broke, of the Shannon frigate, having perfected his men in discipline, offered battle to the United States frigate Chesapeake, a fine ship of 49 guns, fully manned. The American, nothing loth, bore down on his foe off Boston lighthouse. The ships were soon in close contact, when, captain Broke discerning an opportunity, gave orders for boarding, himself setting the example. The conflict was bloody but short: in fifteen minutes the Chesapeake was mastered and carried off in triumph by the victor.

Breslau entered by the French.

4. An armistice agreed to between Buonaparte and the allies, through the intervention of Austria. During the suspension of hostilities, Napoleon, either to amuse himself or others, or to throw an air of gaiety over the difficulties of his position, sent for the French actors to Dresden, which he made his head-quarters. He had now changed his tastes, seeming to prefer comedy to tragedy, which is easily understood.

21. Battle of Vittoria; the combined force, under lord Wellington, defeating the French, commanded by King Joseph, assisted by marshal Jourdan, with the loss of 151 pieces of cannon and 415 waggons of ammunition. The loss of the allies was 700 killed and 4000 wounded; that of the French must have been equal, exclusive of prisoners. The victory was important in its results; the French, being sharply pursued, retreated across the Bidassoa into France.

July 20. A grand festival in Vauxhall-gardens, to commemorate the victories of lord Wellington; the duke of York presided.

22. Parliament prorogued.

31. The French, under marshal Soult, recrossed the Bidassoa and attacked with vigour the right wing of the allies at Roncesvalles, a place famous in history for the defeat of Charlemagne and all his peers. Although Soult succeeded in forcing this position, he failed in the attempt to relieve Pampeluna, and the French again retreated beyond the Pyrenees.

Aug. 10. The armistice in Saxony abruptly terminated, when Austria joined the allies.

26. Lord Whitworth, the new viceroy of Ireland, arrived in Dublin.

27. BATTLE OF DRESDEN.—Buonaparte had made Dresden the centre of his operations, where he had assembled a force of 220,000 men, that of the allies amounting to upwards of 300,000. Emboldened by superiority of numbers, the allies, on the 26th, determined to carry Dresden by escalade, but after a furious onset were forced to retire. Next day Napoleon became the assailant, marching out of the town and attacking the enemy in their positions. The rain fell in torrents, and after an obstinate conflict the allies retreated into Bohemia. It was on the 27th general Moreau had both his legs shattered by a cannon-ball, which passed through his horse, while talking to the emperor of Russia. He had only a short time before arrived from America, on the invitation of the crown-prince of Sweden, to afford to the allies the benefit of his councils. Moreau survived his disaster only a few days, dying from exhaustion.

31. St. Sebastian taken by storm after an obstinate resistance; the allies under Wellington losing 2300 in killed and wounded.

Sept. 6. The crown-prince of Sweden defeated marshal Ney, with the loss of 12,000 men killed, wounded, and prisoners.

Near four years ago the house of Mr. Smith, a jeweller in London, was robbed of emeralds, rubies, &c., to the amount of 1600*l*.; they were found in this month in a ditch in the Kent-road.

A caravan of 2000 persons from Maschah to Aleppo, in crossing the desert, overwhelmed by the sand, and not more than twenty escaped.

Oct. 1. The commissioners of Public Records discovered the Charta de Foresta of 14 Henry II.

At Pompeii, the portico of the theatre discovered, and many coins of Domitian in high preservation.

5. The allies pressing upon Dresden from all sides, Buonaparte was compelled to quit it, retiring towards Leipsic. Previous to this a French column of 10,000 men, under Vandamme, had been surprised in Bohemia, and the indefatigable Blucher had succeeded in driving back Macdonald and Victor from Silesia.

8. Bavaria joined the allies, by which 50,000 troops were detached from France.

18. BATTLE OF LEIPSIC.—The operations of the war had brought the vast armies of both sides into the vicinity of Leipsic. The French were estimated at about 180,000 men; the allies at 250,000. On the night of the 15th rockets were seen ascending, announcing the approach of Blücher and the crown-prince of Sweden. At day-break, on the 16th, the French were assailed along their southern front with the greatest fury. Failing to make any impression, Napoleon, in his turn, assumed the offensive. The centre of the allies was broken, and Murat, pouring in with his cavalry, completed the disorder. At this moment Alexander ordered forward the Cossacks of his guard, who, with their long lances, bore back the mass of cavalry, that had so nearly carried the day. Meanwhile, Blücher, with a superior force, had overpowered Marmont, taking from him his artillery and 2000 prisoners. The battle of the 16th did not cease till night-fall, when the French found it necessary to contract their position, drawing nearer the walls of Leipsic. During the night Buonaparte sent general Mehrfeldt, who had been made prisoner, with proposals for an armistice. No answer was returned. The 17th was spent in mutual preparations, without actual hostilities. Next morning the conflict was renewed by the allies, with increased impetuosity. The Austrians, under prince Schwartzenberg, formed the left of their line; in the centre were the Russians under Barclay and Wittgenstein; the Swedes and Prussians forming the right. From an eminence called Thörnberg, behind the centre of his army, Napoleon commanded a view of the field of battle. Till two o'clock the fighting continued, and the inhabitants of Leipsic, from the walls and steeples, could not discern which side had the advantage. At that moment the allies, by a sudden dash, forced their way headlong into Probstsheida, the central position of the French. The camp-followers now began to fly, when Buonaparte, leading on a reserve of the Old Guard in person, the village was recovered. On the left, however, there had been great disasters: Ney, overpowered by Blücher and the crown-prince, had tried to form afresh at an eminence called Heiterbic; when, just at the time, seventeen battalions of Germans, chiefly Saxons, deserted to the enemy. This loss could not be repaired; and at the close of the battle the French retreated under the walls of Leipsic. Their losses, on the 18th, amounted to 40,000 killed, wounded, and prisoners, with 65 pieces of cannon. Leipsic was no longer tenable, and the French, in the night, began to retreat towards Weissenfels. The king of Saxony offered to treat for the capitulation of Leipsic, but the allies refused to wait, entered the city sword in hand, and before noon the emperor Alexander, the king of Prussia, and Bernadotte, met in the great square, amidst the acclamations of the inhabitants. Arriving at the Elster, the French lost the whole of their rear-guard, owing to the bridge having been mistakenly blown up, before it had passed; and the brave Polish prince Poniatowski perished in the river in trying to escape. With the remains of his army Buonaparte continued his retreat towards the Rhine. At Hanau general Wrede, with the Bavarians, tried to intercept his progress; after some hard fighting the French forced a passage. November 2nd, Napoleon reached Mentz, with not more than 70,000 men; the remains of nearly 300,000, which he had a few months before led to the Elbe and the Oder.

Nov. 1. The French, in their retreat from Moscow, left behind them 1195 pieces of cannon, which the emperor ordered to be employed in two colossal pillars at Moscow and Petersburg, to commemorate the defeat of the invaders.

4. Parliament opened by the prince regent. The speech referred to the treaties concluded with the allies, and exultingly dwelt upon recent events; but it was yet moderate in its tone; declaring "that no disposition to require from France sacrifices of any description inconsistent with her honour or just pretensions as a nation would ever be on his part, or on that of his majesty's allies, an obstacle to peace." Addresses passed without opposition.

9. Buonaparte arrived at Paris.

12. The French garrison at Dresden, to the number of 40,000, surrendered to the Austrians. Stettin, with a garrison of 7000, followed the example. Before the end of the year nearly the whole of Germany was liberated.

15. At Amsterdam the people rose in a body, deposed the French authorities, and proclaimed the sovereignty of the house of Orange. On the 23rd a body of Cossacks entered the city.

20. The Helvetic confederacy, of which Buonaparte was mediator, proclaimed a neutrality. But the Austrians informed the Swiss this could not be respected; it was necessary to prove themselves independent of foreign influence before they could be deemed neutral.

28. The prince of Orange embarked for Holland: 10,000 Dutch prisoners were liberated, and sent over to aid the efforts of their countrymen.

Dec. 1. The allied sovereigns issued from Frankfurt a declaration explanatory of their views, evincing in their successes a very laudable moderation. "Victory," they said, "had conducted them to the banks of the Rhine, and the first use which they made of it was to offer peace. They desired that France might be great and powerful; because, in a state of greatness and strength, she constituted one of the foundations of the social edifice of Europe. They offered to confirm to the French empire an extent of territory which France, under her kings, never knew. Desiring peace themselves, they wished such an equilibrium of power to be established, that Europe might be preserved from the calamities which for the last twenty years had overwhelmed her."

2. General Blücher crossed the Rhine.

11. By way of embroiling matters in Spain, Buonaparte liberated Ferdinand VII., recognising his title to the Spanish throne.

20. Parliament adjourned to March 1st. Before the adjournment, a bill was passed, allowing three-fourths of the militia to volunteer into the line, on payment of a bounty; and a supplementary loan of 22 millions was granted. In the present conjunction of affairs, it was thought, both in and out of parliament, that no sacrifice could be too great to bring the contest on the continent to a speedy and desirable issue.

27. Viscount Castlereagh left England, to join the allied sovereigns, with full instructions to watch over British interests.

28. The legislative body counselled Buonaparte to issue a counter-manifesto to the Frankfort declaration, distinctly stating the sacrifices he was disposed to make for the repose of Europe. To this he returned a haughty answer, accusing them of seeking to draw a line between the interests of the sovereign and the people. He reproached them with aiming at changes in the constitution while the enemy was crossing the frontier. "You visionaries," he exclaimed, "are for guarantees against power. I am the only representative of the people; I am the state. If France desires another species of constitution, let her seek another monarch." To the counsel of state he complained in angry terms of the legislative body. "They stun me," said he, "with their clamorous demands for peace. Instead of assisting me with all their efforts, they seek to obstruct mine." On the 31st he suddenly dissolved that assembly.

30. The American general Hull defeated by general Rial on the Niagara frontier. Buffalo and the village of Black-rock were afterwards committed to the flames. Sir G. Prevost, in a proclamation, represented these severities as retaliations for the destruction practised by the Americans in their invasion of Upper Canada.

31. A remarkably dense fog, which extended for fifty miles round London, and continued for eight days: it was followed by a heavy fall of snow, and a frost that lasted six weeks.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—Henry Redhead Yorke, a political writer of some celebrity. Weiland, 80, author of "Oberon," and a celebrated German writer. William Huntington, S.S., 69, a popular preacher among the evangelical dissenters, who built a chapel for him in Gray's-inn-lane. Granville Sharpe, 79, eminent for his philanthropy and love of liberty. Henry James Pye, 69, the poet laureate: the laureateship was offered to Walter Scott, who declined it in favour of his friend Robert Southey. At Paris, the Abbé Delille, French poet. Alexander Wilson, the American ornithologist. Edward Long, 76, author of a history of Jamaica. Augusta duchess of Brunswick, 76, mother of the princess of Wales.

A.D. 1814. RESTORATION OF THE BOURBONS.—This year exhibited, in an extraordinary degree, the vicissitudes of warfare. Only eighteen months had elapsed since the French armies were conquerors at Moscow, and their being defeated under the walls of Paris, and compelled to purchase, by capitulation, a humiliating retreat behind the Loire. Most of the ancient princes, who had been driven from their thrones or their territories during the last quarter of a century, recovered possession of them by an unexpected change of fortune. Among the restored sovereigns were Louis XVIII. of France, Ferdinand VII. of Spain, the king of Sardinia, the prince of Orange, the elector of Hanover, and the Roman pontiff, Pius VII. Napoleon Buonaparte, who had heretofore astonished the world by his extraordinary successes, now became an object of not less interest by his rapid and overwhelming miscarriages. Urged by a vain ambition, he had sought to scale the pinnacle of universal empire, and like Phaeton, was suddenly struck headlong from his dazzling course. From being the dictator of continental Europe he became a pensioner of the Bourbon government, an exile on the rock of Elba, where, with the unmeaning title of emperor, a palace, guards, court-etiquette, and other regal pageantry, he was permitted to exercise a miniature sovereignty, in apparent mockery of his former grandeur. England was intoxicated with joy at the fall of her inveterate foe, which was heightened by a visit from the allied monarchs, and the return of the heroes of the Peninsular war. Amidst the general exultation, there was only one drawback—one dark spot—the aged monarch of the realm still kept his lonely watch-tower, unconscious of the unlooked-for triumph of the cause for which he had pertinaciously struggled up to the last gleam of expiring intellect.

Jan. 2. The allied armies crossed the Rhine at different points, between Coblenz and Basle. The French marshals Marmont, Mortier, Ney, and Victor, retired before the invaders, whose vast force, amounting to 300,000 men, enabled them to march with confidence into the interior, blockading the fortresses in their rear. By the middle of the month Blücher had taken possession of Nancy, and the Austrians were at Langres.

After a brave and protracted defence, general Rapp surrendered Dantzic to the allies, with its garrison of 11,800 men and 13 generals.

5. Joachim Murat, king of Naples, the brother-in-law of Buonaparte, signed a treaty with England, by which he engaged to co-operate with the allies against France.

12. Sir T. Graham and the Russians, under Bulow, defeated the French near Breda, compelling them to retreat towards Antwerp.

14. Denmark joined the allies, and agreed to cede Norway to Sweden, in exchange for Swedish Pomerania and the isle of Rugen.

17. The river Thames frozen over and booths erected upon it. The snow laid so deep as to impede the mails and other conveyances, causing a great stagnation of business. The thermometer, exposed to a north-eastern aspect, stood 19 degrees below the freezing point.

24. The thaw commenced.

25. The French emperor left Paris to join his armies. He advanced to St. Dizier, on the Marne, and immediately directed attacks upon the corps of the allies collected around him.

Feb. 1. Battle of Brienne, between Napoleon and general Blücher: the force on each side was about 80,000, and both claimed the advantage: the result, however, was the retreat of the French. Troyes was entered by the allies, on the 7th, and Chalons-sur-Marne, evacuated by marshal Macdonald. The progress of the allies threatened speedy ruin to the French emperor, who, finding himself unable to meet their superior numbers in every quarter, determined to concentrate his force at particular points, and, striking home blows in succession, cut off their communications, and destroy them in detail. With this view, he first precipitated himself upon Blücher, whom he forced to retire to Chalons, interrupting his communication with the Austrians. In the interim, however, Soissons was taken by assault by Winzingerode, and the Austrians, under Schwarzenberg, were advancing upon Paris in the direction of the Seine. Sens was taken on the 15th, and Fontainebleau, on the 16th. To this quarter Buonaparte now turned his attention, and, forcing the Austrian position on the Seine, he re-entered Troyes on the 23rd in triumph.

4. Negotiations for peace opened at Chatillon between the French and the allied powers.

7. Mary Anne Clarke sentenced to nine months' imprisonment, for a libel on the Irish chancellor of the exchequer.

10. The crown-prince of Sweden, with his army, reached Cologne.

12. The custom-house of London burned down, with most of the adjoining warehouses. Three lives were lost, with many books, bonds, and documents, of importance.

22. A fraud practised at the stock-exchange by Randon de Berenger and others, in which lord Cochrane was implicated—a pretended express from Dover, announcing the death of Buonaparte and the accession of Louis XVIII. The stocks rose ten per cent, by which the contrivers of the cheat sought to profit by selling out.

25. Lord Wellington defeated Soult at Orthes, and, on the following day, crossed the Adour.

Mar. 1. Treaty of alliance and subsidy concluded between Britain, Austria, Russia, and Prussia, at Chaumont.

4. The allies re-entered Troyes.

7. Battle of Craonne, between the French and Blücher. It began at day-break: marshals Ney and Victor fought at the head of the infantry; the latter was wounded, together with generals Grouchy and Nanquety. The French were left masters of the field, which was covered with dead.

9. Battle of Laon, in which Napoleon was defeated, with the loss of 5000 prisoners, by the united corps of Winzingerode, Bulow, and Blücher. Buonaparte was not present in any other engagement, during the war.

10. A man at Monmouth confessed himself guilty of a murder, for which he had been tried and found innocent 27 years before.

Sir Thomas Graham attempted to take Bergen-op-Zoom, but was repulsed with a great slaughter of the British.

12. Marshal Beresford entered the city of Bordeaux. It was the result of a counter-revolutionary movement of the citizens, headed by the mayor Lynch, who hoisted the white cockade, declaring for the Bourbons. The duke d'Angoulême, nephew of Louis XVI., entered the city with the British troops, and was received with acclamations.

18. NEGOTIATIONS AT CHATILLON.—These negotiations had been in progress.

from the time the allies had entered France. Buonaparte, through his minister, Caulincourt, at first proposed an armistice; but this was rejected, as an expedient to gain time; and the immediate signature of preliminaries of peace was demanded. The course of the Rhine, leaving Belgium to Austria: the chain of the Alps, leaving Savoy to France; and the Pyrenees, were designated as the permanent boundaries of the French empire: Italy was to be the subject of future arrangement with Austria. On the 25th of February, two days after Napoleon's triumphant entry into Troyes, he received the overtures of the allies: either elated by his temporary success, or loth, as others state, to leave France less than he found her, he rejected peace on these terms; engaging, however, to send a contre-projet on the 10th of March. It was not received till the 15th, when it was found to demand frontiers for France which the allies alleged to be incompatible with their security and the equilibrium of power they purposed to establish. It also demanded Italy for prince Eugene; and that other members of the Buonaparte family should be "placed on foreign thrones." (Belsh. Hist. Geo. III. & IV., 107.) This scheme of the French emperor was peremptorily rejected; and the negotiations at Chatillon declared on the 18th to be at an end.

21. British parliament met.

The French defeated at Arcis-sur-Aube. The next point to which the French and allied armies were now directed was Vitry, where Napoleon was to be joined by the corps of Ney and Mardonald. But the French emperor suddenly changed his plan, taking the road to St. Dizier. He pushed between the Prussian and Austrian armies, and thought by menacing the rear of the latter to alarm them for their communication with the Rhine. The design was penetrated by an intercepted letter, and failed. While Napoleon was pursuing his "wild-goose chase" in the rear, the allied generals determined to unite their forces, amounting to 200,000 men, and, dividing them into three columns, march direct to Paris.

27. The head-quarters of the grand army of the allies fixed at Coulomier.

28. Blucher crossed the Marne at Meaux.

31. ALLIES ENTER PARIS.—On the 29th the corps of Marmont and Mortier retreated to the capital, and the empress-regent, with the king of Rome, having retired to Blois, Joseph Buonaparte issued a proclamation urging the Parisians to a brave defence. Early the next morning the French army, with 10,000 volunteers from the national guard, and the pupils of the Polytechnic school (amounting altogether to about 30,000 bayonets), took up a position upon the heights of Montmartre, and awaited the attack of their opponents. It was not long delayed, and a furious conflict ensued: the arrival of Blucher, however, with the Prussians, decided the fate of the day. Further resistance being hopeless against the overwhelming numbers of the enemy, Marmont and Mortier, with the concurrence of Joseph Buonaparte, offered to capitulate. About midnight the terms of the capitulation were agreed to, by which it was settled the French troops of the line should evacuate the capital on the 31st, carrying with them all their military appurtenances. On the same day the emperor of Russia and king of Prussia entered Paris, amidst loud acclamations. At the suggestion of Talleyrand and the abbé de Pradt a declaration was immediately issued by the emperor Alexander, in the name of the allies, explicitly affirming that they would no more treat with Napoleon Buonaparte or any of his family; that they respected the integrity of France as it existed under its legitimate kings; and that they would recognise and guarantee the constitution which France should adopt. The French emperor, who had advanced near the bridge of Charenton, and near enough the enemy to discern the light of their bivouacs spread over the plain of Villeneuve St. George, finding all was lost, retired to Fontainebleau.

Apr. 1. The French senate assembled, under the presidency of prince Talleyrand, and passed a decree for a provisional government, consisting of five persons, the president himself being at the head. By a second decree it affirmed that in a constitutional monarchy the monarch exists only in virtue of the constitution. It next proceeded to prove how Buonaparte had violated the constitution: that he had "forfeited the throne, and that the hereditary right established in his family was forfeited."

4. Buonaparte signed his abdication of the French throne in favour of his son; this not being deemed sufficient, in a few days he signed a second abdication, renouncing the throne intirely for himself and "heirs." The unsuccessful movement of Napoleon in the rear of the allied armies, and his wilful demeanour, deprived him of the cordial support of the French marshals, who were anxious to detach themselves from his fortunes. Marmont appears to have been the first to desert him, his corps being led to Versailles by general Sarrazin, Buonaparte's person was in the power of the allies.

5. Prince of Orange installed sovereign of the Netherlands, at Amsterdam.

10. BATTLE OF TOULOUSE, lord Wellington defeated marshal Soult. The action was a severe one, and several thousand lives lost on both sides, owing to the non-arrival of news of the events in Paris, which Wellington did not receive till the 12th. Soult evacuated Toulouse on the night of the 10th, and next day the white flag was hoisted.

11. Treaty signed between the allies and Buonaparte, by which the island of Elba is ceded to him in full sovereignty, with the imperial title for life; a pension was also granted to him of 2,000,000 of francs, and 2,500,000 more to his relatives, payable out of the revenues of France. Had Napoleon demanded Corsica, instead of Elba, named, by his own acknowledgment, "in the humour of the moment," (Las Cases's Journal, iii. pt. iii. 348), it would have been conceded to him without hesitation.

14. In a desperate sally of the French from Bayonne, general sir John Hope was wounded and taken prisoner, and general Andrew Hay killed. This was the last action of the Peninsular war.

17. Genoa surrendered to the British, commanded by lord W. Bentinck, under flattering promises of liberty and independence.

20. Louis XVIII. entered London in great state from his rural retreat at Hartwell, attended by the life-guards, many of the king's carriages, and accompanied by the prince-regent, upon whom he conferred the order of St. Esprit, on his arrival at Grillon's hotel. Here he kept his court, and was congratulated by the lord mayor and citizens of London, and by most of the nobility.

21. Buonaparte left Fontainebleau for Elba. Upon his way he met marshal Augereau, whom he accused of infidelity in the command of the army intrusted to him. The marshal, in return, reproached Napoleon with betraying the army and France; and that he had not "courage to die the death of a soldier." (Belsh, Hist. xiv. 116.)

24. Louis XVIII. embarked for Calais, convoyed by the duke of Clarence; the prince-regent, and many of the nobility taking leave of him at Dover.

28. Buonaparte embarked at Frejus for Elba.

May 1. The marquis of Wellington created a duke, for his great services in the Peninsula. An annuity of 13,000*l.* settled upon him by parliament, and a grant of 300,000*l.* to purchase a suitable estate and mansion.

2. The states-general of the united provinces, assembled at the Hague, took the oath to their new constitution, formed on a representative model of England.

Louis XVIII. entered Paris: he was favourably received by the inhabitants, but the soldiery were silent.

4. Ferdinand VII. dissolved the Spanish cortes, and caused several of its most distinguished members to be arrested. He entered Madrid on the 14th, and was received with every demonstration of attachment by the inhabitants, despite of his constitutional antipathies. Measures were forthwith adopted for re-establishing the Inquisition, and restoring every other institution, civil and ecclesiastical, to its former state.

5. Pius VII., in a proclamation from Cezena, assumed the ancient title of "God's vicar on earth," and spoke of his temporal sovereignty as essentially connected with his spiritual supremacy.

17. The Peninsular generals Beresford, Hill, Cotton, Graham, and Hope, elevated to the peerage; the two former by their family names; the three latter as lords Combermere, Lyvedock, and Niddry.

26. Hamburg recovered its municipal government and independence, under the patronage of the allied sovereigns.

30. TREATY OF PARIS.—The terms of this celebrated compact were liberal towards France, assuring to her the boundaries existing January 1st, 1792, with some additions of territory on the side of Belgium, Germany, and Savoy. The navigation of the Rhine was declared free, and the German states to be independent, united by a federal league. Switzerland to continue independent, under its own government. Italy, out of the Austrian limits, to be composed of sovereign states. England restored all her conquests to France, with the exception of Tobago, St. Lucie, and Mauritius. Malta was confirmed to her; and France engaged to erect no fortifications in India, and to co-operate with Britain in procuring the abolition of the slave-trade. Farther dispositions were referred to a congress, to be assembled at Vienna, and to which each power engaged to send a plenipotentiary.

June 3. The empress Josephine buried at Ruel: she was born in 1763, and married to Napoleon Buonaparte in 1797. The emperor Alexander had visited her several times at Malmaison; and Buonaparte, at St. Helena, always spoke of Josephine as uniting sweetness of disposition with singular grace and accomplishments.

Irish catholic board suppressed by proclamation.

4. A constitutional charter delivered by Louis XVIII. to the legislative body, differing in some points from that framed by the senate.

8. VISIT OF THE ALLIED SOVEREIGNS.—The emperor of Russia, with his sister, the duchess of Oldenburgh, and the king of Prussia, and his two sons, attended by various persons of distinction, arrived in London; prince Metternich, generals

Blucher, Barclay de Tolly, Platoff, the hetman of the Cossacks, &c. The metropolis was illuminated, and became a scene of great gaiety during the three weeks' stay of the royal visitors. Splendid and costly entertainments were given to the illustrious strangers by the corporation of London, and by the merchants and bankers, at Merchant Tailors' hall. Westminster-abbey, the bank, the dock-yards and arsenal at Woolwich, were visited, amidst a vast concourse of people. The emperor Alexander acquired great popularity by his affability, as well as by the magnanimity of his recent conduct. The Prussian monarch appeared rather dejected: it was ascribed to the recent loss of the queen, who never recovered the mortifying disasters of the war of 1806, when, according to her own emphatic expression, "La mémoire du grand Frédéric nous a fait égarer."

20. Grand review in Hyde-park.

21. Lord Cochrane, De Berenger, and others, who were tried on the 8th, for a conspiracy, by false reports, to raise the price of the public funds, received their sentences. His lordship was sentenced to pay a fine of 500*l.*, to stand in the pillory, and be imprisoned for twelve months. The severity of this sentence, and the deportment of the chief-justice Ellenborough during the trial, turned the tide of public feeling entirely in the accused nobleman's favour; particularly when persecution was traced to the active part lord Cochrane had recently taken in the political world, in opposition to the ministers. The infamous part of the punishment, the pillory, was remitted; but his lordship's name was erased from the roll of the Knights of the Bath, and he was expelled from his seat in the house of commons. The electors of Westminster, however, unanimously re-elected him, expressing, at the same time, a strong opinion in favour of his innocence.

25. Grand naval review at Portsmouth.

27. The allied sovereigns embarked at Dover for the continent.

July 4. PRINCESS OF WALES.—The income of the princess of Wales was raised to 50,000*l.*, but at her own request, in a letter to the speaker of the house of commons, it was limited to 35,000*l.* During the stay of the royal visitors the disputes of the princess and the regent had become very prominent, especially after the public declaration of the prince, that he "would not meet his royal highness upon any occasion, either public or private." The princess Charlotte, her daughter, it was expected, would have been affianced to the prince of Orange; but to this union she had a decided aversion, and actually ran away from Warwick-house, in a hackney-coach, to avoid it. The prince-regent was incensed at her refractoriness, and never forgave the duke of Sussex the share he had in breaking off the match; and the regent went on a sudden to the residence of the princess, and dismissed all her servants. Her mother, the princess Caroline, then obtained, contrary to the advice of Mr. Whitbread, Mr. Brougham, and others, permission to make a tour on the continent.

9. A thanksgiving for peace. The prince-regent and two houses of parliament went in state to St. Paul's.

21. The regent gave a superb fête at Carlton-house, in honour of the duke of Wellington. 2500 persons present.

22. Admiral William Bradley found guilty of forging letters to defraud the revenue. He was sentenced to death, which was commuted for banishment.

30. PARLIAMENT PROROGUED.—The business of the session had not been important. Sir Samuel Romilly succeeded in carrying bills for taking away corruption of blood in felony, and of disembowelling in the punishment of traitors. Lord Morpeth's motion of censure on the speaker for an improper advertence to the rejection of the Roman catholic bill of last session was negatived. The subject of the cor-laws was discussed, but any definite legislation upon them was deferred. Mr. Peel, the Irish secretary, introduced a bill, which passed into a law, for the better preservation of the peace in Ireland. It was occasioned by the existence of outrages in some parts of the country, of which the most savage were perpetrated by the carders; so called from their application of wool-cards to the skin and flesh of the objects of their vengeance. In the debates on this measure observations were made on the orange societies, and of the attempts made to establish similar associations in England.

Aug. 1. A grand jubilee in the parks, to commemorate the return of peace. A Chinese bridge was thrown over the canal in St. James's-park, upon which a superb pagoda was raised, for the display of fireworks. In the green-park a magnificent temple of concord was erected, with a gallery for the foreign ministers, and other persons of distinction. On the Serpentine was a miniature representation of a sea-fight, between the English and Americans, in which the latter were beaten! Mr. Sadler ascended in his balloon. The fair in Hyde-park was continued several days, and only one accident occurred to damp the festivities,—the burning of the pagoda bridge.

7. A bull of the pope re-established the order of the Jesuits. By another act, of the 15th, his holiness, after lamenting the destruction of the monastic communities, provided for the restoration of the monks to their convents. The renovation of the festivals observed at Rome, prior to its incorporation with the French empire, was another indication of the prevalent spirit.

24. BURNING OF WASHINGTON.—The war against the United States was continued with varied results. In an attempt to take fort Erie the British were repulsed, with the loss of 900 men killed and wounded. An enterprise, planned by sir A. Cochrane and general Ross, against the city of Washington, was more successful. Arriving within five miles of the capital, the British found the Americans, to the number of 8000, strongly posted; but they fled on the first onset. Washington was entered the same evening; and immediately after the object of the expedition was entered upon, by the destruction of the president's house, dock-yard, arsenal, war-office, and other public buildings. A frigate, ready to be launched, and a sloop of war, were also destroyed. On the 30th the troops re-embarked.

Sept. 11. A British naval force attacked the American flotilla, before Plattsburg, on lake Champlain; but after a severe conflict were all captured, except some gunboats. In consequence of this disaster, sir G. Prevost abandoned his design of penetrating into the state of New York, leaving his sick and wounded to the mercy of the enemy.

13. General Ross killed before Baltimore, and, the Americans having made vigorous preparations, the intention to treat that city the same as Washington was frustrated.

Oct. 11. The electorate of Hanover erected into a kingdom, under the rule of the British sovereign. The electoral function had ceased by the dissolution of the Germanic empire, and the imperial throne of Austria becoming hereditary. The reason assigned by the prince-regent for the change was the wish to facilitate the general arrangements of the allied sovereigns, by assimilating the electorate to Bavaria and Wirtemberg, which had been erected into kingdoms.

13. A gentleman's gardener at Leighton Buzzard, having had his green-house robbed, sat up therein to watch, but in the morning was found dead, destroyed by the mephitic gas.

15. One of the large vats in the brew-house of Meux and Co., St. Giles's, burst, and demolished two houses; 3500 barrels of beer were lost, and four persons killed.

On the 10th, Quintin, of the 10th hussars, acquitted by a court-martial of the charges of cowardice and incapacity. The prince-regent confirming this sentence, several officers of the hussars were transferred to other regiments.

19. The East India brigade disbanded.

20. A large majority of the Norwegian diet assented to the annexation of Norway to Sweden. This amicable issue was produced by the politic conduct of the crown-prince of Sweden, who accepted the constitution framed by the diet.

25. Mr. George Canning appointed ambassador extraordinary to the prince-regent of Portugal. At this time there was no court at Lisbon, and the appointment is represented to have been created for the convenience of the honourable gentleman, whose son was unwell, and required a warmer climate.

29. A man crushed to death on the top of a coach, by imprudently sitting there when passing under a gateway.

Nov. 1. The congress of Vienna met to complete the settlement of Europe: lord Castlereagh attended on the part of England.

8. The autumnal session of parliament was opened by the prince-regent; but nothing important occurred prior to the recess. The usual addresses in each house were carried without a division.

Dec. 3. John Hankey, F.A.S., who had been missing since August, was found in his chambers, in Gray's-inn, almost devoured by flies. He was in affluent circumstances, but extremely penurious, and never admitted any person into his chambers.

4. At a methodist chapel in Manchester, on a false alarm of the gallery giving way, two women were killed, and many severely injured.

10. Lord French, in a fit of insanity, shot himself at Dublin.

The earl of Roseberry recovered 15,000*l.* damages from Sir H. Mildmay, for crim. con. with the countess.

12. At Myfod, in Montgomeryshire, twelve cattle having eaten of some branches of the yew-tree, six of them were found dead near the spot.

20. A riot at the theatre, Dublin, which continued some nights. Mr. Richard Jones, one of the managers, obliged to withdraw from the concern.

21. Peace concluded between Britain and the United States of America, at Ghent. The disputes respecting territorial boundaries were to be determined by commissioners, mutually appointed. No mention was made by either side of the claim of maritime rights that had originated the war.

26. Genoa annexed to the Italian dominions of the king of Sardinia. Hopes had been held out by the British government that Genoa would form a separate and independent state; but this, it was alleged, would weaken the system the Vienna congress had determined to establish in Italy. On the same plea Venice was annexed to the Austrian empire.

27. DEATH OF JOHANNA SOUTHGOTT.—During the whole summer, and up to the present, public curiosity had been intensely excited by the delusions of this singular enthusiast. The believers in her divine mission were found in most parts of the kingdom; and, in the metropolis and its vicinity alone, are supposed, at one time, to have amounted to 100,000. She was born about 1750, of humble parents, and, being carried away by the fervour of a heated imagination, gave herself out as the woman spoken of in Revelations.—(Gorton's Biog. Dict. ii. 921.) In this, her assumed capacity, although totally illiterate, she scribbled much mystic and unintelligible verse and prose, in the way of vision and prophecy, and carried on a lucrative trade in seals, which were to procure the purchasers salvation. Being attacked by a disorder which gave her the appearance of pregnancy, that, too, was turned to account, and she unhesitatingly announced herself encreinte of the promised Shiloh. Several clergymen of the established church, a physician, and engraver of eminence, with many others, whose education ought to have preserved them from such weakness, became the dupes of her misconceptions. A cradle, of the most expensive materials, swaddling clothes, &c., were got ready for the reception of the miraculous babe; and, in the manufacturing towns of the north, large crowds assembled to wait the arrival of the coaches, in expectation of tidings of the great event. About the end of the year the unhappy visionary began to have misgivings concerning the real nature of the signs by which she had been misled, and expressed her conviction that she had been "the sport of some spirit." Death, on the 27th, terminated her perplexities, and a subsequent anatomical inquiry discovered the seat of her disorder. Many of her followers, however, remained unconvinced, and some are still to be found unshaken in their credulity.

A.D. 1815. RETURN OF NAPOLEON FROM ELBA.—The unexpected return of Buonaparte to France seemed to endanger the entire settlement of the preceding year. The juncture chosen for this extraordinary enterprise was both favourable and the reverse. It was favourable as respects the state of the popular sentiment in France, and the temper of the French soldiery; but it was the contrary as respects the condition of the foreign powers. Their vast armies were undisbanded; and the allied sovereigns themselves, or their ministers, were assembled in congress at Vienna. No time was requisite for negotiation, and the resolution was promptly taken for expelling the intruder by one vigorous and united effort. The struggle was short, but decisive; and the victory of Waterloo again placed the destinies of France at the mercy of the allies. Pending the hundred days of Napoleon's restoration, the constitutional party of France, consisting chiefly of the middle ranks, did not take a decided part on either side. A short trial had convinced them that the Bourbons were unsuited to the government of the French nation; neither had they a wish for the return of the military despotism of the emperor, which, despite of his constitutional professions, they felt to be inseparable from his character; and they were loth to risk the return of anarchy by again attempting to realise the abstractions of republican rule. In this state of uncertainty they accepted what the fortune of war, a second time, awarded to them—Louis XVIII. The exile of Napoleon to St. Helena, the disbanding of the remains of his army, and the exemplary punishment of his chief adherents, with the military occupation of France for five years by the allies, afforded substantial guarantees against reaction. The pride, rather than the welfare of France was hurt by her reverses; her industry, intelligence, rich soil, and fine climate remained, and, aided by these, she speedily rallied under her misfortunes. If the war had left her weak, her neighbours were not less so. All exhibited symptoms of exhaustion, and none more than that power to which the rest had been accustomed to look for unstinted resources. Britain fought and paid for the general interests of Europe, and the chief return has been envy of her riches and commercial greatness.

Jan. 2. The prince-regent increased the knights of the order of the bath, dividing them into three classes; 72 grand crosses, 180 knights commanders, and an unlimited number of companions.

8. Intelligence of the peace concluded in Europe not having been received, the war between the English and Americans continued, and the vicinity of New Orleans was the scene of a sharp conflict. The Americans, under general Jackson, had taken up a strong position within six miles of the city, having a canal in front, their right resting on the Mississippi, and their left on a thick wood. The British advanced to the attack in face of a destructive fire from every point of the enemy's line, in the midst of which general Pakenham was killed, and generals Gibbs and Keene wounded. Disordered by these disasters, the troops retreated, with the loss of 2000 killed, wounded, and prisoners.

15. The American ship President, commander Decatur, captured. It closed a naval war with America, which had been conducted on both sides with great spirit and enterprise.

18. The remains of Louis XVI. and queen Antoinette exhumed, and deposited with much ceremony in the cathedral of St. Denis.

31. A duel at Bishop's-court between counsellor O'Connell and Mr. D'Esterre, in which the latter was killed. It arose from Mr. O'Connell having called the corporation of Dublin a "beggarly corporation;" which Mr. D'Esterre thought fit, as a member thereof, to resent.

Feb. 9. Parliamentary session began.

17. Mr. Frederick Robinson brought forward his resolutions on the corn-trade; the scope of which was to prohibit the importation of wheat, when the price was under 80s. a-quarter. They became the foundation of a law, which excited much popular discontent, and was wholly inefficient; for an unusually abundant harvest at home reduced the price below the standard, leaving the farmer to struggle with the difficulties resulting from cheap bread and high rents.

19. Candy, the capital of Ceylon, taken by the British troops, under general Brownrigg.

23. The union of Belgium with Holland effected, under the guarantee of the allied sovereigns; and in consequence the prince of Orange assumed the regal title.

28. Tumults in the metropolis, on account of the corn bill: they continued upwards of a week, and at one time bore a serious aspect, but were quelled by the intervention of the military.

Mar. 1. Buonaparte landed at Cannes, in Provence, with about 1000 followers, French, Corsicans, Poles, Neapolitans, and Kluge. At first no disposition appeared to join the invader, and a party of his guards, whom he sent to take possession of Antibes, were made prisoners by the governor. Advancing rapidly towards Grenoble, he was joined by colonel Labedoyere, who commanded the 7th regiment of the line, and had been sent to oppose him. The impulse thus given, in a manner, decided the contest. At Lyons, which he reached on the 10th, he was received with enthusiasm. He wrote to marshal Ney, who was posted at Lons le Souldier, with 12 000 men, to come and join him. The marshal had volunteered his service to Louis XVIII., and promised to bring Napoleon, "like a wild beast in a cage, to Paris." Carried away by the impulse of the moment, he went over to his old companion in arms, and forthwith issued a proclamation to his troops, informing them that the cause of the Bourbons was for ever lost. This step was decisive. Buonaparte's remaining progress was an uninterrupted triumph. A show of resistance was made at Melun, and a body of troops and national guards were assembled, under the command of MacDonald. In the afternoon an open carriage was seen, advancing at full gallop through the forest of Fontainebleau, attended only by a few hussars—it was Napoleon, who, leaping out, was soon in the midst of the ranks drawn up to oppose him. Cries of—"Vive l'empereur!" rent the air. At nine in the evening of the 20th, he reached the Tuileries.

13. The allied sovereigns declared that Buonaparte had placed himself out of the pale of civil and social relations, and, as a disturber of the general tranquillity, had rendered himself liable to the public vengeance.

19. Louis XVIII. withdrew from Paris, and established his court at Ghent.

20. Lord Cochrane, who had escaped from the king's bench, was arrested in the house of commons, and carried back to prison.

25. By a treaty concluded at Vienna, Great Britain, Russia, Austria, and Prussia, bound themselves to maintain the treaty of Paris, May 30, 1814; and for that purpose each to keep in the field 150,000 men, and not to lay down their arms till Buonaparte should be deprived of the power of exciting disturbances.

Apr. 4. Buonaparte addressed a circular to the European sovereigns, announcing his accession to the French throne, and the departure of the Bourbons. He received no answer; by some his letter was returned unopened.

5. An East Indianman burnt, in consequence of a candle setting fire to a cask of rum: in less than an hour she sunk. 20 lives were lost.

6. Disturbances at the dépôt, Dartmoor.

The American prisoners attempted to escape; and, armed with knives, attacked the guard, who were compelled to fire, and killed seven and wounded thirty-five. A coroner's inquest brought in a verdict of justifiable homicide.

23. Buonaparte published what he entitled "an additional act to the constitution of the empire." It was to be submitted to the free acceptance of France, and contained every safeguard to liberty that could be desired in a mixed monarchy. Had such an instrument been a voluntary emanation from him, in the height of his power, and not extorted by his present exigencies, he might have been confided in, and ranked among illustrious legislators.

May. DEFEAT OF MURAT.—The king of Naples was of the number of those who deserted the French emperor after the battle of Leipsic, in 1814, and formed an alliance with Austria. Murat was a brave soldier, but fickle, restless, and void of political wisdom. Pending the territorial arrangements of the Vienna congress, he felt some uneasiness respecting his own kingdom; and it subsequently appeared that Talleyrand had proposed to the English ministry, who were bound to him by treaty, a joint attack upon Naples. Of Buonaparte's landing in France he was apprised, and approved of the undertaking; but he threw off the mask prematurely. Hearing of Napoleon's triumphant entry into Lyons, he at once commenced hostilities against Austria, issuing a proclamation asserting the independence of Italy. At first he was successful, but was speedily overpowered by the superior force of his antagonist. Driven from Italy in May, and separated from Madame Murat, he offered his services to Napoleon, which were declined, and he then withdrew into Corsica. Collecting in this island a few men as desperate as himself, he made a rash descent on the coast of Calabria. Proceeding to a village, he attempted to raise the people in his favour, by addressing them as their king. The effect, however, was to bring upon him the whole population of the district: he and his followers, after a sharp action, were surrounded and made prisoners. Murat was tried by a military commission, and shot October 15th.

23. Lord Keith laid the first stone of Southwark-bridge; John Rennie was the architect.

Arguëlles, a distinguished member of the Spanish cortes, compelled by Ferdinand to serve as a private soldier.

June 1. The grand ceremonial of the Champ de Mars, which took place with all the pageantry of a Parisian spectacle.

Its business was to declare the national acceptance of the additional act to the constitution. Napoleon made a speech, beginning—"Emperor, consul, soldier, I hold all from the people;" and then took the oath to the constitution. He distributed the eagles among the troops, who swore to defend them at the hazard of their lives, amidst cries of Vive l'empereur.

2. By an explosion of foul air, in a coal-mine, near Newbattle, in the county of Durham, 70 persons perished.

3. The legislative body met. Its address, and the answer of Napoleon, show that entire confidence did not subsist between the two parties. "The seductions of prosperity," said the emperor, "are not the danger which menaces us at present. It is under the Caudine forks that foreigners wish to make us pass."

8. A new confederation amongst the German states was concluded at Vienna, by which a general diet, composed of representatives from each state, was formed to manage the affairs of the confederation, and a variety of regulations adopted for the preservation of internal tranquillity, and for the resistance of foreign aggression. The presidency of the diet was vested in Austria, and the number of votes limited to seventeen. Frankfort was the place fixed for the meeting of the diet.

12. Napoleon left Paris for the army in the morning, breakfasted at Soissons, slept at Laon, and next day arrived at Avesnes.

14. The army, under the immediate direction of the French emperor, amounted to 120,000 men, with 350 pieces of cannon. In an order of the day, issued the same evening, he said, "the moment had arrived for every Frenchman who had a heart to conquer or perish." The allied troops in Flanders were yet tranquil in their cantonments. The Prusso-Saxon army formed the left, the Anglo-Belgian army the right. The former was 120,000 strong, commanded by marshal Blücher; the latter 104,000, commanded by the duke of Wellington. The head-quarters of Blücher were at Namur; of Wellington at Brussels, 16 leagues distant.

15. Napoleon, having driven before him the advanced guard of the Prussians, entered Charleroi. From Charleroi are two roads, one leading to Namur, the other, through Quatre-Bras, Gemappe, and Waterloo, to Brussels. In the evening, at 11 o'clock, the duke of Wellington, who was at a ball, received a second dispatch from Blücher, informing him that the French emperor was on his march to Brussels, at the head of 150,000 men. The dance was suspended, and orders issued for assembling the troops.

16. Battle of Ligny, in which Napoleon defeated Blücher, and forced him to retreat to Wavre. The conflict raged with great fury, from three in the afternoon till night, and Blücher narrowly escaped being made prisoner. The loss of the French was 7000 killed and wounded; that of the Prussians more considerable. On the same day there was a sharp action between the left of the French, under marshal Ney, and the Anglo-Belgian army. Lord Wellington had directed his whole army to advance on Quatre-Bras, with the intention of succouring Blücher, but was himself attacked by a large body of cavalry and infantry, before his own cavalry had joined. The prince of Orange was soon overthrown; but he was supported by the Brunswickers, and the English division under general Picton, which arrived in great haste, having marched eight leagues that morning. The contest was warmly renewed, and many left dead on the field, among them the duke of Brunswick. The 42nd Highland regiment was nearly cut to pieces by a charge of the French cuirassiers. By the arrival of the first division of English guards, and Alten's division marching in double-quick time, the enemy was repulsed.

18. BATTLE OF WATERLOO.—The duke of Wellington passed the night of the 16th at the farm of Quatre-Bras. The retreat of Blücher to Wavre compelled the duke to make a corresponding retrograde movement, in order to keep up a communication with the Prussians, and to retire on the 17th towards Waterloo. The chain of heights occupied by the Anglo-Belgian army, two miles in front of the village of Waterloo, crossed the high roads leading from Charleroi and Nivelles to Brussels, and which roads united at the hamlet of Mont St. Jean, in the rear of the British position. The right wing extended to a ravine; between the right and the centre lay the house and garden of Hougomont, which were occupied in force. The left of the centre was covered by the farm of La Haye, beyond which the British distantly communicated with the Prussians, at Wavre. The cavalry, in three lines, guarded the rear of the troops, which extended three miles. Confronting the position of the allies was a chain of heights, separated by a ravine, half a mile in breadth. Upon this opposite chain of heights Napoleon arrayed his forces, having La Belle Alliance in his rear. They were in six parallel lines; the two first of infantry, having light cavalry at the wings; the third and fourth of cuirassiers; the fifth and sixth of the cavalry of the guard, with the infantry of the guard a little in the rear of the six lines. The emperor, having rode through the lines, and given his last orders, placed himself on the heights of Rossomme, whence he had a complete view of the two armies, amounting to about 90,000 men on each side. About ten o'clock the battle began by a fierce assault on Hougomont: it was taken and retaken several times, being bravely defended by the English guards, who parted with their blood dearly, and remained masters of the position. At the same time the French kept up a heavy cannonade against the whole line, and made repeated charges, with heavy masses of cuirassiers, supported by close columns of infantry. They were received by the allies, formed into squares; and the artillery being skillfully planted, told effectively. Despairing of mastering Hougomont, the enemy made a desperate attack on La Haye, which was resolutely defended by the Scotch regiments and Hanoverians, but was carried at the point of the bayonet. Animated by this success, they renewed their efforts on the British centre. Charges of infantry and cavalry followed thick on each other, with astonishing pertinacity. In bringing up his division, the brave sir Thomas Picton was shot through the head. A grand charge of British cavalry ensued, which for a moment swept everything before it; but assailed in its turn by masses of cuirassiers and Polish lancers, it was forced back, and in the mêlée, sir William Ponsonby and other gallant officers were slain. It was now four o'clock. Masters of La Haye, the French began to clear the ground in its rear towards St. Jean; and Wellington himself felt so hard pressed, that he was heard to say, "I wish to God night or Blücher would come." A cannonade was heard on the extreme left.—it was the corps of Bulow, which had been kept back three hours in the passage of a defile. Against this new foe Napoleon despatched count Loban, while he prepared, by one last effort, to overwhelm the British, before effectual succour could reach them. At seven in the evening he brought forward the imperial guards, sustained by the best regiments of horse and foot, amid shouts of Vive l'empereur, and flourishes of martial music. Some disorder, however, occurring in the columns as they advanced, owing to the eagerness of the movement, the British commander seized the favourable juncture, and promptly directed a counter-charge. This was so unexpected, that panic seized the advancing French, and almost before the bayonets crossed, these veteran warriors fled in confusion, despite of every effort of the gallant Ney to rally his flying bands. At the same instant the Prussians, who had arrived in full force, falling on the flank and rear of the enemy, completed the victory. Napoleon, observing the recoil of his columns on all sides, and the remediless confusion around him, said, "It is all over," and retreated across the fields. They were pursued by the victors till long after dark; when the British, who had been under arms during the whole of the preceding tempestuous night, overcome with fatigue, halted, and left the further pursuit to the Prussians. The task was well performed, and nothing could be more complete than the discomfiture of the routed army: all their camp equipage, artillery, and even the private carriage of Napoleon, were abandoned. Exclusive of the slaughter in and after the battle, 7000 prisoners were taken. The loss of the allies was great; that of the British and Hanoverians alone amounted to 13,000. The British officers suffered severely; two generals and four colonels fell in the field, and nine generals and five colonels were wounded; among them lord Uxbridge, who had fought bravely, and was wounded with almost the last shot of the enemy. Such in its main circumstances was the great battle of Waterloo; the most gallantly and scientifically contested, and the most important in its results of any on record.

21. Buonaparte returned to Paris. The legislative body had assembled, and declared its sittings permanent. Having sent for Benjamin Constant in the evening, Napoleon learnt that there was a disposition to depose him, which he anticipated next day, by announcing that his "political life was terminated, and that he resigned in favour of his son, Napoleon II." A provisional government was forthwith appointed, consisting of Carnot, Fouché, Grenier, Caulincourt, and Quinette; and a commission despatched to treat with the allied armies.

22. A general illumination in London.

29. The allied armies, under Wellington and Blücher, invested Paris. Napoleon left Malmaison for Rochefort, intending to embark for America. Just before he set out, Buonaparte was guilty of the weakness of sending a message to the provisional government, offering to take the command of the army as general.

July 3. Marshal Davoust, the commander of the French army, concluded a convention with lord Wellington and marshal Blücher. It stipulated "that Paris should be evacuated in three days by the French army, which should retire beyond the Loire; and all individuals now resident in the capital should enjoy their rights and liberties, without being disturbed or called to account, either for the situations they may have held, or for their conduct or political opinions."

6. Louis XVIII. made his public entry into Paris, amidst cries of Vive le roi!

Died, on the 6th instant, in his 55th year, by his own hands, SAMUEL WARRINGTON, M.P., a gentleman of superior energy and abilities, and highly popular from the patriotic objects to which he had directed the exercise of his powers. Although not of the patrician order, he had many years been a leading member of the house of commons, and esteemed one of the most shrewd, investigative, and vigorous opponents of the Pitt ministry. He conducted the impeachment against lord Melville, and was a whig, but often acted according to his own views, independently of party. His melancholy death was ascribed to aberration of intellect, produced by over-anxious attention to business.

11. Parliament prorogued by a speech, chiefly referring to the successful termination of the war.

Towards the end of the session a message was delivered from the prince regent, announcing the marriage of the duke of Cumberland with the princess of Salm-Braunfels, relict of the late prince, and daughter of the duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, brother to queen Charlotte. The union was displeasing to the queen, and the house, either from a similar moral repugnance, or dislike to the duke, negatived a grant for a marriage portion, by 126 to 125 voices.

14. The house of a maker of fire-works in Spitalfields exploded, and eight persons killed.

15. Buonaparte, who had been living at Rochefort since the 3rd, finding it impossible to elude the British cruisers, went voluntarily on board the Bellerophon, captain Maitland. Prior to this, he had sought to stipulate for a free passage, or to surrender on conditions, but neither could be conceded. From the Bellerophon he addressed the following letter to the prince regent:—"Exposed to the factions which divide my country, and to the hostility of the greatest powers of Europe, I have closed my political career. I come, like Themistocles, to seek the hospitality of the British nation. I place myself under the protection of their laws; which I claim from your royal highness, as the most powerful, the most constant, and the most generous of all my enemies." Even the flattery, to which Napoleon descended in this epistle, failed to procure for him an answer from the regent.

26. Elizabeth Fenning who had been convicted, April 16th, of an attempt to poison her master and mistress, was executed at Newgate. She protested her innocence to the last, and the multitude were so convinced of the malice of her prosecutors, that they broke their windows: a vast concourse attended her funeral on the 31st.

28. The Belgic prelates, in an address to the king of the Netherlands, complained that the equal favour promised to all religions, in the new constitution, was inconsistent with catholic supremacy. They further admonished the king that it would alienate the hearts of his subjects, "with whom attachment to the catholic faith is stronger than in any other country in Europe."

31. By the explosion of a locomotive steam-engine at Newbattle, 57 persons were killed and wounded.

Aug. 7. Buonaparte transferred to the Northumberland, Admiral sir George Cockburn, which sailed next day, for St. Helena: Napoleon vehemently protested against the injustice of his banishment to this island, after voluntarily surrendering himself to the hospitality of the British nation. He was accompanied in his exile by general Bertrand, Las Casas, general Gourgaud, and count Montholon.

19. Colonel Labedoyere, having been found guilty of treason, in joining Napoleon, at Grenoble, was shot on the plain of Grenelle.

Sept. 19. General Porlier attempted to excite an insurrection in Galicia, against Ferdinand VII.; failing in his enterprise he was shot at Corunna.

26. A treaty or compact signed at Paris, by the emperors of Russia and Austria, and the king of Prussia, declaring their resolution to make christianity the basis of their actions—domestic and foreign. They affirmed their delegation, by Providence, to govern "three branches of one and the same christian nation." The prince regent was invited to become a party to the "HOLY ALLIANCE;" but he contented himself with expressing his approval of its tendency.

30. A fellow at Queenborough, having left his wife and family, was taken and ordered to be flogged. As no one could be found to flog him, the mayor himself performed the duty.

Oct. 15. Buonaparte landed at St. Helena.

21. Great riot at Sunderland, the sailors refusing to let the colliers proceed to sea, till their demands for higher wages were complied with: the military were called in, and the combination dissolved by the apprehension of the president and committee.

25. Waterford cathedral damaged by fire. 31. A fire at the Mint, in the tower, which destroyed the new machinery: damage estimated at 80,000*l*.

Nov. 4. London Institution began building.

5. By a treaty concluded with Russia, the Ionian islands were placed under the protection of England.

20. SECOND TREATY OF PARIS.—The failure of Napoleon's enterprise subjected France to great humiliation. The masterpieces of art deposited in the gallery of the Louvre, and the trophies of so many victories in distant regions, were reclaimed by their former owners. Venice received back the famous Corinthian horses; Florence the Venus of Medici; and Rome the Apollo Belvidere. By treaties and conventions signed at Paris, on the 20th, the allies were indemnified for their recent exertions by cessions of territory, and in pecuniary contributions. For the first, certain alterations in the frontier between France, and Belgium, and the Rhine, were required, not considerable in extent, but important, from leaving a free passage into the heart of France. For the second, the payment of 900,000,000 of francs to be divided among the allies. In order to retain hold on the French, seventeen fortified towns and cities were to be delivered up to the allies, to be held in trust for five years, by an army of occupation of 150,000 men, to be maintained at the expense of France. Such were the bitter fruits of the hupbred day's reign of Napoleon, and the terms on which France was permitted to retain her nationality.

Dec. 7. Marshal Ney shot pursuant to his sentence in the gardens of the Luxembourg. He died nobly. The marshal had relied on the faith of the capitulation of July 3rd, and made a direct appeal to the duke of Wellington: but the duke gave it against him, affirming that the object of the capitulation was limited to the "prevention of any measure of severity, under the military authority of those who made it." This evasive interpretation was the death-warrant of the gallant Frenchman.

M. Lavalette, the post-master-general under Buonaparte, and who had been condemned to die, escaped from prison dressed in the clothes of Madame Lavalette.

Lord Cochrane sentenced to pay 100*l*. fine for escaping from the king's-bench prison. It was paid by voluntary subscription, not exceeding one penny each.

26. Eaton, a noted pedestrian, finished his task on Blackheath, of walking 1100 miles in 1100 successive hours.

REVENUE, DEBT, TAXES.

The financial history of the war, from 1793, to the conclusion of a permanent peace in 1815, may be divided into three periods. First, the four years previous to 1797, during which no great fiscal effort was made, and the treasury was conducted, as in former wars, without any innovation in regard to war-taxes or paper-money. Second, the interval from 1797 to 1805, in which we had war-taxes to a considerable amount, and an inconvertible paper-money, but without greatly depreciating one, or carrying the other to an extreme. Third, the period from 1805 to 1815, in which the supplies raised within the year became enormous, and the depreciation of paper, particularly after entering into the war in Spain, in 1809, augmented greatly financial difficulties.

The sum raised by taxes and loans, during the war in 1793, has been already stated (p. 634). The subjoined is a corresponding statement for the war of 1803:—

Years.	By Taxes.	By Loans.
1803	£37,679,063	£15,202,931
1804	45,359,442	20,104,221
1805	49,659,281	27,931,482
1806	53,304,254	20,486,155
1807	58,390,225	23,889,257
1808	61,538,207	20,476,765
1809	63,405,294	23,404,391
1810	66,681,366	22,428,788
1811	64,763,870	27,416,829
1812	63,169,854	40,251,689
1813	66,925,835	54,026,822
1814	69,684,192	47,159,697
1815	70,403,442	46,089,603

£770,962,331 £388,766,925

The total money raised by taxes and loans, exclusive of 46,612,106*l.*, for the service of Ireland, was 1,113,000,000*l.*; deducting from this sum an average peace expenditure of 22,000,000*l.* for 13 years, the cost of the war was 827,000,000*l.* If to this sum be added the expenditure of the war of 1793, amounting to 284,214,731*l.*, it shows that the French revolutionary war cost England 1,111,214,731*l.*, being an average yearly expenditure, during 23 years of hostilities, of 48,314,000*l.* The expenditure of the war of 1793 was nearly double that of any preceding contest; and the expenditure of the war of 1803 exceeded that of 1793 in the proportion of more than three to one. It is to be observed, however, that the enormous expenditure of the latter years of the war was swelled by the accumulation of interest on the previous expenditure, and the depreciation of the currency amounting, after 1810, to full 20 per cent.

The PUBLIC DEBT at the beginning and conclusion of the war of 1803, was as follows:—

	Principal. £.	Interest. £.
			Brought forward	£41,670,183
Debt in 1803	622,467,529	27,043,625	Land and assessed taxes	7,911,938

			Hackney coaches and hawkers	50,875
Increase	£491,940,407	£16,940,954	Hereditary revenues	173,367
The debt did not accumulate so fast in the second as in the first period of hostilities. In the war of 1803, a greater part of the expense was defrayed by the property-tax, the assessed taxes, and other supplies raised within the year. In 1815 the public income, exclusive of Ireland, was as follow:—			War customs	2,841,406
Excise	£23,370,055		— excise	6,737,029
Customs	11,807,323		Property-tax	15,227,500

COMMERCE, SHIPPING, AGRICULTURE.

The progress of commerce, during the second period of the war, was eventful, and marked by extraordinary vicissitudes. In the interval between 1807 and 1809, our supplies of many articles of foreign production were in danger of being abridged or entirely cut off. From a great portion of the continent, the anti-commercial decrees of Napoleon interdicted all intercourse: and after the attack on Copenhagen, Russia and Denmark joined the league against this country. The orders in council on our part, and the non-intercourse acts and embargoes on the part of the Americans, destroyed all traffic with the United States. Our exclusion from these markets caused great speculative avidity, and the prices of hemp, wax, tallow, cotton, silk, and tobacco, rose enormously. There was also a rise in the price of agricultural produce, owing to a decided failure in the crops of 1809. About the time the markets in Europe became narrowed for British manufactures, a new field of adventure opened in South America, by the emancipation of the Spanish colonies. This gave an impulse to domestic industry; but the shipments to South America were much beyond the amount of capital the adventurers could fairly command, and still more beyond what the consumption of the places, for which the investments were destined, could absorb, upon the condition of making adequate returns. To support these speculations the country bankers, and the bank of England, increased their issues of paper. But this prosperity was ephemeral. In 1810 prices began to recede; and in the autumn of that year, and spring of the following, there was a mercantile reaction.

In 1815 there was a second revulsion in trade, which arose out of our over-trading to the Continent on the overthrow of the French emperor. The markets abroad being glutted with our commodities, prices fell ruinously low, and English manufactures were sold on terms that scarcely defrayed insurance and shipping charges. In Holland the market had been so overstocked, that our manufactures were actually cheaper than in England. The bankers had in this, as in the former instance, fostered the spirit of over-speculation, and many of them became bankrupts.

Notwithstanding these vicissitudes, the commerce of the kingdom increased in the second as in the first period of the French war. The average official value of our exports in the nine years of the war of 1793 was 30,760,000*l*. The average in ten years of the second war, from 1803 to 1812, inclusive, was 42,145,000*l*. The following statement shows the tons of shipping that cleared outwards, and the official value of the cargoes exported from Britain between 1802 and 1815. The accounts for the year 1813 were lost by the fire at the Custom-house:—

Years.	Tonnage.	Value of Cargoes.
1803	2,019,382	£31,438,495
1804	2,051,135	34,451,367
1805	1,900,609	34,308,545
1806	2,053,713	36,527,184
1807	2,050,013	34,566,571
1808	1,654,944	34,554,267
1809	2,230,902	50,286,900
1810	2,862,801	45,869,859
1811	2,203,585	32,409,671
1812	2,206,420	43,243,173
1813
1814	2,447,298	56,624,229
1815	2,759,720	60,983,063

AGRICULTURE, like commerce, underwent great vicissitudes, and, like it, continued to advance in spite of occasional depressions. Owing to the favourable seasons, of 1801–3, the price of wheat fell to 3*l*. a quarter; a fall which led to the corn-law of 1804, by which the import of foreign wheat was in a manner prohibited until our own should be at or above 63*s*., and taxed till our own reached 66*s*. High as these prices then seemed, they were subsequently greatly surpassed, partly from the depreciation of the currency, the interruption of neutral traffic, and a deficient harvest.

In 1812 and 1813 wheat rose to 6*s*. a quarter, a rate ill-calculated to prepare the farmer for the approaching revulsion. After the peace of 1814, imports co-operating with favourable seasons, the price of corn fell rapidly, and it was in vain parliament passed (in 1815) a new corn-law, by which the importation of foreign wheat was prohibited till the home-price of our own wheat exceeded 80*s*. The market continued low, and for a time exposed both the farmers and the public to the evils of sudden transition.

The following statement will show the average expense of farming in England before the war and its increase, up to the last year of hostilities. It shows the expense of cultivating 100 acres of arable land, in England, at three distant periods, calculated on an average of the returns made to circular letters from the Board of Agriculture, to farmers in different parts of the kingdom:—

ARMY AND NAVY.

Our splendid naval victories during the early part of the war, and the failure of most of our land expeditions, threw the army into the back-ground ; but England had antecedently established her claim to be considered a great military power. The continental wars of William III., and the triumphs of Marlborough in the next reign, proved us powerful enough to take a foremost part on land as well as by sea. In peace the military force was fixed at a low scale : the standing army of king William was reduced to 7000 men, and that of George II. did not exceed 17,000, exclusive of the troops in Ireland. But the nation's strength was shown in the subsequent war, when called forth by the energies of the earl of Chatham. In 1762, the last year of hostilities, the total number of men employed in the army and navy, including militia and foreign troops, was 337,106 (p. 461). Of this number 51,645 were seamen, and 18,335 marines. Such a display of force was very extraordinary, considering the population of the kingdom at the time, and was hardly exceeded during any period of the French revolutionary war. In March, 1804, lord Liverpool declared in parliament that our army and navy, including militia, but exclusive of volunteers, was about 400,000; being more than one in ten of the able-bodied population of the United Kingdom. France, he added, had at that time in arms about 560,000 men, or one in fourteen of her able-bodied population. Austria had on foot also one man in fourteen, and Russia nearly the same proportion. Prussia was the only power whose military force (about 240,000) bore, like ours, the proportion of one in ten to her able-bodied males.

After the peace of Paris, in 1763, the standing army was fixed, including the troops in Ireland and in garrisons abroad, at about 40,000 men. It did not greatly exceed this amount after the termination of the unfortunate contest with the American colonies. In 1792 the regular military, exclusive of artillery and marines, and of the East Indies, amounted to 45,242 men. The following is a statement of the military force of the empire, regular and irregular, and of its distribution in 1792:—

In Britain	15,919
In Ireland	12,000
In colonies	17,323
Royal artillery	3,730
Ditto marines	4,425

Total, regulars	53,397
Militia disembodied	33,410

Total, regulars & irregulars	86,809
------------------------------	--------

In 1815 the regular force amounted to 220,714 men; reduced in 1821 to 101,539; in 1834, to 88,519; which is about the present amount of our peace establishment.

The British navy at the accession of George III. consisted of 412 ships, the force and distribution of which have been before stated (p. 460). During part of the American war, owing to defective discipline, the combined fleets of France and Spain seemed to have an ascendancy till our previous superiority was restored by the victories of admiral Rodney. Napoleon, after mastering the Continent, indulged the hope of being able to cope with us at sea, thereby opening a path for a descent on our shores; but after the decisive overthrow at Trafalgar, he gave up the idea of becoming a naval power. The subjoined statements seem to comprise the chief information necessary to elucidate the progress of the army and navy during the war. Recruiting continued with unabated activity during the whole contest: either the alarm of invasion, or the continental aggrandisement of the enemy, imposing on the country the necessity of a strong and vigilant defensive attitude. The plan of enlisting for limited periods, which began in 1806, greatly facilitated recruiting; and, after engaging in the struggle for Spanish independence that united all hearts, the augmentation of the army was popular, and additional importance became attached to the military arm of the national strength.

GEORGE III. A.D. 1816 to 1820.

THE national joyousness of war may exceed that of peace, but its joys are more fallacious, if not criminal. It is a period of exertion, of high excitement, in which a consciousness of internal maladies is forgotten in the death-struggle for foreign mastery. Moreover, it is a season of spending, waste, and reckless prodigality. It is a delirious state—intoxicated by victories, if successful—bursting into rage, or sinking into despondency, if defeated. Peace, on the contrary, is less obnoxious to extremes. It is a time of quiet, of reckoning up, saving, and forethought. The smallest evils that exist are felt; all that are impending are imagined and magnified. War affords a ready excuse for every disorder, every public privation, every remedial postponement; but peace is the ordeal of rulers. Public burdens are nicely weighed, and the pretext for their continuance scrutinised. Not only is the physical condition of the people considered, but their laws, religion, political rights, and even morals, become the common topics of investigation. There is leisure for everything, as well as disengaged talent, energy, and enterprise. The troubles and entanglements of peace are mostly the bitter fruits of war; but the glories of war can only be won by dissipating the blessings peace has accumulated.

It was only after the storm had subsided that England became sensible of the wounds received in her late tremendous struggle. While hostilities lasted, she felt neither weakness nor disorder. Though a principal in the war, she had been exempt from its worst calamities. Battles were fought, countries were overrun and desolated, but her own border remained unassailable. Like a spectator viewing securely the tempest at a distance, she was only sensible of its fury by the wreck of neighbouring nations, wafted at intervals to her shores. Up to the period of our interference in Peninsular affairs, we carried on the war mostly by deputy; and the immense subsidies by which we hired, in succession, every continental gladiator, did not impose a proportionate and immediate sacrifice. By the modern device of anticipating future resources, a large portion of the burden was thrown on posterity; so that George III. and his contemporaries enjoyed the sport of this royal pastime, leaving to distant ages to bear the cost and incumbrance.

The cessation of hostilities, in 1815, was like the cessation of motion in a gigantic machine, which has been urged to its maximum velocity. One of the first results of peace was an enormous diminution in the war expenditure of the government. During the five last years of the war, the public expenditure averaged 108,720,000*l.* During the five first years of peace it averaged 64,660,000*l.* Peace thus caused an immediate reduction of nearly fifty millions in the amount of money expended by government in the support of domestic industry.

During the war, all our establishments, private as well as public, had been formed on a large scale,—a scale that supposed a power of consumption and of payment much greater than was found to exist after the peace. This was the case, not only in the public offices, but private establishments of the most dissimilar character: manufacturers, mercantile houses, seminaries of education, and a variety of undertakings, almost all of which, whether in the metropolis or provincial towns, were adapted to a community increasing in numbers and its means of expenditure. In no former contest had our military force been so great: the number of militia-men, soldiers, and sailors discharged, amounted to between two and three hundred thousand, of whom many returned to productive labour, while a considerable proportion of manufacturers, perhaps not less than one hundred thousand, ceased to receive employment in preparing clothing, arms, and other military stores. Hence a rapid redundancy of products, and no less rapid fall in wages and profits. Similar causes were in operation on the continent. Almost all Europe had been in military array, and every country felt the sudden change from the disembodying of armies, cessation of government purchases, and surplus of labourers. The embarrassments of our neighbours augmented our own. Add to this, that our chief customers, the United States of America, had suffered so severely from the stoppage of their navigation by the belligerents, as to be far less able to pay for our goods than before the ruinous Orders in Council. Our foreign trade, more from irregularity of payment than diminution of amount, failed to prove an efficient source of relief; and internal distress was augmented by the immense number of absentees, who, as travellers or as residents on the continent, expended large sums abroad, when most wanted at home.

Transitions, whether from peace to war or war to peace, invariably produce derangements, if not aggregate loss, in the economical relations of the community. In the first, there is the abandonment of various projects of improvement, as roads, canals, bridges, and buildings; and of undertakings in commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, that depend on a low rate of interest, and moderate price of labour: in the last are the derangements just alluded to, of soldiers and seamen discharged, foreign colonies relinquished, manufactures, suited to a state of war, suspended, workmen and capital put out of employment, and the public loaded with enormous debts, and the maintenance of reduced placemen, and naval and military supernumeraries.

During the war, the country was in the state deemed most cheerful and animated, namely, the progressive, not the stationary, which is dull, nor the retrograde, which is melancholy. Employment was abundant, both for capital and industry. All incomes, except those fixed by law, were increasing, and every one seemed growing rich. Wages and salaries, profits, rents, and tithe, were all on the advance. Much of this prosperity was fallacious, arising from the expenditure of borrowed money by government, and the depreciation of the currency; but it was not less effective than real in producing general intoxication. Owing to these causes, incomes increased faster than wealth, generating expensive habits among all classes, which were reluctantly abandoned on the return of peace. It must not, however, be inferred that capital did not increase as well as income during the war. It certainly did. Our unrivalled industry and mechanical improvements were more than a match both for the prodigality of the people and their rulers; and the capital of the country increased enormously, though not so fast, nor on so solid a foundation, as in the subsequent reign of George IV.

The difficulties of the first years of peace were augmented by unfavourable harvests. That of 1815 was rather above the average; but in 1816 there was a great and general deficiency. In 1817 and 1818 the crops did not exceed an average. During these two years the average price of wheat was 89s. a quarter. The high price of provisions, combined with the low wages produced by scarcity of employment, caused very general discontent, especially in the manufacturing districts.

Upon these elements the political agitation we are about to notice began to work. In times of industrial prosperity the masses take little interest in public affairs; their differences are with their employers. Encouraged by the demand for labour, they seek by combination to extort higher wages. The struggle continues till high prices and overstocked markets produce a mercantile revulsion: then workmen are discharged, wages lowered, and masters recover their ascendancy. It is in this state of depression that workmen begin to listen to representations of public grievances. Republican writings increase in circulation; abstract theories of government are propounded; and the equal right of all to share in political franchises is boldly asserted and readily believed. While the popular excitement lasts the property-classes keep aloof, having no wish to countenance opinions incompatible with their present immunities; and the aristocratic politicians of all parties either combine against the common enemy, or suspend the agitation of their mutual differences.

This was the state of the country in 1816: in the metropolis and in the northern counties there were vast assemblages of people in the open air, but they were unattended by the rich and influential. Working men called the meetings, drew up resolutions, and made speeches, setting forth the evils of non-representation, of libticide wars, of the pressure of taxes levied on the industrious, to be squandered in extravagant salaries, sinecures, and unmerited pensions—for all which the remedy prescribed was a RADICAL REFORM of the house of commons, on the basis of universal suffrage, annual parliaments, and vote by ballot. Of such doctrines there were supporters in parliament, namely, sir Francis Burdett, lords Folkestone and Cochrane, and Mr. Hobhouse; out of it, the chief leaders were Major Cartwright, sir C. Wolseley, and Messrs. Cobbett, Wooler, Hunt, Hone, and Sherwin.

At this period the government was directed by men unswayed by high principles, of secondary abilities, and meanly subservient to the will of the prince regent. The popular demands were met with haughtiness and insult. Coercion, in lieu of conciliation, was determined upon: the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended; suspected persons imprisoned; the press silenced by persecutions; victims were sought to be obtained by stretching the treason-laws; and the metropolis and the provinces overrun with government spies, who acted a diabolical part.

Elated by the triumph over Napoleon, a course of foreign policy was pursued, inimical to the solid interests of the country, and which required the maintenance of a large military establishment in the time of peace. A standing force of 176,000 men was demanded in 1816, when there did not exist the most distant danger from any external enemy. In the speech of the regent, the "security of the country" was not, indeed, the only reason assigned for this enormous army. It was also "to be suitable to its station and high character among the European powers." There was neither the ambition of Louis XIV., the maintenance of the balance of power, nor the interests of the electoral dominions to plead; so a novel pretext was discovered. It was not the safety of ourselves or neighbours that was sought, but military ostentation. Not satisfied with maritime supremacy, we sought territorial distinction. The aim seemed to be to make a Germanised military figure, to become a leading military, as well as naval power; and the thirst of universal empire, imputed to the French emperor, was imbibed by the British ministry.

Though the policy of government was unpopular, the political effervescence subsided towards the close of 1817. This was partly occasioned by the revival of trade, and partly by ministerial coercion. The fall of prices having quickened the consumption of commodities, they began gradually to rise from their minimum depression, by which manufacturing industry and commercial enterprise were stimulated. Under the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, the leading reformers were imprisoned, or awed into prudential silence. Popular alarm subsided by the explosion of the espionnage system, it having been discovered that Oliver, Castles, Edwards, Franklin, and other agents of the Home-office, had been the chief fomenters, by speeches and writings, of the seditious acts in the metropolis and the northern counties. The experiment, however, of the masses to effect political reforms, by their own unaided efforts, had entirely failed. Upwards of a million and a half of persons petitioned for universal suffrage and annual parliaments, but their prayers were unheeded by the legislature. They excited no debate, nor hardly an observation. Unsupported by the intelligence and property of the community, the petitioners were felt to be powerless, and their aims impracticable. Government, on this as on former occasions, was strengthened by violence, and an old lesson was a third time repeated. In 1780 parliamentary reform, as we have seen, was just on the eve of accomplishment, by a combined effort of the middle and upper ranks, when the end was frustrated, and all desire for it ceased, through the intervention of the riots of lord George Gordon. A dread of the ascendancy of the multitude was diffused among the wealthy, and they shrank back dismayed from all co-operation in political changes. A similar re-action ensued in 1793, differing from the former only in the fact, that one originated in religious, the other in political zeal. "Toryism," says Mr. Cooke, "never was so strong; Whiggism, nay, democracy, never was so weak, as whilst Thelwall was haranguing from his tribune, Gerald declaiming among the friends of free debate, and Condorcet congratulating the Corresponding Society that the throne of George III., founded on sophistry and error, was nearly sapped through by republican truths." * In a storm, or when one impends, the pilot is looked up to as a god, though at other times he is treated, as he may deserve to be, as an indifferent character.

In 1818 the country was prosperous and tranquil. Such was the representation of the regent's speech on the meeting of parliament. The state-prisoners were permitted to return to their families, and ministers obtained a bill of indemnity, to protect them against the penalties of illegal acts committed during the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. It was a transitory gleam that soon ended in gathering clouds, and the old yoke-fellows, commercial difficulties and political discontent, re-appeared on the scene. Towards the end of the year prices, which had obtained a considerable elevation, began to recede, and the usual consequences followed—numerous bankruptcies, the destruction of private credit, and scarcity of employment in the manufacturing districts. The itinerant orators who had recently escaped from the dungeons of the Secretary of State, resumed their tours of agitation, and the cheap political pamphlets, which contained the diagnosis and cure of social maladies, rapidly increased in number and circulation. In the summer of 1819 the popular excitement was extreme. At the chief towns in Lancashire, Yorkshire, and the north-west of Scotland, field-meetings were held, attended by vast multitudes of work-people, who listened to vehement harangues, descriptive of their wrongs, and the abuses of the government. Associations began to be formed, delegates appointed, and the more ardent prepared for an appeal to physical force, by nocturnal trainings in military exercises. At Manchester the project was started, and partly executed, of proceeding in a body to London, to petition the prince regent. At a great meeting in Birmingham, a "legislatorial attorney" was chosen, by show of hands, for the purpose of demanding admission into the house of commons, as the legal representative of the inhabitants. This example was about being followed by other unrepresented towns, when the public authorities became alarmed, and the tendency to a general insurrectionary movement arrested by the military execution of the people at Manchester, on the 16th of August, and the passing by parliament of the celebrated six acts.

The details of these extraordinary measures are given in the Occurrences. They were strong, went beyond the emergency, and could only have been sanctioned by a ministry which had shown itself more enamoured of the despotisms of the continent than of the English constitution. The massacre of Glencoe, in the reign of William III., formed the only historical parallel that could be found to the outrage perpetrated by the magistrates and yeomany of Manchester. Granting that the meetings of the reformers had become dangerous to the public peace; that they were of an unlawful character; they ought to have been suppressed by a lawful procedure, not magisterial violence. Numbers, it was alleged, constituted force—force, terror—terror, illegality. The object of the Manchester meeting to petition for parliamentary reform was admitted to be legal; but the numbers that assembled, and the manner of assembling in military array, with banners and flags, inscribed with threatening mottoes of “Liberty or Death,” creating alarm in the minds of the peaceably disposed, were declared to constitute its unlawfulness.* Its illegality, then, ought to have been declared beforehand; if that had failed, no more violence ought to have been employed than was needful to secure the arrest of the ringleaders, and that only after the forms which the law prescribes had been observed. At most, the offence was only a misdemeanor; but the outrage committed was such as could be only legally justified in resisting a burglary, murder, or other capital crime.

The prince regent was ill-advised enough to return a letter of thanks for a catastrophe which all must have deplored, after the heat had subsided. Motions for a parliamentary inquiry into the Manchester transaction were peremptorily rejected by large ministerial majorities. Courts of justice were open, but the grand juries threw out the bills presented against individuals of the yeomanry force; and the local magistrates, sheltering themselves under their decision, refused to entertain charges against the accused. Coroner’s inquests were held on the bodies of those who lost their lives by the furious charge of the cavalry; but the proceedings were either quashed, as in the case of the Oldham inquest, by the court of king’s bench, or such verdicts returned by the juries as could lead to no judicial proceeding. Some were “accidental death;” another, on a child, “died by a fall from its mother’s arms;” a third, “died by the pressure of the military, being under the civil power.”† In all the homicide was accidental, excusable, or justifiable.

These results indicated the state of feeling among the middle and upper ranks, who, alarmed by the acts, no less than the doctrines of the more intemperate of the Radicals, congregated round the constituted authorities. By some writers of this party, republican sentiments were promulgated, the killing of kings openly justified, the truths of Christianity impugned, and the institution of property decried as an usurpation on the common rights of the people. The Whigs were divided as to the aspect of the times, but mostly lent their support to the executive government. Mr. Brougham, in the house of commons, denounced some of the weekly pamphlets which now circulated in great numbers among the working classes, as of a seditious and blasphemous tendency, and reprehended the supineness of the law-officers of the crown in not prosecuting the authors. Mr. Plunkett, the organ of the Grenvilles in the lower house, pronounced the meeting at Manchester illegal, and deprecated parliamentary inquiry. In this opinion Mr. Wilberforce, to the surprise of many, coincided, and said, “that the majority of thinking persons were satisfied with the steps taken by the magistrates of Manchester, and would be dissatisfied if inquiry at the bar were instituted.”† Such being the prevalent sentiments of the legislature, the coercive measures of ministers passed with little effective opposition, the Grenvilles giving their strenuous support to the new code of laws; and the great body of the religious out of doors, alarmed at the infidel spirit abroad, throwing their weight into the same scale, the administration, though far from popular, succeeded almost triumphantly in making an unprecedented inroad on the national liberties.*

About the time the Six Acts passed, the old king died. The mental disorder, which for the last nine years had disqualified him for the executive government, continued, without a lucid interval, up to his demise. In the relations of private life, and in capacity for government, GEORGE III. was superior to his two immediate predecessors. Exemplary in the observance of the conjugal duties, religious, moral, and temperate, his conduct was in accordance with the national standard of propriety and decorum. His memory was retentive, his judgment shrewd and circumspect; his demeanour in pressing emergencies fearless and unflinching. He was consistent and conscientious; never knowingly a wrong-doer. In conversation he was easy and familiar, but inquisitive and repetitious. He possessed no remarkable accomplishment, nor educational acquirement. For science and literature he had little taste; and the occupations of his leisure consisted of hunting, agriculture, mechanical contrivances, military reviews, music, the theatres, and rustic festivals.

Though the king was by birth an Englishman, the predilections of the Hanoverian elector had not become extinct. That the Brunswick family was still German is shewn by the education given to the princes. Of the king's seven sons five were educated in Germany, and with the exception of the duke of Sussex, whose health rendered such an education impracticable, they were all educated as the younger sons of other German princes; that is to say, as German military.

It was a common opinion at the commencement of the present reign, and indeed through the entire course of it, that the king had more confidential advisers than his responsible ministers. These constituted the king's friends, or what was called by the earl of Chatham, the "influence behind the throne," but which influence, it is now certain, did not exist; and the imputation was probably only a factious invention, in revenge for the king having, in the exercise of his prerogative, broken through the jobbing combinations of the aristocratic parties. The most favoured ministers of George III. were only his servants, whom he dismissed when disagreeable, or unable, from the loss of a parliamentary majority, to carry on the government of the country. His conduct in this respect occasionally savoured of ingratitude, if not dissimulation; for some of his councillors, who most flattered themselves in their ascendancy, were surprised with a sudden manifestation of royal forgetfulness and independence.

The king's ambition to rule unfettered was accompanied with a countervailing evil; it threw the government into the hands of a meaner agency than that of the great families. During the present reign the executive was chiefly carried on by the needy cadets of noble families, or legal adventurers, whose politics were secondary to objects of professional ambition and emolument. Hence the supremacy of Toryism. Next to ecclesiastics mere lawyers are the least independent, the least gifted with political wisdom;

* In the opinion of the religious, "the worst feature of the disaffected was their zeal against the Christian faith." (Life of Wilberforce, by his Sons, v. 40.)—"Henceforward," says Mr. Wilberforce, in one of his private memoranda, "they inveighed against the inequality of property, and used every artifice to alienate the people from the constitution of their country. But now they are sapping the foundations of the social edifice more effectually by attacking Christianity."—(Ibid.) and it is to the influence of Mansfield, Kenyon, Thurlow, Loughborough, Ellenborough, Eldon, and Perceval, that much of the arbitrariness and bigotry of the court may be ascribed. The early part of the reign was least exceptionable. The conclusion of peace in 1763, amidst splendid successes, was magnanimous. There was, however, little dignity in the contest with Wilkes; nor in the exasperation manifested about the political trifles which drew forth the ire of Junius. The independence of the American colonies was one of those junctures in the history of nations, that a government can neither avoid, nor without loss of character quietly submit to. However, the issue was favourable to both—barring the pecuniary entailments of the mother country,—and the loss of empire in the West was replaced by new acquisitions in the East. In the French revolutionary war, though the king was a leading alarmist, he had the support of the rich and titled, whose wishes in every community are equivalent to laws, and cannot be disregarded. But he was more pertinacious in the continuance of hostilities both with America and France, than the most belligerent of his subjects. George III., indeed, lacked the most shining part of a Christian, in not being a lover of peace, but prone to war, which was less excusable, as he neither shared its perils nor privations. While Europe was being made a vast pool of blood, through the stimulus of English subsidies, the court was being amused with Dutch fairs, jaunts to watering-places, and the pageantry of militia and volunteer reviews. The king's chief virtues were domestic; his vices those that distress nations.

In domestic government there was little scope for eulogium. The ascendancy of Toryism was interrupted only by fitful interludes of Whiggism. Important guarantees of constitutional liberty were abrogated or suspended. The growth of public opinion, and the increase of wealth and intelligence among the people, formed the chief bulwarks against the increasing influence of the crown, and the augmentation of the peerage and government expenditure. The right of publishing the parliamentary debates, which was only fully established in this reign, imposed an indirect responsibility on the community on the legislature, the force of which was strengthened by the frequency of county and other public meetings, aided by the numerous societies established for political reform and the diffusion of political information. The external pressure was felt and evinced in public acts. Ireland was sought to be conciliated and improved by the mitigation of the penal laws against Catholics, the opening of her foreign trade, and her legislative union with England. The intrigues of faction, and their endless parliamentary conflicts, fell into disrepute. Questions bearing more directly on the common weal—the freedom and advancement of commerce—popular education—fiscal and judicial improvements—mitigation of the criminal law—the growth of indigence and population—monetary fluctuations, and police, obtained a larger share of attention.

The age was intellectual; but George III. did not actively interest himself in its triumphs, further than by the patronage of the elementary teachers of education, of the fine arts, and voyages of geographical discovery. Since the days of cardinal Wolsey, England has not had a prominent Mecenas among her kings or ministers. Even the national universities, and the public and grammar-schools of the kingdom, continued fettered by usage, by devotion to an exploded philosophy, or by the tenure of their foundations, and did not essentially accelerate the advancement of science. With little aid, however, from these sources, knowledge of a useful kind made an extraordinary progress, stimulated by the wants, or fostered by the increasing riches of the people. The subtleties of metaphysics, whose con-finer lead nowhere; the niceties of classical scholarship, which savour of pedantry, and the higher order of mathematics, whose uses and reasonings are inapplicable to social life, were less successfully cultivated, and gave way in public estimation to the more available pursuits of chemistry, mechanics, political economy, geology, the medical art, history, and natural and experimental philosophy. It was an age of utility, not morally, but physically in the application of intellect to the substantial requisites of commerce, agriculture, and manufacturing arts.

It was an age of humanity. Of this the abolition of the African Slave Trade, and the efforts made to induce other nations to follow the example, is a noble testimony. The tendency of the national feeling was evinced in the encouragement given to the Bell and Lancaster schemes of popular education; to institutions of charity and benevolence; to efforts to mitigate or extinguish loathsome and destructive infectious maladies, and to better the state of the poor by an indulgent, though not always enlightened philanthropy. The infamous, and often cruel and unequal punishment of the pillory, was abolished; also the barbarous one of burning females for petty treason, and the disembowelling of traitors. Corruption of blood in the descendants of criminals was limited, and the gothic jurisprudence of wager of battle abolished. Another departure from feudal usages consisted in making the real estates of traders dying intestate liable both for their simple and specially contracted debts.

Among the intellectual changes may be noticed the revolution in periodical literature. It declined and revived with some alteration of character. Essay writing on men and manners conferred great national benefits at the beginning of the king's reign; but the field was exhausted by Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith, and Hawkesworth. The public appetite for ethical monitions, with which most people are familiar, but fail in self-denial to practise, abated. The periodical literature that survived was mostly contemptible for political partisanship, venality, subserviency to book sellers, or absence of critical force and discrimination. By the establishment of The Edinburgh Review, in 1802, and its followers, a more independent philosophical spirit was infused into the periodical press. Fanaticism was rebuked; a just and healthy morality inculcated; dreams of human perfectibility exploded; and questions of practical interest, bearing on religious liberty, commercial freedom, the colonies, education, slavery, population, and currency, made generally familiar and interesting. It is to this source the middle and upper ranks owe much of their advance in knowledge and liberality.

The long reign of George III. is dull so far as it was unmarked by the consummation of any great social or political revolution. Still it is eminently instructive from the novelty, number, and vast interest of its occurrences. It is a magnificent era, signalized by the spread of intelligence—increase of national riches—extraordinary scientific discoveries—great internal improvements, and brilliant naval and military triumphs. For the most part of his life the king was popular, attesting that the tenor of his government was in accordance with the national sentiment. On the bright side of the monarch's character may be urged his private worth, piety, humanity, and love of justice; on the dark his selfishness, bigotry, obstinacy, vindictiveness, dissimulation, love of power, and ingratitude. His understanding and regal abilities have been underrated. It is sufficient to say, that he abased the factions, and thoroughly understood his own interest. To his successor he left a splendid inheritance—a crown, in more complete sovereignty—more independent of aristocratic influence—disputed title—favouritism, or other control, than it had been held since the Conquest.

July 2. Parliament protogued by the prince-regent.

4. DEATH OF RICHARD WATSON.—The late bishop of Llandaff was in his 79th year, and had long lived retired at his beautiful seat of Colgarth-park, near the lakes of his native county. As a sizar at Cambridge in 1754, he drew attention by his intense studiousness and the rusticity of his dress, which consisted of a coarse mottled Westmoreland coat and blue yarn stockings. Watson became an able chemist and copious writer on theological and political topics. He published an "Apology for Christianity," which needed none, in answer to Gibbon; and an "Apology for the Bible," in reply to Paine. The bishop was liberal in his religion and politics; but after the North and Fox coalition, he felt a contempt for political parties. "Philosophically speaking," says he, "there were neither whiggism nor toryism left: excess of riches and excess of taxes, combined with excess of luxury, had introduced universal selfishness." (Anecdotes of Watson's Life, by his Son, p. 194.) The part which Dr. Watson took on the Regency question is supposed to have damaged him in the estimation of the king, and for which he failed to atone by his subsequent publications on the dangerous tendency of French principles. There seems, however, to have been little ground for the querulousness which marked the latter days of the bishop. His life was not unfortunate: he held valuable college and church preferments, and received a large addition to his income from the bequest of a valuable estate from Mr. Ongar, one of his pupils.

5. DEATH OF MRS. JORDAN.—This once popular actress, whose maiden name was Bland, died in retirement at St. Cloud. Comedy was Mrs. Jordan's chief walk, but she appeared to almost equal advantage in tragedy, where the tender, rather than the violent and lofty feelings of the mind were to be portrayed. Her recent separation from the duke of Clarence, by whom she had a large family, seems to have been resorted to as preliminary to a more legitimate connexion. She was not in indigence, the prince having made a provision for her maintenance and that of her children, inclusive of three she had had by a former connexion, to the amount of 4400*l.* per annum.

July 7. DEATH OF MR. SHERIDAN.—This popular orator, wit, and dramatist, was in his 65th year, and had survived, notwithstanding personal irregularities, the more illustrious of his contemporaries. He was a native of Dublin, but received his chief education at Harrow school, and was intended for the legal profession. His public career may be pronounced to have been prosperous; for, without any special advantage derived from paternity or connexion, or any extraordinary exertion of industry, or self-denial, he rose to be one of the most conspicuous men of his time. The difficulties that clouded the four last years of his life can hardly be termed misfortunes, since they were the natural results of political disagreements with old friends, and inveterate habits of improvidence. Mr. Sheridan's abilities were more the result of observation than of any original fund of intellectual power. His first play (The Rivals) and his first speech in the house of commons were not successful; but the failure of these maiden essays became, by the aid of nice discernment and a disposition to improve, the stepping-stones to future triumphs. He was singularly clever—a dexterous and elaborate artist, as his biographer has shewn, of jokes, smart sayings, and dazzling oratory; and there is hardly any excellence of which he was not able to catch the representative save prudential virtues. After the death of Mr. Fox, Sheridan disclaimed allegiance to any whig chieftain apart from Carlton-house. By seniority and talents, if not character, he had himself far claims to the vacant leadership; and the scruples by which his party lost power, and were kept out of it, were naturally distasteful to a person of his managing aptitude. Except in framing an answer for the prince-regent in apparent rivalry of his colleagues, and keeping back the information of the intended resignation of the Hertfords in the royal household, his fidelity to his party is unimpaired.—(Moore's Life of Sheridan, ii. 426.) He was a consistent and disinterested politician, the merit of which is enhanced by the temptations he was under to be otherwise from his own splendid abilities and embarrassed circumstances. As an orator, he was the most finished and varied of the rhetorical school; and his celebrated speech on the impeachment of Warren Hastings is often referred to as one of the most extraordinary specimens of English eloquence on record. The usually accompanying anecdote, however, does not testify so much to the utility as the fascination of this oratorical display; for it is related that the excitement produced was such that the business of the day was necessarily adjourned, and the merits of the speaker, rather than of the case, became the prevailing topic of discussion. The finest speech and the most entertaining, if not the most natural, of English comedies, ought to have guaranteed their celebrated author from the lamentable incidents of his death-bed.

22. The duke of Gloucester married to his cousin, the princess Mary, fourth daughter of the king.

Aug. 3. A riot at Glasgow on account of the soup-kitchens. Several persons wounded in skirmishing with the military.

13. A howitzer of uncommon size, left by marshal Soult on his retreat from Cadix, placed in St. James's park.

25. One of the convicts in Newgate having stolen a watch, the whole of them, to the number of 140, refused to be searched. A riot ensued, but they were reduced to submission by withholding from them their food.

27. EXPEDITION TO ALGIERS.—Lord Exmouth with a British and Dutch fleet bombarded Algiers; and the Algerine batteries, shipping, arsenal, and magazine being destroyed, the dey thought fit to submit. Eight hundred lives were lost by the assailants, but the result was decisive. The dey was forced to agree to the total abolition of christian slavery, and to the release of all christian slaves within his dominions.

Sept. 13. A party of 13 persons drowned by the upsetting of a boat at Rochester bridge. The accident was occasioned by a piece of timber lying across the starlings of one of the arches.

18. Tumults at Preston by the unemployed.

23. Hon. Augustus Stanhope dismissed the king's service for having enticed lord Beauchamp (a youth only 16 years of age) to play for high stakes at a game of chance, by which the young lord lost large sums, for which he gave his note of hand.

23. Wey and Avon canal opened.

Oct. The quarrels among the students at Gottingen occasioned several duels: four students were killed. The number of students at the university has increased to 1182: of these, only 586 are natives of Hanover; 566 are from other German states; and 180 foreigners, Russians, Danes, Swiss, and English.

21. A new silver coinage issued.

22. Disturbances among the workmen employed in the iron-works at Merthyr and Tŷdegar, owing to a reduction in wages. Upwards of 12,000 assembled, and the military were called in, to quell the rioters.

26. A prize-fighter named Turner found guilty of manslaughter.

Three-fourths of Belvoir castle destroyed by a fire: damages estimated at 120,000*l*.

Nov. 15. A public meeting of distressed mechanics and others to petition for parliamentary reform. Mr. Henry Hunt presided.

Dec. 2. SPA-FIELDS RIOT.—A large number of the populace assembled in Spafields to receive the answer of the prince-regent to their petition. While this meeting was waiting the arrival of Mr. Hunt, a band of desperadoes appeared on the ground with a tri-coloured flag and other banners, headed by a young man named Watson, who, after making a violent harangue from a waggon, led the crowd into the city. Stopping at Snow-hill, they attempted to procure arms by plundering the shop of a gunsmith; Watson firing a pistol and wounding a person who remonstrated against the outrageous proceeding. At the Royal-exchange they were met by a strong party of police, headed by lord-mayor Wood, who ordered the gates to be shut, and seized several who had arms. The military and civil power collecting, the rioters dispersed, after plundering some gunsmiths-shops in the Minories. Many were apprehended, and two suffered capital punishment; but the ringleader (Watson), for whom a large reward was offered, succeeded in escaping to America, where he died in 1838.

7. Watch-and-ward act enforced at Nottingham.

A petition of an unusual tenor was presented to the prince-regent from the corporation of London. It denied that the distresses which afflicted all classes of the people resulted from a "transition from war to peace: it ascribed them to unjust and ruinous wars, and to a long course of lavish expenditure, arising from the "corrupt and inadequate state of the representation of the people in parliament." This language was extremely inconsistent in the city of London, which for the last thirty years had almost uniformly supported the measures of the court, with little apprehension of the consequences.

15. Died, in his 64th year, Charles, third earl of Stanhope, a nobleman of considerable scientific ingenuity, and an ardent friend of civil and religious liberty. His lordship openly professed republicanism, and laid aside the external symbols of nobility. He was the inventor of an arithmetical machine, a printing-press, and monochord.

PATENTS AND DISCOVERIES.—To Mr. Taylor for producing gas-light from vegetable oil.

To Mr. Povey for making gentlemen's coats without seams.

Sir Humphry Davy invented a safety-lamp to prevent accidents from foul air in coal-mines.

The sculptures brought by lord Elgin from Greece were purchased by government for 35,000*l*., and deposited in the British-museum.

A canoe was found under the river Witham in Lincolnshire.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—Samuel viscount Hood, 92, a distinguished naval officer. Adam Ferguson, L.L.D., 93, late professor of moral philosophy in the Edinburgh university. Patrick Duignan, M.P. for Armagh, a warm anti-catholic. Duke of Mecklenburgh Strelitz, brother to queen Charlotte. Richard, viscount Fitzwilliam, of the kingdom of Ireland: his lordship had, at his house at Richmond, one of the most valuable collections of pictures in Europe; more than 10,000 proof prints by the first artists; a very extensive library, and a scarce and curious collection of the best ancient music; among which were the original virginal book of queen Elizabeth, and many of the works of Handel, in the hand-writing of that great composer. He left his pictures to the university of Cambridge, and 100,000*l*. stock to build a gallery to exhibit them. The viscount died unmarried; his brother John succeeded to the title, but a large portion of his estates passed to the earl of Pembroke.

A.D. 1817. RISE OF RADICALISM.—The period which had elapsed since the peace had been marked by the prevalence of general distress among the industrious classes of the community. The triumphs of the war began to be undervalued when it was found that they had entailed burdens almost insupportable. By ministers the public difficulties were ascribed to the sudden transition from war to peace, and hopes were held forth that they would be temporary. Relief was sought by numerous petitions to parliament, but the reception of these only served to show how little sympathy existed between the national representatives and their constituents. recourse was next had to petitions to the prince-regent. Large meetings were held at Leeds, Manchester, Birmingham, and in the metropolis for this purpose. One remarkable circumstance attending these assemblages was, that they were convened, attended, and conducted almost exclusively by the working classes, the middle and higher ranks taking no share in their proceedings. In almost all the popular meetings held in 1816-17 men appeared in the garb of poverty, who in fluent and impressive language pointed out the various civil and political evils which in the present reign had produced their altered condition. They enlarged upon the waste of the public money in perpetual wars, in pensions, sinecures, and extravagances of every kind pervading the government; but above all, insisted upon the corrupt dependence of their representatives upon the crown and aristocracy, who, by themselves or by their relatives and dependents, absorbed the money levied on the general industry. The utter hopelessness of any effectual remedy under these circumstances being manifest, the orators urged that a RADICAL REFORM in the commons' house of parliament was essential to the salvation of the country. Such was the popular excitement produced by these harangues, aided by the circulation of cheap political writings, that ministers resorted to the extraordinary measure, in 1817, of a double suspension of the Habeas Corpus act; first, near the close of February, and afterwards, on a fresh alarm, in the month of June. The majorities by which these measures were carried sufficiently indicated the affright which was spread through the most opulent and the most turbulent class of the nation. At the same time the number was not inconsiderable who held firmly to the maintenance of laws regarded as the guarantees of English liberty. The termination of these alarms threw great discredit on the ministry, who, by the employment of spies of abandoned character, aggravated popular discontents, and seduced the ignorant into the commission of crimes which they expiated on the scaffold.

Jan. 20. John Cashman, a sailor, and four others, tried at the Old Bailey for burglariously entering the shop of Mr. Beckwith, a gunsmith, on the day of the Spa-fields riot. Cashman only was found guilty, and executed opposite Beckwith's house.

27. A riot near Leicester. Several corn and hay-stacks set on fire.

28. Parliament opened by the regent, who adverted to the popular discontents, which were ascribed to the efforts of designing persons to mislead the people. An amendment to the address was moved in the lords by earl Grey, but negatived without a division. In the commons, the majority for ministers was 264 to 112 votes. On the return of the regent, he was received with strong marks of popular resentment. On passing Carlton-house the glass of the royal carriage was broken by a stone, and it was not without difficulty he reached the palace.

29. A reward of 1000*l.* offered for the discovery of the perpetrator of the outrage on the regent.

Feb. 3. A royal message, accompanied with documents, informed parliament that combinations existed in the metropolis and in other parts of the kingdom dangerous to public tranquillity. These papers being referred to secret committees in both houses, reports were shortly presented of an alarming tendency. Amongst other matters the committees stated, that very numerous associations were enrolled, under the denomination of "Spencean Philanthropists," whose aim was an equal division of the land, and confiscation of funded property. Whatever impression these reports might have made within the walls of parliament, without they were far from obtaining implicit credence. Of the Spenceans the public had not before heard; and being now officially made acquainted with a sect founded upon the speculations of a visionary, who had written, without being generally read, twenty years before, the revelations of the green-bay created more surprise than alarm.

6. Lord Cockburn presented to the house of commons the Spa-fields meeting petition, signed by 24,000 persons. It prayed for annual parliaments, universal suffrage, and reduction in the public expenditure. He also presented a petition from Manchester, signed by 30,000 persons, praying for reform in parliament, and economy in the public expenditure. Sir Francis Basset presented a petition to parliament, from Leeds, signed by 7000, for the same objects.

7. The regent surrendered 50,000*l.* per annum to the public exigencies. Marquis Camden generously gave up the fees of his tattership of the exchequer, 13,000*l.*, reserving only the salary of 2700*l.* Mr. Ponsonby resigned his pension as late lord chancellor in Ireland.

8. Died at Pisa, in Italy, in his 39th year, FRANCIS HONNER, barrister, a gentleman much respected, who had evinced during his short public life superior abilities. He was brought into parliament by his college friend, lord Henry Petty, and acquired distinction as an able debater, and author of the valuable report, in 1810, of the Bullion Committee. He was one of the earliest and most talented writers in The Edinburgh Review.

The subscriptions for the widows and children of the privates who fell at Waterloo amounted to near half a million.

4. The price of Cobbett's Political Register being reduced to twopence, it reached a weekly sale of 50,000 copies.

Mar. 4. Habeas Corpus Suspension Act received the royal assent.

11. Great meeting at Manchester for the avowed purpose of petitioning the regent. It was recommended to the petitioners to proceed in a body to London, and many thousands met, provided with a bundle and a blanket for the journey; but by the activity of the magistrates, aided by the military, the design was frustrated. Johnstone, Ordén, and others, to the amount of 200, were arrested.

15. Mr. Cobbett, the popular political writer, left London for America.

20. The proprietors of Drury-lane theatre agreed to let it on lease. The receipts, since building had been—first year, 79,924*l*.; second, 68,889*l*.; third, 61,585*l*.; fourth, 49,586*l*.

Stage-coaches, on the English plan, set up in France. The first between Paris and Versailles.

Apr. 21. Eight persons went on the Lavan sands to gather cockles, when a thick fog coming on they lost their way, and were drowned by the returning tide.

In this month incendiary fires were frequent in the rural districts, chiefly in Essex.

May 8. The Belgic bishops prevented a memorial to the king, affirming that it is to the Catholic church the world is indebted for universities, which succeeded the episcopal schools; and that it is to "preserve youth from the contagion of philosophical errors that religion has presided over all studies, under the intervention of the bishops."

12. SIDMOUTH'S CIRCULAR.—Lord Sidmouth having addressed a circular letter to the lords-lieutenant of England and Wales, apprising them that the law-officers of the crown had given an opinion, that magistrates possessed the power of holding to bail persons found selling writings which were deemed, though not legally adjudicated, seditious or blasphemous libels, and requesting that they would notify the same to the respective justices within their jurisdiction, earl Grey brought the matter before the house of lords, by moving, "that the case submitted to the law-officers should be laid before the house;" and his lordship indignantly reprobated the principle. It was, however, maintained by the chief-justice Ellenborough, in opposition to lords Erskine and Holland, and the motion was rejected by a very considerable majority. The same subject was brought before the commons by sir Samuel Romilly, and shared the same fate. The circular, however, was not acted upon, being deemed too hazardous an encroachment upon the liberties of the people.

20. Sir F. Burdett moved for a committee to inquire into the state of parliamentary representation. Motion negatived by 265 to 77 voices. Six hundred petitions were presented this session for parliamentary reform; most of them praying for annual parliaments and universal suffrage. They were got up chiefly by the activity of Major Cartwright, Mr. Cobbett, and sir F. Burdett.

23. The Royal George man-of-war, which sunk off Portsmouth (Aug. 30, 1782), surveyed by means of a diving-bell, and found to be a mass of shapeless timber.

28. The members of a debating society at Cambridge, many of them noblemen, remonstrated against its suppression by the vice-chancellor.

30. Mr. Abbott resigned the speakership of the house of commons, on the ground of ill-health, and was called to the house of lords by the title of lord Colchester: an annuity of 4000*l*. was granted him for his services. Mr. Charles Manners Sutton became the new speaker.

June 6. Thomas Jonathan Wooler tried for a libel on ministers; when after a verdict of guilty had been returned, doubts arose as to the validity of the verdict, it being subsequently ascertained that the jury had not been unanimous: upon which the accused applied to the court for an acquittal, and he escaped punishment.

9. The state-prisoners, Watson, Thistlewood, Preston, and Hooper, conveyed from the tower to the court of king's bench, to be tried for high treason. Watson was first tried, and was ably defended by Wetherell and Copley. His trial lasted seven days, and the jury returned a verdict of not guilty. The attorney-general Shepherd then gave up the prosecution against the others. All the accused were in indigent or humble circumstances, and the chief witness against them was Castles, a government spy.

17. Rundell and Bridge were defrauded of jewels to the value of 20,000*l*. by a foreigner, who ordered the articles to be enclosed in a paper box and sealed, which box he contrived to change, and left another, in which, when the seals were broken, only a few halfpence were found. The box containing these valuables was only five inches long, three wide, and two deep; and a communication was subsequently opened with the successful purloiner at Paris.

22. John Kemble took his leave of the stage in a farewell address, written by Mr. Campbell.

29. Pope Pius issued a bull against bible societies, as tending to the circulation by heretics of unauthorised versions of the Scripture.

July 2. A Margate steam-packet burnt to the water's-edge; the fire arose from the furnace. Crew and passengers saved by running the vessel into Whitstable.

5. An issue of a gold coin, called "sovereign," value 20s.

8. Died, of apoplexy, in his 63rd year, George Ponsonby, M.P., formerly chancellor of Ireland, and a leading member of the opposition. Mr. Ponsonby was a plain but argumentative speaker, and of gentlemanly manners.

12. Parliament prorogued by the regent.

13. Died at Paris, aged 53, Madame de Staël, daughter of the celebrated Necker, and herself a lady much distinguished in the literary world. She married baron de Staël, the Swedish ambassador, and left a son and daughter; the latter married to the duke de Broglie.

23. The strenuous efforts of the emperor Alexander to erect universities and schools in different parts of the Russian empire appear to have been successful.

Nov. 6. Died, in the 22nd year of her age, after giving birth to a still-born child, the princess Charlotte, daughter of the regent, and consort of prince Cobourg. The sudden demise of this accomplished and high-spirited princess caused general and intense regret—"the expectancy and rose of the fair state" having untimely perished. The remains of her royal highness were deposited in the regal vaults of Windsor on the 18th; prince Leopold chief mourner.

WAGER OF BATTLE.—William Ashford appealed Abraham Thornton, who had been acquitted at the Warwick assizes, under circumstances of strong suspicion, of the murder of his sister, Mary Ashford. The writ of appeal was awarded, and Thornton appeared in the court of King's bench, and offered, according to ancient custom, his wager of battle, which the judges decided he was entitled to: but Ashford being only a boy, the challenge was declined, and Thornton discharged. It gave rise to an act of parliament (59 Geo. III. c. 40), that abolished the right of appeal, as a remnant of Gothic jurisprudence.

His talents were more shining than solid: he possessed much wit, drollery, pathos, and a bold and fanciful oratory.

faced to protect the invariability of the paper of this monetary corporation as to protect the people from the highest crime, or property from the most violent depredation. A strong public feeling was in consequence excited in 1818-19 against the numerous prosecutions of the bank, especially when it was found that its multiplied punishments had not succeeded in lessening the number of offences. This feeling was heightened when it was discovered, during the trials at the Old Bailey, that the forgery of bank notes was a matter of easy accomplishment; that it was impossible for the public to distinguish between true and false notes; that the bank servants were often unable to distinguish genuine from forged paper, and that unknowingly they had often refused the payment of good notes. These facts were established by the returns made by the bank to parliament, and in consequence of which juries refused to convict on the evidence of its inspectors and clerks, unless they would discover the private marks by which they discriminated forged from genuine paper. This placed the bank in the dilemma of either abandoning prosecutions, or of giving publicity to their own safeguard, by which stratagility would be destroyed. Attempts were made to improve the workmanship of their notes, so that they could not be imitated; but if the idea of fabricating an inimitable note is not chimerical, it was certainly chimerical to think of producing a note for general circulation that could not be imitated correctly enough to elude the ordinary vigilance of individuals. The only effective preventive of the evil was that subsequently adopted, namely, of withdrawing the notes of less amount than 5*l.* from circulation. This was a principal reason for the passing, in 1819, Mr. Peel's Act for the resumption of payments in specie by the bank in 1823.—a period, however, which was anticipated; for the directors, having accumulated a large quantity of gold, they began specie payments May 1st, 1821.

Sir Richard Croft, the eminent accoucheur who attended the late princess Charlotte, destroyed himself by a pistol at the house of the Rev. Dr. Thackeray, where he was in attendance on Mrs. Thackeray, who was confined. It appeared, from a coroner's inquest, that since the unfortunate result of the accouchment of the princess he had conceived timidity in his profession, and suffered from a depression of spirits that had produced mental derangement.

13. ROYAL MARRIAGES.—The death of the princess Charlotte occasioned several of the junior branches of the royal family to form matrimonial alliances; and a message was brought to parliament on the 13th, announcing the contemplated nuptials of the dukes of Clarence and Cambridge with the princesses of Saxe-Meiningen and Hesse-Cassel; that of the duke of Kent with the sister of prince Leopold, the dowager princess of Saxe-Leiningen. Additional allowances of 6000*l.* were voted to the princes; but upon a motion to make a similar addition to the income of the duke of Cumberland, it was negatived by 143 to 136 members. In the course of the month the princess Elizabeth, third daughter of the king, espoused the hereditary prince of Hesse-Homburg; but the occurrence occasioned no application to parliament.

Reg.*, ix. 76.) The constitution gave general satisfaction to the Bavarians.

10. Parliamentary session terminated by a speech from the prince-regent, congratulating the two houses "on the manifest improvement in the internal circumstances of the country, and the growing indications of national prosperity." The lord-chancellor then declared that it was the pleasure of the prince that the parliament be now dissolved. Protesting and dissolving parliament at the same time was deemed ungracious (Life of Wilberforce, iv. 382), and it was the first time it had been done since the reign of Charles II.

Imprisonment for debt abolished in the state of New York.

18. GENERAL ELECTION.—Except in the metropolis, the elections passed over quietly, and produced no change in the parliamentary majority of ministers. In the city of London, after a sharp contest, the ministerial candidate, sir William Curtis, was thrown out, and Messrs. Wood, Wilson, Waithman, and Thorpe elected. In the city of Westminster there was some disturbance. The populace made a violent attack on the court candidate, sir Murny Maxwell, and the guards were called in, to aid the civil power. The election terminated as follows:—The court candidate being returned:—Sir Samuel Wood, Bart., M.P. for F. Burdett, 233; sir W. Wilson, 180; Henry Hunt, 84.

In a statement put forth by the former, they say that their object is only to raise wages to the average of 24*s.* a-week, which they were prior to the reduction consequent on the stagnation of trade in 1816-17. Their ordinary hours of labour they state to be from five in the morning to seven in the evening, in rooms heated from 70 to 90 degrees.

Miss Mary Ann Tucker was acquitted, at the Cornwall assizes, of a libel, inserted in the West Briton newspaper, on the vicewarden of the Stannary-court. The novelty of the case was a clever defence made by the defendant in person.

Sept. 3. The weather changed, after 108 hot and clear days. During the three months of June, July, and August, the thermometer at London, at the highest, averaged 90°. At Paris it rose to 98°. In many parts of England the trees blossomed twice.

7. A public meeting in the Palace-yard to petition the prince-regent for annual parliaments, universal suffrage, and vote by ballot. Mr. Hunt, who presided, proposed that they should present it in a body at the Home-office, where it was received by an officer, who refused to sign the petition on the ground that as the petition was so late to be that of the inhabitants of the metropolis, which was notoriously untrue, there not being any persons at the meeting.

31. A small issue of crowa-pieces completed the series of the new silver coinage.

Nov. 2. SUICIDE OF SIR S. ROMILLY.—This eminent lawyer was in his 62nd year, and had attained the foremost rank at the chancery bar by his logical and forcible eloquence. His professional gains averaged 14,000*l.* per annum. He was a whig, and filled the office of solicitor-general while that party was in power in 1806. Sir Samuel had taken the lead in the reform and mitigation of the criminal law, upon which he published an able pamphlet. A nervous disorder, produced by the death of his lady, and over-exertion in his profession, which allowed neither of recreation nor domestic comfort, were the alleged causes of his suicide. Even the Sunday was not a day of rest, but often spent in legal consultations;—a practice which Mr. Wilberforce (Life, v. 134) in vain tried to prevail on sir Samuel to relinquish.

4. Mr. justice Abbott appointed chief-justice of the court of King's-bench; vice lord Ellenborough, resigned. Next day Mr. justice Dallas was appointed chief-justice of the Common-pleas; vice sir Vicary Gibbs, resigned.

15. The ministers of England, France, Russia, Austria, and Prussia, assembled at Aix-la-Chapelle, issued a declaration, expository of their principles, and of their determination to maintain the existing state of Europe. "Henceforth," they say, "they shall devote all their efforts to the protection of the arts of peace, to the increase of the internal prosperity of their states, and to the awakening of those sentiments of religion and morality, whose empire has been too much enfeebled by the misfortunes of the times." The composition of this document is ascribed to M. Gentz, secretary to the congress.

Pending the congress the English boxers Gregson, Cooper, and Carter, exhibited in the great hall at Aix-la-Chapelle before prince Metternich, prince Charles of Prussia, the prince de Salins, and a number of other foreigners of distinction, who repeatedly cheered the onsets between these fistic heroes.

17. DEATH OF QUEEN CHARLOTTE.—Her majesty was in the 75th year of her age and the 58th of her marriage with the king. Avarice, and the exertion of a political influence on the unpopular side, were imputed to the queen; but the first imputation is hardly reconcilable with the fact that she expended upwards of 5000*l.* annually in works of benevolence. She was diminutive and very plain in person; obstinate, unforgetting, and contracted in mind; and had all the pride, along with the meanness, of German aristocracy. In the careful management of a large family and in her attentions to the king she had been exemplary, but her general manners were offensive, from prudery and dulness. Mrs. Trimmer, Mrs. Hannah More, Madame d'Arblay, Charlotte Helen Maria Williams, and other female authors, whose writings were directed to moral and religious improvement, received some marks of her favour.

Dec. 5. Two juries at the Old Bailey, one of the Middlesex, and the other of London, acquitted the persons tried before them on the capital charge of passing forged notes, because the clerk of the bank would not explain the marks by which he believed the notes to be forged.

11. DEATH OF LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—The late chief justice of England was one of four brothers, two of whom attained the episcopal dignity, and his father, Dr. Edmund Law, was bishop of Carlisle, an amiable but latitudinarian prelate. The future judge was early located in the South, first on the foundation of the Charter-house, and next at Cambridge; but the Northumbrian burr—the rattling r, which indicated the hyperborean scholar—always stuck to him. Young Law's success in life could never have been dubious. Intellectually strong, ambitious, resolute, and industrious, instructed by the companionship of Dr. Paley, and assisted by the patronage of Mr. Justice Buller, and of a good family connexion, he was not likely to experience much delay or difficulty in his legal career. Almost his first and most successful suit was the marrying of a beautiful woman of large fortune, and the descendant, by the mother's side, of a great lawyer, sir Thomas More. He was entrusted with the conduct of the defence in the great cause of Warren Hastings: it had been offered to Erskine, who declined it, owing to his connexion with the whigs, who were the leading impeachers. His professional studies enabled him to make a firm stand against the formidable but unlearned triumvirate of Burke, Fox, and Sheridan: it was law against eloquence; and, with the tribunal he addressed, logic and special pleading told more effectively than oriental metaphors. The trial terminated, as is well known, in the acquittal of the accused ex-governor, leaving his able defender in possession of the solid advantages of a large honorarium, and high legal reputation. By the dissolution of the Pitt ministry in 1801, Mr. Law became attorney-general, and ten months after, by the death of lord Kenyon, chief-justice of England and baron Ellenborough. The honours were now won; they required only to be worn with dignity and moderation. Pending the Grenville ministry, in 1806, his lordship, after the example of Mansfield, accepted a seat in the cabinet:—a solitary precedent, more honoured in the breach than observance; and from which, the inconveniences resulting from the union of political and judicial functions in the lord chancellor, ought to have deterred a constitutional administration from following. Lord Ellenborough subsequently concurred in its inexpediency, and we have the authority of his son for saying (House of Lords, July 7th, 1837, Parl. Deb. xxxviii. 1842), that “if it were to do again he would not do it.” Though a sort of whig in principle, lord Ellenborough was practically a conservative: he was anti-catholic; he originated no legal reforms, (unless the act bearing his name be one,) and watched with jealousy, and often stifled with asperity those of others. Even the mild attempts of sir Samuel Romilly were fiercely met by the chief-justice, who declaimed against “speculative humanity,” when prisoners might be passed to death for standing mute—when women might be flogged, to the outrage of female delicacy, and burnt to death in due form of law—when traitors were drawn, hung, quartered, and disembowelled—when criminals were slain by the capricious fury of the mob in the pillory—when flagrant, but merciful perjury was in constant practice by jurymen—when the twelve judges might be called into the open air to try a wager of battle; and, reluctantly, and in solemn mockery of justice, pronounced sentences of death never meant to be executed. (Law Magazine, xi. 342.) Under the impulse of a better spirit and intelligence, these enmities have been removed from the statute-book. In his judicial capacity lord Ellenborough was remarkable for force of language and of reasoning; his integrity and independence were unquestioned; but he laboured under the deep reproach of being an angry judge. Carried away by the violence of his temper, he shot beyond the bounds of legal decorum and even of justice; for in lieu of being the counsel of the accused, he became the open advocate of the prosecutor. His judgments were sometimes cruel and unsuitable, as that which sentenced lord Cochrane to the pillory. The overbearing demeanour of the judge in political trials did not pass unreviewed, either in the senate or in his own court; but his irascibility increased with age, and on the trial of Mr. Hone it blazed out furiously. He failed, however, to extort a conviction of “the poor bookseller,” and he only survived this mortifying discomfiture about a twelvemonth, dying in his 68th year. His health had long been declining through the pressure of anxious and toilsome duties, to which he stuck with iron inflexibility. A large family survived him—one a natural daughter, whom he kindly remembered in his will. Leaving a fortune of 320,000*l.*, he was able to make a magnificent provision for his descendants. He flourished, and was almost the last chief-justice that did so, in the age of rich legal sinecures, when offices in courts of justice, worth 80,000*l.*, were openly saleable.

17. Mr. Hobhouse nominated M. P. for Westminster, in lieu of the late sir S. Romilly.

31. A riot at Edinburgh during the execution of a man for robbery: he was cut down by the mob, but the police being reinforced by the military, he was again suspended, and the hanging completed.

EVACUATION OF FRANCE.—The most important circumstance of the present year was the entire liberation of the territory of France from the chains under which it had been held by the occupation of a large part of its domains by the great powers who had taken possession of it. By the second treaty of Paris, the stay of the occupying army was not to exceed five years; but in the present month, the allied sovereigns, having completed three years, during which France had been considered as in foreign possession, they entered into a resolution, at Aix-la Chapelle, of withdrawing their respective forces from the common territory, and leaving it entirely free and independent.

MISCELLANIES.—Houses began to be heated by steam.

It appears, in London, that there are 532 painters, 45 sculptors, 149 architects, 2060 engravers in stroke, mezzotinto, aquatinta, and wood.

The kaleidoscope invented by Dr. Brewster. The Himala mountains discovered to be the highest in the world: 19 of them higher than Chimboracco, in Peru.

The British and Foreign Bible Society distributed between March 31, of 1817 and 1818, bibles 89,793, and testaments 104,306.

Belzoni transported from Egypt to England the statue of Memnon.

It appeared by the report of the house of commons, that four millions of pounds' weight of sloe, liquorish, and ash-tree leaves, are every year mixed with Chinese teas in England.

A parliamentary report exposes abuses in sales by auction, reprobating them as affording encouragement to the manufacture of inferior articles, and exciting a competition for lowness of price in preference to excellence of quality, whereby the honest tradesmen and best workmen are injured.

Another report recommended the repeal of the usury laws, as futile and mischievous.

A patent obtained for improvement in printing-presses to work by steam, and for rollers for distributing ink for the types.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—Thomas Cogan, M.D., 82, moral and medical writer. Sir Richard Musgrave, author of the "Irish Rebellions." George Dempster, esq., 86, a Scotch advocate, many years member of the house of commons: he was the first who taught his countrymen the art of packing salmon in ice, by which means it may be sent to a good market in the British metropolis. Prince of Condé, 82, one of the leading emigrants in 1789. Patrick Brydone, author of "A Tour in Sicily." Earl of Kerry, 78: his lordship had no issue, and was succeeded in his honours by his cousin and heir-male, the marquis of Lansdowne. Mrs. Pope, 75, actress. John Palmer, esq., late comptroller of the post-office: he introduced an entire change in the mode of conveying the post, in defiance of an interested opposition, and was rewarded by a public grant of 50,000*l*. Warren Hastings, esq., 86, formerly governor-general of India, and celebrated for the seven years' impeachment of the eloquent triumvirs Burke, Fox, and Sheridan. At his house, in St. James's-square, sir Philip Francis, 78, the supposed and probable author of the "Letters of Junius." Sir Philip spent several years in India, and subsequently took an active part in Indian affairs in the house of commons. When upwards of 70 he married the daughter of a clergyman; but though the disparity of years was great, his motive was companionship, which object he accomplished to the utmost gratification of his hopes.

A.D. 1819. STATE OF THE COUNTRY.—The internal condition of the country this year was one of painful interest. Pecuniary distress was nearly universal: the agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests laboured under unusual depression and embarrassment. That portion of the people engaged in the labours of husbandry, little susceptible, from their dispersed habitation and rusticity, of political excitement, endured the evils of their lot without audible murmurs, or any expression of hostility against the established order of society, or the conduct of government. In some manufacturing districts, also, severe distress was sustained with mute resignation; in others the case was widely different. The government and the higher classes became alarmed. The prince-regent issued a proclamation against seditious meetings; and soon after a vast assemblage of reformers at Manchester were savagely dispersed by military force. This act of violence was followed up on the part of government by severe measures against the press and seditious meetings; which had the effect of checking popular agitation without eradicating the inherent causes of discontent. Population was felt to be redundant in the existing depression of industry, and encouragement was given to emigration. In the first session of the year a parliamentary grant of 50,000*l*. was voted for the purpose of establishing settlers on the eastern border of the Cape of Good Hope. Public attention was directed to New South Wales, as opening a boundless region for the profitable employment of surplus labour and capital. The poor-laws, with the influence exerted by them on the moral and physical condition of the people; the state of the prisons and of prison discipline; and the state and actual operation of that portion of the criminal laws under which capital punishment was denounced, became the subjects of able and laborious parliamentary investigation. Political economy, statistics, and the principles of legislation, which had hitherto had little regard even from rulers, were now forced on the attention of all classes, from the light they shed on their mutual interests, rights, and social relations.

Jan. 8. The will of the late queen Charlotte proved in Doctors' Commons, by the executors, lord Arden and general Taylor; the personal property sworn under 140,000*l*. The jewels presented to her late majesty by the nabob of Arcot were bequeathed as an heir-loom to the house of Hanover, and the queen's real estate at New Windsor to the princess Sophia.

13. Several of the disciples of the late Johanna Southcott appeared at Guildhall, to answer the charge of creating a riot in the streets. It seems they had paraded the city, decorated with a white cockade and star on the left breast, proclaiming with a brazen trumpet and stentorian voice the coming of the promised Shiloh. A mob collected and a battle ensued. Before the magistrate they maintained the verity of their mission, and that it was right they should obey God rather than man. After a suitable admonition on the lamentable character of their delusion, they were detained in custody till they could find security to keep the peace.

14. Parliament opened by commission, and Mr. Mannors Sutton a second time chosen speaker. The royal speech was read on the 21st, and congratulated parliament on the evacuation of France, and the improvement of the revenue. The address in both houses passed without a division.

25. In consequence of the queen's death a bill was introduced, which passed into a law, for vesting the custody of the king's person in the duke of York, with an allowance of 10,000*l*. per annum. The pecuniary grant was strenuously opposed, but defended on the ground of the pecuniary embarrassments of the prince.

Petitions were presented from the common-council of London, and from the quakers, for a revival of the criminal law.

A circular issued from the home-office, specifying the conditions on which persons would be permitted to emigrate to the Cape of Good Hope. On a deposit of 10*l*. for each head of a family, government undertook to provide a passage and grant an allotment of land, to the extent of 100 acres.

Feb. 1. An experiment at Portsmouth to make ropes of grass, of a strong and pliable texture, grown in the island of New Zealand. The result was promising.

16. The trade of Hamburg remarked to have undergone three revolutions. The prosperity of the city originally depended on its breweries; its beer is now the worst and least known in Germany. Ten years ago sugar-refiners flourished, and its sugar was exported even to countries which had sugar-refiners of their own. These have declined from the rivalry of other nations, and the trade of insurance has now taken the lead. Hamburg has twenty native insurance companies, each with a capital of from 450,000 to 1,500,000 marks banco, exclusive of private insurers.

Mar. 2. Sir James Macintosh made a motion for the appointment of a committee on capital punishments: it was carried, in opposition to ministers, by 148 to 128.

3. The Westminster election, to fill the seat of sir S. Romilly, terminated, after a sharp contest between the whig, radical, and ultra-radical candidate. The first was returned and the last at the bottom of the poll: the numbers being, G. Lamb, 4465; J. C. Hobhouse, 3861; major Cartwright, 38.

Kotzebue, the celebrated German dramatist, assassinated at Mannheim, by a student of Jena, named Sandt, on the ground of his being a spy in the pay of Russia, and an enemy to the liberties of Germany.

18. Sir Manasseh Lopez convicted at Exeter assizes of bribing the electors of the borough of Grampound, and sentenced in the November following to two years' imprisonment and a fine of 10,000*l*.

20. Burlington arcade opened.

24. Southwark bridge opened, making the sixth metropolitan bridge over the Thames.

A new machine appeared in London, for aiding pedestrians, called a "velocipede," consisting of two wheels, one before the other, connected with a perch, on which the rider rests his body, while with his feet he urges the machine forward. The use of it, if any, was limited to corpulent people, and, after the novelty ceased, it was discontinued.

May 3. Petitions from the catholics of England and Ireland, from the protestants of Dublin, in favour of their claims, and the corporation of the same place against them, being presented to parliament in the course of the session, Mr. Grattan moved for a committee to take into consideration the laws which affected the catholics, in which he was ably seconded by lord Normanby. After an animated debate the motion was lost by two votes only, the numbers being 241 to 243. The same question was similarly determined in the lords, but with a majority of 147 to 106.

5. The Americans are fitting out, for the first time, an expedition to sail round the world.

10. The Pargiotes left their city, rather than submit to the rule of the Turks, to whom they were abandoned in virtue of an agreement concluded with Ali Pacha by sir Thomas Maitland, governor of Corfu, in breach of the good faith under which the Pargiotes had submitted, in 1814, to the protection of the British government. Only 40 inhabitants were found in Parga when taken possession of by the Turks. The exiles were conveyed first to Corfu, and subsequently to a barren island, called Meganisi.

11. Marquis Camden, having nobly relinquished to the public, as before noticed, the fees of his patent office of a teller of the exchequer, a bill was introduced to legalize the patriotic donation, doubts having been started whether it was not of the nature of a benevolence unwarranted by law.

13. A bill introduced, which became law, to prevent enlistment, and the equipment of vessels for foreign service. Its real object was to prevent British subjects lending their aid to the South American colonies in their struggle with Spain: it was unpopular both in and out of parliament, but was passed into a law by the ministerial majority.

24. Princess Victoria, daughter of the duke and duchess of Kent, born at Kensington palace.

The plan of mutual instruction, adopted in England and at Paris, has been successfully introduced into the Russian army. The progress the soldiers make is astonishing, especially the Cossacks.

June 2. The number of new works published at Leipzig fair amounts to 3000, and comprises all works that have been printed in Germany since Michaelmas, and that

7. A large armament, that had long been fitting out at Cadix to recover possession of Spanish America, is frustrated by a mutiny of the troops.

10. Dreadful earthquake at Poonah, in the East Indies. The earth opened, and the extensive district of Kutch sunk, with 2000 inhabitants.

During the voyage last year to Baffin's-bay a bottle was thrown into the sea, from lieutenant Parry's ship, off Cape Farewell. About two months since the bottle was found in the island of Bartragh in Killalabay, and is supposed to have floated, at the rate of eight miles per day, across the Atlantic.

12. A meeting of parliamentary reformers at Newhall-hill, Birmingham, to the number of 15,000: sir Charles Wolseley nominated, by a show of hands, "legislatorial attorney and representative for Birmingham."

The number of suicides, attempted or executed, in the first four months of this year at Paris amounted to 124, of which 33 were by females. Among them were 64 married, and 60 unmarried: 53 destroyed themselves from disgust of life, the rest from pecuniary difficulties.

13. Parliamentary session terminated.

22. A radical meeting in Smithfield; Henry Hunt presided. Mr. Harrison was arrested at the hustings on a charge of sedition at Stockport. Great military preparations, and 6000 special constables sworn in, to preserve the peace of the city.

21. A constable who had arrested sir C. Wolseley for sedition openly shot in the streets of Stockport.

26. A numerous meeting at the City of London tavern to consider the scheme of social improvement of Mr. Owen of Lanark, the duke of Kent in the chair. It was resolved to carry the plan into effect, and a subscription was opened for the purpose.

27. At West-end fair, near London, 200 ruffians armed with bludgeons robbed with impunity, and grossly ill-treated several females. The number and strength of the thieves deterred the police from interfering.

30. A proclamation issued by the prince-regent against military training, seditious meetings, and writings, and the election of "legislatorial attorneys."

7. Drury-lane theatre let to Mr. Elliston for 10,200*l.* a-year (exclusive of the fruit-offices) for 14 years, during which he was to expend 15,000*l.* in repairs.

9. The Manchester reformers having convened a meeting for the choice of a parliamentary representative, they were apprised by the magistrates that the object was illegal; upon which the design was abandoned, and a meeting convened for the 16th, to petition for a reform in parliament.

10. First stone of Menai-bridge laid, by which the island of Anglesey is connected with Caernarvon, and the Bangor ferry superseded. The design is by Mr. Telford, on the suspension principle.

16. MANCHESTER REFORM MEETING.—This memorable meeting was held on a piece of ground called St. Peter's-field, adjoining a church of that name. During the whole of the morning large bodies of reformers, arrayed in regular order, continued marching into Manchester from the neighbouring towns and villages. Each had its banner; some with caps of liberty, and bearing the inscriptions, "No Corn Laws," "Annual Parliaments," "Vote by Ballot," "Liberty or Death." Two clubs of female reformers advanced, one of them numbering upwards of one hundred and fifty members, and bearing a white silk banner. A band of special constables took up a position in the field without resistance. At one o'clock, when Mr. Hunt took the chair, the numbers assembled were estimated at 50,000 men, women, and children, all in holiday spirits. The chairman expressed his full confidence in their peaceable demeanour, nor was an offensive weapon to be seen among them.

While he was speaking, surprise was excited by the appearance of the yeoman-cavalry at the extremity of the field, who, after pausing a moment to breathe their horses, brandished their swords, and charged, right through the crowd, up to the platform. On coming up, the commanding-officer told Hunt he was their prisoner, and, with Johnson and others, was taken into custody. A cry now rose among the military, of "Have at their flags;" and they struck down not only those fixed round the platform, but others dispersed through the field, charging right and left with their drawn swords, and dashing through all that obstructed their passage. A dreadful scene of confusion and terror ensued, numbers being trampled under the feet of the horses, or cut down, men and women indiscriminately: while a body of magistrates, at the head of whom was a Christian minister, viewed the bloody scene in security, from the windows of an adjacent house, and are said to have read the Riot-act; but this was known to few, and it is certain no time was allowed for dispersion, as scarcely twenty minutes had elapsed from the opening of the meeting before the massacre began. The killed and wounded was upwards of four hundred. Coroners' inquests were held on the bodies of the slain; but the verdicts of the juries were evasive, and led to no judicial proceeding. Bills preferred against individuals of the yeomanry to the grand-jury at Lancaster were thrown out, and their example was pleaded by the Manchester magistrates for refusing to commit on any charge connected with the transactions of the 16th. True bills, however, were found against Messrs. Hunt, Moorhouse, Johnson, and seven others, for a conspiracy to overturn the government.

27. Lord Sidmouth communicated to the Manchester magistrates, and to major Trafford, and the military serving under him, the thanks of the prince-regent "for their prompt, decisive, and efficient measures for the preservation of the public tranquillity" on the 16th instant.

Sept. 2. Meeting in Westminster, at which sir Francis Burdett presided, relative to the late outrage at Manchester. Meetings were also held about the same period in the city of London, at Glasgow, York, Bristol, Liverpool, Norwich, and Nottingham, to address the regent or parliament on the same subject. Some petitioned for inquiry; others passed a strong censure on the Manchester authorities and the ministers who advised the royal letter of thanks. There were also counter-addresses, calling for the repression of sedition and blasphemy; one from the city of London with 5000 signatures.

25. OLDHAM INQUEST.—A coroner's inquest was held at Oldham on John Lees, who was killed at the Manchester meeting on the 16th of August. After hearing an immense mass of conflicting testimony, the coroner unexpectedly adjourned the inquest to December 1st. Before this period arrived, the case being referred to the court of King's-bench, the whole proceedings were declared null and void by the irregularity of the coroner himself, who had neglected to view the body in the presence of the jury, as by law required, and the court in consequence directed that no verdict should be returned. By this decision the hope that had been cherished, of obtaining a legal decision on the character of the Manchester affair, was destroyed.

Oct. 12. Richard Carlile tried and found guilty of a blasphemous libel, in republishing Paine's "Age of Reason." The trial lasted three days, and the accused defended himself. He was also found guilty of publishing Palmer's "Principles of Nature," an American publication. Upon being brought up for judgment (November 16th), an affidavit was put in by the defendant, stating that 3000 copies of the "Age of Reason" had been sold at half-a-guinea a copy. For both libels he was sentenced to three years' imprisonment in Dorchester gaol, and to pay 1500*l.* fine.

23. Earl Fitzwilliam dismissed from the lord-lieutenancy of the West Riding of Yorkshire, having signed the requisition for the York meeting on the Manchester outrage. In consequence of the earl's dismissal, several officers resigned their commissions in the Yorkshire yeomanry.

Nov. 6. As a precaution against the designs of the radicals, lord Sidmouth issued a circular to the lords-lieutenant, directing that all pieces of cannon "lying about" in the streets were to be removed out of the way, or made useless.

23. Parliament opened by the regent, who was greeted in no flattering manner by the populace. In the lords an amendment to the address was moved by earl Grey, with reference to the Manchester proceedings, which were characterised as illegal and unconstitutional; and ably supported by Erskine, but negatived by 159 peers to 34. A similar amendment, after two days' debate, was negatived in the commons, 150 members voting for, and 351 against, inquiry.

30. SIX ACTS.—Lord Sidmouth, in the upper house; and lord Castlereagh, in the lower, gave an outline of the coercive measures they had in contemplation in the present state of the country. They acquired the name of the "Six Acts," and consisted of the following bills:—1. To take away the right of traversing in cases of misdemeanor; 2. To punish any person, found guilty, on a second conviction, of libel, by fine, imprisonment, and banishment (as first introduced, transportation) for life; 3. For preventing seditious meetings, requiring the names of seven householders to the requisition, which in future convened any meeting for the discussion of subjects connected with church or state; 4. To prohibit military training, except under the authority of a magistrate or lord-lieutenant; 5. Subjecting cheap periodical pamphlets on political subjects to a duty similar to newspapers; 6. And lastly, a bill giving magistrates the power of entering houses by night or by day, for the purpose of seizing arms, believed to be collected for unlawful purposes. These bills were all carried by large majorities; the entering houses by night, and the severity of the restrictions on the press, were chiefly objected to; but there appeared a general concurrence in the necessity of strong measures.

Dec. 1. Upon a motion by the marquis of Lansdowne, for an inquiry into the state of the manufacturing districts, the Manchester affair was again discussed. Marquis Wellesley agreed that the country was in danger; but the danger proceeded from the advocates of annual parliaments and universal suffrage. Lord Grenville declared he could see no necessity for the present motion, nor an inquiry into the Manchester transactions, convinced, as he was, that the conduct of the magistrates was highly meritorious. Motion negatived by 178 to 47.

3. Mr. Cobbett arrived in London from America. In his way from Liverpool he had purposed passing through Manchester, but was deterred by the preparations made by the magistrates for his reception.

15. Mr. J. C. Hobhouse taken into custody by a warrant of the speaker, for observations on the house of commons, in his pamphlet of a "Trifling Mistake," and committed to Newgate.

Miss O'Neil, the celebrated tragic actress, married to W. W. Becher, M.P.

30. The labourers of St. Giles's petitioned parliament to be employed in cultivating the four millions of waste land in Ireland.

31. The poor experienced great distress from the severity of weather. In London places were opened for the reception of the houseless, under the patronage of benevolent persons.

FRANCE.—At the beginning of the year a new ministry was appointed, with M. de Cazes at their head. They were popular, but the ultra-royalists carried a vote in the house of peers which tended to destroy the freedom of election. Louis XVIII. inclined to the moderate party, and, to secure their preponderance, he created 54 new peers, and recalled twenty-two of the number erased from the list in 1815, chiefly the marshals and adherents of Napoleon. Some relaxation was made in the law restraining the liberty of the press; and the attempts made to renew the outrages against protestants in the south of France were defeated. Agriculture was flourishing, and the arts and all branches of industry beginning to revive.

GERMANY.—In Hanover, where the duke of Cambridge acted as regent, the states abolished torture, reduced the army, and made the nobles liable to share in public burdens. Bavaria, Württemberg, and Baden had redeemed the pledges given to their subjects pending the struggle with Napoleon, to grant them constitutions; but Prussia acted evasively. Great discontents were in consequence manifested among the illtelligent part of the population, and many patriots were imprisoned or banished for insisting on their civil rights. The professors and students of the universities were strenuous in their efforts to obtain the establishment of constitutional governments. But zeal carried them to excess, and Austria and the leading powers became alarmed at the existence of secret associations. The Russian students were recalled from the German universities. The diet established a central tribunal at Mentz, with inquisitorial authority to hunt out and punish all suspected of political offences.

SOUTH AMERICA.—The efforts of those provinces had been recently crowned with success. General Bolivar completely defeated the royalist armies in New Grenada, hoisted the standard of republicanism, and proclaimed the union of New Grenada with Venezuela, under the general name of Columbia. A republican constitution was afterwards promulgated for these vast regions, and an assembly of representatives opened by a speech from the liberator replete with moderation and political wisdom. Lord Cochrane, who had fitted out a ship in England to join the patriots, was appointed to the command of the Chilean squadron, and displayed his characteristic skill and enterprise.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—At Somers-town, Dr. Walcott, 81, better known as Peter Pindar. In Canada, of which he was governor-general, Charles fourth duke of Richmond, of hydrophobia: it resulted from the bite of a lap-dog, six weeks previously. George Rose, 73, author of a pamphlet on the "Influence of the Crown," and an active and industrious placeman under Mr. Pitt's ministry. Dr. Cyril Jackson, 79, master of Christchurch, and preceptor of the prince-regent. Malcolm Laing, 57, late M.P., and Scottish-historian.

A.D. 1820. Jan. 1. Colonels Riego and Quirvoga proclaimed the constitution adopted by the cortes in 1812, and marched towards Cadiz.

7. Birmingham theatre burnt. It was at first ascribed to the radicals in revenge of the ultra-loyalty of manager Bunn, who nightly persisted in singing "God save the King;" but was found to have proceeded from the wadding of a pistol having unobserved lodged in the scenery.

19. Foreign journals prohibited in Austria.

The Rev. Mr. Hay, rector of Ackworth, chairman of the Lancaster quarter-sessions, and the leading magistrate at Manchester (August 16), presented to the valuable vicarage of Rochdale by the archbishop of Canterbury.

23. Died, at Sidmouth, in his 53rd year, prince Edward, duke of Kent, fourth son of the king. His death was occasioned by exposure to wet and cold, after a long walk, on the 7th instant. He left behind him a widow, the sister of prince Leopold, and a daughter only eight months old, to whom he bequeathed all his property, by a will dated on the day preceding his dissolution. The duke had been much in the army, where he was a strict disciplinarian. His habits were tinged with eccentricity, but he was much respected for his charitable disposition and moderation. In politics he did not take an active part, but inclined to the side of the opposition more than to that of ministers.

27. ARCHER COURT.—A curious case occurred in Doctors'-commons:—George Norton, esq., sought to annul his marriage on the ground of his own impotency! The object was stated to be to protect the legal heirs to Mr. Norton's property, the lady, after seven years of cohabitation, turning out to be pregnant. Sir J. Nicholl, and all the lawyers, agreed that the suit was wholly unprecedented. The husband was 45 years of age when he married in 1812, and the wife 23; and he now prayed a divorce, propter naturalem et insanabilem defectum suum. The learned judge dismissed the suit, chiefly on the ground of the time that had elapsed since the nuptials, and that the husband married with a knowledge of his impotency.

Another curious case in the Consistory court was that of Mrs. Mortimer of Blackheath. In 1811 Mrs. M. gave birth to a male child, and, being alarmingly ill, she, in the belief of approaching death, told her husband that she could not die happy without relieving her mind by confessing to him that she had long carried on an adulterous intercourse with a Mr. Young. The same evening she received the sacrament, but unexpectedly recovered. Mr. Mortimer, however, determined upon a separation, and, after consulting with the lady's father, it was mutually agreed that she should go and live with him, Mr. Mortimer agreeing to allow her a maintenance of 100*l*. a-year. Mrs. Mortimer now applied to the court for a restitution of conjugal rights, on the ground that no legal proof of adultery existed against her—her own confession not being admissible as such. Sir John Nicholl refused the application.

29. DEATH OF GEORGE III.—The late king was in the 82nd year of his age, and the 60th of his reign. He had issue, by queen Charlotte, seven sons and five daughters, of whom six of the former and four of the latter survived him. His bodily health had continued good till within two or three months of his dissolution; but he had not enjoyed a lucid interval since the beginning of the regency, in 1811. His majesty's recollection of past events was exact; and occasional sketches of the persons and characters of his early Ministers often formed the subject of his lonely soliloquies at Windsor. He had long been totally blind and almost deaf; and, from the aversion he had to any of his attendants rendering him personal assistance, his beard had been suffered to grow to an almost patriarchal length. Before his deafness he frequently amused himself at the harpsichord, and seldom played anything but the music of his favourite Handel. The duke of York, lords Henley and Winchelsea, and general Taylor, were present when the king died. St. Paul's bell began tolling at midnight. It was preceded by the tolling of all the other church-bells in London. The dean ordered the great bell of the abbey to begin tolling at one o'clock.

FINANCE, TAXATION OF IRELAND, MR. SECRETARY PEEL'S BILL.

THE period from the peace to the king's death was one of fiscal difficulty, and the impatience of the people to be relieved of their most irksome burdens, combined with the stagnation of trade, made it impossible for ministers to act on a general system of finance. The course contemplated by government at the close of the war was to keep up an efficient sinking-fund, and to continue, during several years, the property-tax on the reduced scale of 3 per cent. This plan fell to the ground on the rejection of that tax by the house of commons, March 19, 1816; a rejection altogether unexpected by ministers, who were so chagrined at the eagerness of the rich to throw off their share of the war-taxes, that they voluntarily, and as an act of justice to the poor, gave up the war-duty on malt. Thus the public was at once relieved to the amount of about 17 millions per annum. Great as was this easement to the community, it was not equivalent to the loss sustained by the fall in prices, and consequent diminution of profits and income to the productive classes; while, on the other hand, ministers were embarrassed by the sudden withdrawal of so large a portion of the revenue, and, compelling them to continue the practice of anticipation, exchequer-bills were issued, and a loan of nine millions borrowed from the Bank. In consequence of the system forced on government, no progress was made in the reduction of the public debt of the kingdom during the first five years of the peace: on the contrary, it greatly increased, and in January, 1819, the annual interest of the debt exceeded by 5,202,771*l.* (Parl. Paper, No. 35, Sess. 1819) the interest in 1815. To continue augmenting the debt in peace as well as war could only have one inevitable issue; but the general eagerness for relief left no alternative to government. In 1819, however, they made an effort to bring the income nearer to the expenditure. In that year, having called on parliament to give efficiency to the sinking-fund, they succeeded in a measure little expected in the midst of peace, the imposition of new taxes to the amount of three millions. These were imposed chiefly on malt, spirits, and tobacco, and paid with reluctance during the next two years of doubt and embarrassment. It was not till the following reign that financial prospects brightened, and which was brought about by the restoration of tranquillity among the working classes, the reduction of the 5 per cent., and a transfer of a portion of the half-pay and pensionist to the next generation.

The following exhibits the nett income of the country during the first five years of peace, from taxes and loans (the last inclusive of exchequer-bills funded and the excess of issue):—

Year.	By Taxes.	By Loans.
1816	£62,635,711	£18,890,771
1817	52,372,403	17,425,061
1818	53,959,218	33,330,806
1819	53,291,508	23,255,859
1820	55,063,693	28,127,480

The property-tax received in 1816 amounted to 12,276,871*l.*; in 1817, to 2,568,654*l.*; in 1818, to 658,338*l.*; in subsequent years the arrears received were inconsiderable.

Prior to 1798 no uniform account of income and expenditure was laid before the nation. In that year a committee of parliament was appointed to arrange an order and form of accounts to be presented annually to the house of commons. The union of exchequers forms another epoch in finances which it is important to notice. On the 5th of January, 1817, the exchequer of Ireland was united to that of Great Britain. All our previous statements of income, up to 1816, inclusive, refer to the revenue of England and Scotland apart from Ireland, which, previous to the consolidation of the two exchequers, had its own chancellor of the exchequer and public accounts. As we have not hitherto given any account of the revenue of Ireland, we subjoin a statement of the sums raised by taxes in that kingdom, exclusive of loans, from the Union to 1820:

1800	2,409,493	1811	5,550,743
1801	3,462,234	1812	6,304,375
1802	4,353,790	1813	6,504,558
1803	3,663,715	1814	7,151,070
1804	4,042,028	1815	7,334,786
1805	4,224,131	1816	6,204,785
1806	4,894,829	1817	5,541,410
1807	5,502,130	1818	5,611,215
1808	5,687,617	1819	5,401,217
1809	5,490,343	1820	4,715,314
1810	4,970,148

Measures were adopted, towards the close of the present reign, for the restoration of the currency. For this purpose a bill was passed, in 1819, for the resumption of cash-payments by the Bank of England, commonly called Mr. Peel's Bill. The time fixed was May, 1823; but the Bank, having accumulated a large supply of gold, anticipated this period, and recommenced specie-payments in May, 1821. Before the enactment of Peel's bill, bank-paper had almost entirely recovered from its previous depreciation, which greatly facilitated the return to cash-payments. This recovery was partly occasioned by the breaking of the country-banks in 1814, 1815, and 1816, and the immense reduction in provincial paper, which, leaving an opening for the circulation of the Bank, raised its value nearly to a par with gold. In 1815 paper, which had been depreciated 16 per cent. below that of gold, rose, in 1817-18, without the interference of government, to within little more than $2\frac{1}{2}$ of the value of gold; and in 1819 the depreciation amounted to only $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. (McCulloch's Com. Dict., 1st edit. 71.) It follows that the rise in the value of the currency could not have originated in Mr. Peel's bill, since the change had been in great part consummated before Mr. Peel's act was passed. It is to other causes that we must ascribe the fall in the prices of commodities; namely, to a diminution in the cost of production by the more extensive use of machinery, to the competition of foreign products, and the extinction of monopolies.

COMMERCE, OFFICIAL AND DECLARED VALUE OF EXPORTS, DEPRECIATION IN PRICE.

During the war commercial prosperity was commonly ascribed to certain monopolies in navigation and commerce, which we enjoyed in virtue of our naval superiority. These were unquestionably advantages. Without the command of the seas, our colonies would have been liable to be captured, our trade interrupted, and partly destroyed. The ascendancy of our navy kept open for us the common highway of nations: it prevented detriment from the war, but it did not open new outlets for British produce and manufactures further than by an extension from the acquisition of the colonies of the enemy. The war was not commercial nor maritime. France, after the loss of the Toulon fleet and the decisive victory of Howe on the 1st of June, ceased to contend with us for the mastery of the ocean. It was not on that element her existence was endangered, but on land, and it was to resist the continental powers leagued against her that she concentrated her energies and resources. In balancing the losses and gains of hostilities to British commerce, it is probable the former preponderated. The conquest of sugar-islands, and the extension of the colonial market, to which Mr. Pitt and his colleagues were wont to attach such undue importance, and which constituted their chief glory, was not an equivalent for the interdiction of mercantile intercourse with Spain, Holland, Belgium, and Italy. Neither did the increase of the carrying-trade make up the deficiency; for this was an advantage of trifling import, and one in which we shared in common with the Americans, Danes, Prussians, and other neutral states. Because trade increased during the war, its prosperity seems to have been erroneously ascribed to it; whereas had general peace continued—had the nations of Europe not been impoverished and their intercourse impeded by hostilities, it is highly probable that all of them (England especially) would have advanced, much more rapidly than they did, in riches, industry, and commerce. The lady in as Britain is concerned, this Margravine of incontestable; for though sought derogation increased greatly du queen Charlotte increased still faster on the hands of a truth clearly shown by unless officially in turn of exports.

The average export after his marriage the years, from 1793 to 1811, continued very dull;

The average export very parsimonious, second year, from rarely appeared in public, element in which they lived clusive (leaving out 1813, the records of which were destroyed by the fire of the custom-house, and considering 1802 as a year of peace), were 42,143,000*l*.

But the average exports of the seven years of peace, from 1814 to 1820, both inclusive, were 53,922,000*l*.; showing the proportionately more rapid extension of commerce during the latter than the two former periods.

It may be here repeated that the first years of peace were years of difficulty, arising from unfavourable harvests, prevalence of political discontent, unsettled state of the currency, and revulsion in prices. But the tranquil period of the next reign will more clearly establish the superior commercial advantages of peace over war, and to that we defer a more detailed exposition of the progress of commerce and manufactures since 1815.

The value of exports given above is the official value; but the conclusion would have been the same had we used the declared value. (Lowe's Present State of England, p. 26.) A discrepancy between these different forms of custom-house returns had now become very apparent, and increased still more glaringly during the reign of George IV. It may be suitable in this place to explain the origin of the difference.

The official value of exports is computed according to the weight or magnitude of merchandise, and at a uniform rate of price fixed so far back as 1698. The declared value of exports is computed according to the value declared by the exporting merchant, and varies with the fluctuations of the market. Official value measures the quantity of commodities annually exported; declared value, their current prices. It is a curious fact in the commercial progress of the country, that the increase in the declared value of exports has not kept pace with the increase in their quantity. While the exports of British produce and manufactures rather more than doubled in quantity in the twenty years from 1793 to 1818, the declared value of them only increased from 33,148,682*l*. in 1798 to 45,188,250*l*. in 1818. This discrepancy began to be most apparent about 1808, and has continued, with accelerated pace, its downward progress to the present time. Funds, and taxes which have enabled merchants the property, cottons, linens, hardwares, and per cent. Tax, to foreigners at such greatly the rejection of, must be sought for in the commons, Marches and profits; the use of together unexpected has lessened the cost of were so chagrined if fall in the price of the rich to throw off the ice is merely relative, taxes, that they volent the money value of of justice to the poor, ga proportionate, no on malt. Thus the public been sustained.

But this is probably not so. The cheaper rate at which we have offered our manufactures abroad is an advantage obtained in part by the reduction in the price of manufacturing labour at home; thereby abridging the comforts of those whose employments have been superseded or abridged by the competition of mechanical applications.

POPULAR EDUCATION, BELL AND LANCASTER, PUBLIC CHARITIES.

THE institution of charity-schools in 1698, and of Sunday schools in 1781, were steps at long intervals towards the education of the English poor. In 1797-8 a further advance was made by the schemes of popular instruction brought under public notice by Dr. Bell and Joseph Lancaster. Their plans excited much interest, and by the introduction of mutual instruction, slate writing, reading, and pronouncing by syllables, and a mode of tuition better adapted to juvenile minds, great improvements were effected in the practice of education. It was rendered more expeditious, less expensive, and not so irksome and unnatural to children. From Dr. Bell the National School Society had its origin, and from Mr. Lancaster, the British and Foreign School Society; the latter being patronised by the Dissenters, and the former by the Established Church, between whom there long existed a rivalry that terminated to the benefit of the community by the establishment of many useful institutions.

INFANT SCHOOLS formed another useful auxiliary of popular instruction. The idea of an infant school was suggested by the asylum founded by Mr. Owen for the children of the adult population of New Lanark. The objects sought by these establishments were threefold: first, to provide a receptacle for children whose parents are occupied during the day, or unable or unwilling to take care of them; secondly, to instruct them in the rudiments of virtue and knowledge; and, thirdly, to accomplish both these ends by a more natural and cheerful mode of instruction than heretofore practised in dame schools. The first infant school in the metropolis was established in 1818 under the auspices of lords Lansdowne and Dacre, and Messrs. Brougham, Macaulay, Mill, and Wilson. They are now pretty general throughout Britain and in Ireland.

About 1819 Robert Owen began to attract attention by the zeal with which he sought to promote his RATIONAL SYSTEM or SOCIETY. His leading idea was that the character of man is not formed by him but for him, either by natural organization or the external circumstances to which he has been subjected from birth. Hence Mr. Owen concluded that by improving the circumstances which surrounded an individual in his early years the individual himself may be improved, and, in place of an inferior, he may be made a very superior being. The main position that the "child is father to the man" was readily conceded, but difference of opinion prevailed as to the best practical application of this truth. The philanthropist himself was for establishing separate and insulated communities, from which evil example and association should as much as possible be excluded, and in place of the competition and emulation of every-day life, equality and community of property and labour be substituted. As Mr. Owen's ideas involved an entire change in the existing structure of society, they encountered opposition, but in the following reign he had obtained a sufficient number of followers to subject his scheme of social amelioration to a course of experimental trial.

During the four last years of the present reign Mr. Brougham was almost unceasingly occupied in suggestions and inquiries for the advancement of popular education. His aim was two-fold: first, to introduce a parochial system of instruction; secondly, to provide funds for the undertaking, either by a public provision, or by restitution to their original purposes of the misapplied endowments of charitable foundations. As chairman of a parliamentary committee appointed to "inquire into the education of the lower orders," he collected a mass of useful information, showing, first, the large portion of the population that were without the means of instruction; and, secondly, the vast funds existing in the kingdom, piously bequeathed for the purpose, but which had been misapplied by the fraud and negligence of trustees. The result of his powerful exertions was the appointment of a commission to inquire into the abuses of public charities; and in the first session of the new reign (June 28, 1820), in an able speech he brought the subject of popular education under the notice of parliament. The leading feature of his project was to render national education subordinate to the established clergy. Parochial schools were to be established and partly maintained by a school-rate levied on housekeepers, and partly by a trifling weekly payment by scholars. Mr. Brougham said there were 12,000 parishes in England. Of these, 3500 had not a vestige of a school endowed, unendowed, or dame. Of the remainder, 3500 had endowed schools, and the other 5000 relied entirely on unendowed schools, of course fleeting and casual. (Ann Reg., lxii. 5.) A bill founded on this exposition was brought in, but after a first reading was abandoned. The established clergy, though the new measure would have given them the control of parochial education, were not satisfied, because dissenters were not excluded from its benefits. On the other hand, the sectaries were jealous of the great influence it gave to the established clergy.

COURT OF GEORGE III.—NOBILITY AND MIDDLE CLASSES, PUBLIC MANNERS, POLICE, COSTUME, AND NEWSPAPERS.

THE reign of George III. began with a proclamation against vice and profaneness, and there appeared a disposition in the young sovereign to reform, by his own example, the manners of his court. The licentiousness which had been imported from Hanover, and which was common to the petty courts of Germany, was openly practised during the reigns of his two predecessors. Both George I. and George II. lived in concubinage, they both kept mistresses: but the early marriage of their successor, with a discreet princess, cut off this adjunct of royalty, and the gross impropriety of the monarch selecting the wives of his courtiers, and pensioning the husbands, ceased to be the practice of St. James's. Stricter etiquette, as well as decorum, was enforced in the new reign. This was probably a contrivance of the earl of Bute, whose aim was not only to humble the aristocracy, but by keeping them at a greater distance from the throne to preserve, undiminished, his influence over the king, his consort, and the princess dowager of Wales. An anecdote related by the countess of Arnpack will illustrate the system of the favourite, and the discipline to which he sought to accustom the nobility. "Her majesty expressed a desire to see a certain painting done by lady Bolingbroke. As a peeress of the realm, her ladyship thought it proper to attend herself with the picture; and, although a lady of the bedchamber, but not in waiting, she sent a page to say that she was solicitous to present the picture in person. Lord Bute who was present with their majesties at the time, came out and said in a peremptory manner that lady Bolingbroke must deliver it to the lady in waiting." (Memoirs of the Margravine of Anspach, i. 38.) It was thought derogatory to regal dignity for queen Charlotte to receive anything from the hands of a lady, even a peeress, unless officially in attendance.

For a long time after his marriage the court of George III. continued very dull, very decorous, and very parsimonious. The royal family rarely appeared in public, and the retirement in which they lived became a subject of complaint. Devoted to the nurture of a numerous family, in the seclusion of Windsor or Kew, these were, probably, the king's happiest days, and his homely joys were only interrupted by the intrigues of politicians, an envenomed shaft from the pen of Junius, or the appearance of Wilkes's terrible "North Britain," No. 45. A gayer scene opened by the prince of Wales and duke of York attaining their majorities, and the rise of the princesses into womanhood. The prince was the "prince of good fellows," and won all hearts; he became the choice companion of the convivial and accomplished—appeared familiarly on the turf, and at the club-house, and attended the brilliant soirées at Devonshire-house, where he was charmed with the wit of George Selwyn, or the mellifluous vocal notes of young Wilberforce, the new M.P. for Hull. The icyness of the court was now thawed; even queen Charlotte became hospitable and condescending, dined with the citizens at Guildhall, resplendent with diamonds and ugliness; gave fêtes champêtres at Frogmore, where the princesses were amused with Dutch fairs, the feats of tumblers and fortune-tellers. St. George's Hall often rung with the festive gatherings of the scions of nobility met to commemorate a royal birth-day, a house-warming, or other joyous event. The good king did his part; he kept up the old English customs of early dinners and early risings; but shone at militia and volunteer reviews in the Windsor uniform; took vigorous equestrian exercise; chatted familiarly with the farmers, with Dr. Beattie, the great lexicographer, and Joseph Lancaster, the popular educationist, and delighted at the evening promenade on the Castle terrace, in the midst of his lieges and his children, allowed to be the finest royal family in Europe.

These were the beaux jours of the court. They were also the palmy days of our splendid aristocracy. They had all that nobility could wish for; they had honour, reverence, and troops of friends; there was no third party to challenge their political supremacy, they had no rivals even in riches, for they had the broad acres, which constituted in a much larger proportion than at present the wealth of the community; they had also the boroughs, the church, and corporations, the army and navy, the public offices and both houses of parliament; they had even the populace of the towns, for everything was either whig or tory, or nothing. Parliamentary elections were theirs; the people not being troubled with the choice of representatives, or even the labour of thought; all being done for them by their lordly superiors, or by their clever retainers, who, like Burke, Sheridan, and Francis, were engaged in the advocacy of the sentiments of their patrons. The borough elections were settled at Boodle's or the Cocoa Tree, and the counties were often a mere drawing-room arrangement: Mr. Wilberforce says (Life by his Sons, i. 56), sir George Saville was chosen member for Yorkshire by the "whig grandees" in the marquis of Rockingham's dining-room. "In those days they kept up a vast deal of state, and the great men all drove up in their coaches and six." Wilberforce was returned for Yorkshire in 1784; by the middle class of freeholders. At that time the clothiers of the West Riding were all Tories (ibid. 51).

The burgher order has always been narrowing the aristocratic circle. It was the rise of the cities and towns that destroyed the feudal system. These causes of the decline of the nobility were greatly strengthened by the astonishing mechanical discoveries of the present reign. It was in truth the spinning-jenny and smoke of the steam-engine that dimmed the lustre of the aristocracy. They were made richer by the change, but relatively to other classes they became poorer. Accompanied as these wonderful inventions have been by the rise of Dissent and Radicalism, they deprived the patrician class of the autocracy of wealth and numbers which they before possessed. They are, however, still a magnificent pillar of the state, whose condition needs no commiseration. It is not that they have fallen so much as that other classes have risen into competition with them; and if their exclusiveness has been encroached upon, it has been more than compensated to them by a vast increase of enjoyments, and that enviable social distinction which they continue to hold by courtesy, if not so absolutely as heretofore by indefeasible pretensions.

The increase of national riches consequent on commercial prosperity was attended with the natural adjunct of a vast increase in the luxurious arts. Horticulture, architecture, music, painting, and sculpture, were munificently encouraged. Splendid mansions rose in every part of the country, replete with every enjoyment and convenience that wealth, art, and science could produce. It was about the middle of the king's reign that the nobility and successful commercialists, Angerstein, Beckford, Methuen, and Ellis, began to form those magnificent galleries of art that are now the astonishment and admiration of foreigners. The superb collections of some of the French nobles and of their farmers-general, as well as those of Holland and Belgium, dispersed by political revolutions, found ready purchasers in this opulent country; and the result is, that "not only in cabinet pictures, but pictures of all kinds, England is now supposed to be the richest depository of the works of the great masters in the world." (Edinburgh Review, cxxvi. 401.) Luxury and improvement were rife in everything and among all classes. Private carriages, country-seats, and pleasure-horses multiplied. The hours of application were shortened; merchants and the better class of tradespeople, in lieu of their ledgers and counters, devoted the afternoon to wine, music, literature, or the theatres. Employments were more nicely subdivided; and in easement of their superiors, more superintendents, clerks, overseers, bailiffs, stewards, valets, footmen, and ladies' maids were kept than formerly. In towns, in-door apprenticeships became less frequent, and in the country there were less of yearly hiring, and the farmer and yeoman no longer sat down in common fellowship, at a common board, with his hind and husbandman. There was also great amelioration during the war in the condition of the labouring, handicraft, and artificer classes. Their clothing, lodging, furniture, and diet improved. If their masters exchanged the spinnet and harpsichord for the more dulcet notes of the piano or guitar, the treenware, the wooden spoon and trencher, and the pewter platter disappeared from cottages; and, what is more, that infallible sign of plebeian luxury, the wheaten loaf, after battling against the rye, the barley, and oatsen, in the South, at last wended its way from the Thames to the Tees, and is now struggling onward to the Clyde, the Frith of Forth, and John O'Groats.

There was moral as well as physical amendment. Intemperance might continue to be a Scotch or Irish, but ceased to be an English vice. A visitor no longer feared dislodging his host by leaving his table sober. Punch, that jolly but deleterious wassail-bowl, in which loan-mongers and contractors used to pledge bottle deep to the victories of Howe, St. Vincent, Jervis, and Bronte, disappeared. Wine was drunk in moderation, and more as a condiment to conversation than for the purpose of intoxication. Tavern duels ceased, and gentlemen who wore swords were compelled to adjourn the settlement of their disputes to Chalk-farm, Putney, or Battersea. There was less of the wild justice of nature allowed; street-fights were fewer; petty thieves were not allowed to be pumped upon or dragged through a horse-poll; nor juvenile delinquents scourged or maintained, at the mercy of individuals. In short, men were not suffered to adjudicate their wrongs agreeably to their passions and interests, but were compelled to bring them before a suitable tribunal, by which the nominal amount of criminality was augmented, but strife and ill-blood among neighbours prevented, and greater order and security obtained. Police was rendered more efficient and better organized. That great abomination of London, the trading-justices, whose harvest was fees, arbitrarily extorted, were superseded by a stipendiary magistracy, who, being independent of the suitors, and their hours and places of session fixed, justice was surely and more impartially administered. Under this system, suggested by Conant and adopted by Mr. Secretary Dundas in 1792, great improvements were effected in the metropolis and neighbourhood. Traveling by night became as secure almost as by day; and those gangs of disorderlies,—foot-pads, prostitutes, demireps, and thieves, that used to congregate at Ranelagh, Apollo's-garden, and other places of licentious resort—were dispersed, or reduced to a state of discipline less publicly hurtful and offensive.

There were improvements in costume as well as in manners and behaviour. Various extravagances of attire survived queen Anne and the two first Georges. In the reign of the former the dress of noblemen and gentlemen consisted of square-cut coats and long-flapped waistcoats, meeting the stockings drawn over the knee so high as to conceal the breeches, but gartered below it: large hanging cuff and lace ruffles; the skirts of the coat stiffened out with wire or buckram, from between which peeped the hilt of the sword. Blue or scarlet silk stockings, with gold or silver clocks; square-toed, short-quartered shoes with high red heels and small buckles; very long and formally-curved perukes, with three-cornered hats laced with gold or silver, completed the outer man. The tie-wig, bob-wig, and pigtail, were the additions of the next two reigns. George III.'s reign began with a large cocked-hat, called a Kevenhuller, imported from Germany, some of which were open before, like a church spout or the scales they weigh flour in. Gold-laced hats are said to have been general in 1775 and in 1778 (History of British Costume, 314), and were adopted by many as a military distinction, or to escape the press-gangs that were busy in the latter year. Round hats began to be worn about the breaking out of the French revolution, which, beside the downfall of the three-cornered cocked-hat, witnessed also the disappearance of the wig and the practice of "frizzing, plastering, and powdering the hair, till it was at least as ugly as a wig." In 1789 the shirt-collar appeared, and the ruffe vanished. About the same period pantaloon and Hessian boots were introduced (History of British Costume, 316): short boots and loose trousers were the result of the visit of the Cossacks in 1814, and with some slight variations in shape, together with the frock-coat, form the present undress. The changes in ladies' dress are too numerous and evanescent to follow. They continued to wear white stockings in mourning till 1778; hair-powder maintained its ground till 1793, when it was discarded by queen Charlotte and the princesses, and rapidly disappeared from the toilette. The large hoop was only worn at court or in full dress towards the close of the eighteenth century. Geo. IV. abolished the court-hoop.

The changes of fashion often caused great distress among workmen. In 1765 the peace of the metropolis was disturbed by the peruke-makers, who went in procession to petition the king against the innovation of people wearing their own hair. At the recovery of George III., after his first illness, an immense number of buckles were manufactured; they were spread over the whole kingdom. All the wealth of Walsall was invested in this speculation. The king went to St. Paul's without buckles. Shoe-strings supplied the place of straps, and Walsall was nearly ruined. The disuse of wigs, leather breeches, buckles, and buttons is supposed to have affected the industry of a million of persons.

The tableau of the present reign would be incomplete without a slight advertence to the state of religion, which presented different aspects at the beginning and towards the middle and end of the reign of George III. At the former period there was much rowdy acceptance both among public characters and public writers of eminence. Dr. Johnson and his satellites of rhetoricians, grammarians, and essayists were pious, but Hume, Gibbon, and other philosophical writers, were known infidels. All metaphysical researches, however, that had a tendency to shake the established faith and morality, were discountenanced after the outbreak of the French revolution. The higher classes, from fear, as well as loyalty to the king, became exemplary in their religious profession; and the faith of their inferiors was cherished by missionary-societies, bible-societies, and tract societies. Either from the same political cause, or from the example and rivalry of the sectaries, the conduct of the established clergy underwent a contemporary change. They became more decorous, more exemplary in morals, and more zealous and active in the discharge of their spiritual duties. They lost, notwithstanding, the populace of the towns; which, however, was partly made up to them by rich dissenters occasionally deserting their ranks, and joining the church.

Mr. Wilberforce, judging of religion and morality according to his own standard, which was not exactly that of the Protestant Reformation, but more nearly allied to the Reformation subverted, thought both had declined during the war. At Manchester he found church attendance much diminished, particularly in the afternoon. Sunday had become a more frequent travelling-day with merchants. But of another provincial town he says, "The manners of Leeds remarkably frugal, sober, and commercial. None of the merchants spend money, and it would be discreditable to attend public places."—"An increasing evil at Sheffield is, that the apprentices used to live with their masters and be of the family; now their wives are grown too fine ladies to like it." (Life, by his Sons, i. 164.) This was in 1796, and the changes described may be traced to other causes than a decline of piety.

A satisfactory proof of the improved condition of the people is the expansion of the NEWSPAPER PRESS. It was to the multiplication of newspapers, as evidence of augmented wealth and intelligence among the middle ranks, that lord John Russell referred in his elaborate speech on parliamentary reform, April 29, 1822. Newspapers had not only increased in number and circulation, but had enlarged in size, improved in literary management, and in the selection and variety of their contents. In lieu of mere chronicles of occurrences, they had become vast depositories of discussion and information on all questions of public interest and benefit. The practice of pamphlet-writing on ephemeral topics had been almost superseded by them, aided by the disquisitions of the quarterly journals. In the almost illimitable columns of the daily papers was embraced not only domestic and foreign transactions, but the proceedings of the senate, of courts of law and police, and of scientific and literary associations. Considering the rapidity with which newspapers are conveyed to every part of the kingdom, that they find their way into every place of human resort, and are almost universally read, it is hardly possible to overrate their importance in the general diffusion of facts and intelligence. If not another language to mankind, they certainly have been, and must continue to be in a still greater degree, the most efficient of popular instructors. It may be further observed of them, that they have become more independent of influence, both from individuals and the government. During Mr. Pitt's ministry, and till the end of the war, journals were frequently set up and supported by the Treasury. There was little of this, we apprehend, at the close of the present reign. The leading journals had become great properties, vested in private shareholders, who conducted them on commercial principles, and depended for success and remuneration, like literature generally, on public patronage.

The following statement of the number of newspapers published within the United Kingdom, at three distinct periods, will show the progress of the "fourth estate," as it has been termed, during the last forty years of George III.'s reign:—

N.B.—The Tables of Prices, of Exports and Imports, of Men of Letters, &c., for the last five years of the present reign, are carried forward to the end of the reign of George IV.

GEORGE IV. A.D. 1820 to 1830.

THE difficulties with which the country had struggled during the first five years of the peace and the last of the Regency continued unabated, so that the new reign commenced unpopularly. Almost one of the first occurrences that marked the accession of George IV. was the discovery, or rather the suppression, of a wild and atrocious plot for the assassination of the king's ministers. The employment of spies in perturbed periods, though sometimes allowable as a needful adjunct of defensive police, is accompanied with serious evils. First, the character of government is depreciated by the co-operation of an unprincipled agency: secondly, the profligate instruments employed have an interest, and mostly pursue it in fostering, if not absolutely creating, the mischief they are intended to frustrate; and, lastly, the aspect of the times is perplexed, and obscurity thrown over the true origin and extent of public disorders. This was the case with the Cato-street conspiracy. Authorised spies assisted at the orgies of the desperadoes, they encouraged them with blood-money, and there was some difficulty in determining how far the diabolical scheme originated with the myrmidons of the Home Office, in the extreme penury of the conspirators, or in the rankling feelings of revenge left by the unpunished outrage at Manchester, and the recent coercive acts of the legislature. The same dubious features marked the contemporary, but unconnected insurrectionary movement in the south-west of Scotland. The ludicrous rebellion of Bonnymuir—its provisional government, state proclamations, and other accompaniments—being, as subsequently ascertained, chiefly the result of government espionage working on the distresses and ignorance of the population.

The arrival of Queen Caroline absorbed the interest felt by these opening events. Her majesty had been six years absent from England, and for the last twenty-three years had lived apart from her husband. Their union had been of policy, not of choice. Nature had not suited them: dislike ensued, and separation was the consequence. There was no divorce—no legal act of disunion: friendly feelings were preserved up to a certain point. Their only child was taken from the mother, but occasional interviews allowed. Whispers of misconduct were circulated; so early as 1806 inquiry was instituted, and the result was, that levity was proved and censured,—crime and punishment were neither established nor enforced. Acquittal of guilt only slightly alleviated the irksome position of her royal highness, which was aggravated after the establishment of the regency. The prince declared he would not meet her in public or in private; the effect of which was, to place the princess out of the pale of society. The prince was the fountain of office, honour, and emolument. He was the leader of fashion; his anathema was a social interdict: all who looked forward to preferment or profit, or to mingle in the highest circle, eschewed her company. Under this blighting influence the princess became insulated and neglected. The drawing-room was shut against her. She was not allowed to participate in the honours of her husband. She did not share in the compliments paid to the nation by the kings of Europe. Such was the might of the regent, that even the conquerors of Napoleon shrunk from visiting an illustrious female marked by his displeasure. The literary and philosophical Madame de Staël was no exception to the rest. She interchanged visits with the powerful and prosperous husband, but shunned the humbled and persecuted wife*. Her associates were mostly like herself, of the unfortunate class, or those who had nothing to hope or fear from the court; poets who did not aspire to the laureatship; and politicians out of place, who found in the princess a convenient substitute for a refractory heir-apparent to the throne†.

Torture has become more refined, but is not extinct. Henry VIII. would have rid himself of a hateful wife by openly sending her to the scaffold. A German prince would have immured her in a dungeon castle. English law did not admit of either application to Caroline of Brunswick, but her lot was hardly less cruel. Her life was made almost a living death by the power of her consort. Meet associates were kept from her. She had neither the enjoyments nor distinctions due to her birth and station. She sought consolation in travel, but persecution followed her steps. She was not informed of her daughter's marriage; the news of her child's death reached her in her exile. At home she was neglected; abroad the same spirit pursued her. If she travelled privately, that circumstance attracted inquiry and observation: if she announced herself, the ambassadors of England were charged not to render her the accustomed honours.

This ubiquity of persecution looked vindictive; it was impolitic as well as unfeeling. If the princess had gone abroad with her acknowledged title, had been received by the representatives of the regent as the wife of their master, being at the same time a person of known levity of character, the strictest watch over her conduct would have been justifiable. The honour of the crown required it. Under the contingency of her living with the future king, of becoming the mother of future monarchs, of being placed at the head of British females, this vigilance would have become a duty; but, long rejected and disowned, a system of espionage was superfluous insult. However abandoned, the example of the princess could neither be hurtful to English society nor endanger the royal succession. Rumours, however, became prevalent that the princess had selected her own menial for her paramour, enriched and honoured him, and lived with him in open adultery. All this would have been publicly unimportant had it been disregarded, and as the relations that had long subsisted between the royal parties required it should have been. The most hurtful consequence that could result from this illicit connexion was, in all probability, precluded by the age of the princess. But a commission was indiscreetly appointed; ministers were made officially acquainted with the alleged irregularities of her royal highness, and they could not well avoid acting on that information: This was the dilemma. On the death of George III. they had no alternative, save either to admit the princess, if she desired it, to all the rights and privileges of British queen, or by a public investigation establish the grounds of their refusal. Caroline's spirit was high and intractable. She had been incensed by the omission of her name in the Liturgy, and by the refusal of due honours at foreign courts. She was indignant at hearing only threats of degradation and exposure; for, owing to causes never satisfactorily explained, her chief professional adviser concealed from her the acceptance by government of his own private, but unauthorised, proposition, made to lord Liverpool before the king's death, for an amicable settlement, till after her determination was irrevocably taken to brave her persecutor, demand a recognition of her rights and the unqualified avowal of her innocence.

The king and ministers believed the queen guilty, and considered themselves bound to refuse her demands: hereupon the parties joined issue. Messages and green bags, containing the criminating evidence, were sent down to either house of parliament, announcing her majesty's arrival in England, and recommending to serious consideration the charges produced against her. The alleged adulterous intercourse, being committed with a foreigner, did not amount to treason; it was not an indictable offence—it was a mere civil injury. Party was already mixed up in the question, and intemperate speeches were delivered in the angry discussions which ensued. In the lords a committee was appointed, but the commons adjourned to allow time for negotiation. The adjournment was renewed from time to time, by which nothing was gained but delay: protocols were interchanged, and conferences held between two of the ministers of the crown and her majesty's legal advisers, upon the avowed understanding, "that nothing should be admitted on the one side, or retracted on the other," which led to the nullity that common sense might have anticipated from a negotiation conducted on such a principle. Other half-measures, of a similar import, were tried by the benevolent or independent party, headed by Mr. Wilberforce in the commons, and were attended with a like failure.

All accommodation proving useless, a secret committee of the lords reported July 4th, 1820, and next day a bill for the degradation of the queen and the dissolution of her marriage with the king was introduced. Her majesty protested against these proceedings at every step, and her counsel were allowed to be heard at the bar. She petitioned for a list of witnesses and of places where the charges of criminal conduct were laid; both these requests were denied. But before the second reading the queen's counsel were heard against the principle of the bill. Their objections were founded on the tendency of the inquiry to corrupt the public morals; on the queen's right of recrimination; on the unusual course pursued; and they inferred that the whole originated in the king's desire to be at liberty to contract another marriage. Her majesty was occasionally present during the examination of witnesses. Her defence was not entered upon till the 3rd of October, and her witnesses were of a greatly superior class in life to those adduced by the prosecutors. Complaint was made that important foreign witnesses, in support of the queen, were kept back through the influence of the English ministry. The house, with a laudable regard to its character for justice, resolved that proceedings should pause till this ministerial influence was impartially investigated; and the queen's counsel were desired to call witnesses to prove their assertion, which they confessed themselves unable to do. The proceedings anterior to the second reading occupied the house to the 6th November, when a majority of twenty-eight appeared in favour of the bill. This majority was small. Several peers objected to the divorce clause, and on the third reading the majority had dwindled to NINE: upon which lord Liverpool announced that the proceeding was abandoned.

During the inquiry, the house of commons continued its occasional adjournments, and the excitement in that house and out of it, against the progress of the Bill of Degradation, was of the most intense description. The entire country, in truth, was on the verge of rebellion; and, some of the military having caught the popular feeling, the crisis was pregnant with peril. This feeling, however, was in great part irrespective of her majesty's guilt or innocence, which attests the impolicy of the proceeding instituted against her; for, had all the inculpatory charges been established by irrefragable testimony, the general sympathy would have continued unchanged, since it arose not so much from the merits of the case as conviction of her wrongs—that she was the victim of a twenty-five years' persecution—that, however great her delinquencies, they were grievously provoked—and that the man who had shown himself her most powerful and relentless persecutor was the last in his dominions who ought to have cast a stone against his injured spouse.

For the other points connected with the trial of Queen Caroline we must refer to the Chronicle of Occurrences. There are only a few more circumstances connected with this memorable investigation that require notice in this place. Upon the general question of her majesty's guilt or innocence it is unimportant, and would be hardly decorous to entertain, and certainly not express, save one opinion. She was acquitted by her judges and by the grand-jury of the nation, therefore she is entitled to the benefit of that acquittal in the estimate of her contemporaries and of posterity. In explanation of some parts of her conduct this may be adduced: she knew she was watched; and, either from mere wantonness of mischief, or desire to annoy her persecutors, she was constantly laying mine's nests for them; affording pretexts for the scandalous reports which she well knew would be duly transmitted to their employers by the spies with whom she was constantly surrounded. Hence her ostentatious fondness for, and the mysterious adoption of, the children of strangers. Her levity in this respect sometimes went to the extent of assuming the appearance of pregnancy, apparently to alarm her consort with the danger of having imposed upon him a surreptitious heir, and his royal brothers and the princesses with the prospect of a disputed succession to the British monarchy.

Dismissing this part of the subject, let us advert to its political bearings.

The power of the kings of England was strikingly exemplified in the prosecution of the unfortunate Caroline. While regent, the prince had sufficient influence over the aristocracy to surround his consort with social desolation, and force her into an involuntary exile when no criminal charge existed against her—when she had, in fact, been acquitted, after a solemn investigation, conducted by lords Grenville, Spencer, Erskine, and Ellenborough. After her return to England, in 1820, the charges against the queen were more weighty than in 1806; but, owing to her age, of less constitutional importance, yet the king could still find supple instruments to continue his vindictive persecution. Except George IV. himself, and the major portion of the royal family, there were few who did not commiserate the queen's situation, and contemplate her trial as a hardship to herself and a calamity to the nation. The ministers unwillingly lent themselves to the king's vengeance rather than endanger their places: their fears, however, were groundless. In the existing state of popular excitement successors could not have been found to carry on the persecution. But the king is alleged to have practised a stratagem on his servants. He threatened to dismiss them unless they executed his odious task, and call to his aid other advisers without imposing upon his new councillors the hateful obligation. Rather than be superseded, they brought forward their bill of pains and penalties. Their position was not exempt from difficulty. Their first indiscretion consisted in commencing hostilities against the queen by the omission of her name in the Liturgy, and thereby provoking her claim to regal rights. That done, only three courses were open, either to admit the queen's claim, which was hardly justifiable with the evidence they possessed against her; resign their places; or bring her to trial. They adopted the last, which, if not the most politic, was an undisguised proceeding.

The conduct of the Whigs pending the investigation was honourable and disinterested. There were only a few who sought to make the juncture subservient to ambition, but, as a body, they did not espouse either side. Some of them were obviously staggered by the strong, though incredible, evidence of grossness adduced against her majesty, while others warmly espoused her cause on the same chivalrous grounds that mainly influenced the national judgment.

It is a common attribute of historical occurrences that those possessing great ephemeral have little enduring interest; while, on the other hand, those which comparatively obtain little attention from contemporaries often swell into vast importance to the next generation. The former was peculiarly the case with the queen's trial. It was the leading, as it was by far the most exciting, event of the present reign, yet it is now fast hastening into oblivion, and, along with it, the heated, and, measured by the occasion, the disproportionate ebullition that accompanied it. Had this celebrated conjugal dispute related to private individuals, it would have been long since deservedly forgotten; and, viewed in reference to the high personages it concerned, it appears only one of those ordinary matrimonial disagreements so frequently adjudicated in Doctors' Commons, arising out of personal dislike, incompatible tempers, or late marriages anticipated by earlier attachments.

The king rapidly regained his popularity. On opening the parliamentary session of 1821 he mentioned the queen by name, and recommended to the house of commons a provision for her maintenance. This provision her majesty at first refused, unless her name were placed in the Liturgy; but subsequently altered her determination, and accepted an annuity of 50,000*l.* She was not, however, allowed to share in the coronation, that was celebrated in the summer with unusual splendour. Her exclusion from the ceremony, though, with her wonted spirit, she attended personally to assert her right to be present, did not elicit any strong expression of public discontent, and clearly showed that the disposition to continue the previous excitement in her favour had subsided. Her death, about three weeks after, terminated her misfortunes. The suddenness of her dissolution revived general sympathy, which was tumultuously expressed at her funeral, and there were few who did not lament the untimely end of an illustrious female, whose noble and generous qualities, had they been favoured by a more suitable education and marriage, would have made her the delight and ornament of her exalted station. The king at the time was making his noisy and transitory visit to Ireland, under the laudable but Quixotic impression that his royal presence would mollify the factious spirit and alleviate the chronic maladies of that distracted kingdom.

Contemporary events abroad presented a flattering but illusive aspect. In 1820 the Spanish military, under the influence of Riego and other gallant officers, and encouraged by the discontents of the middle ranks, revolted against the despotism of Ferdinand, and succeeded in establishing a constitution whose chief defects were the premature disregard of popular prejudices and the risks of anarchy. Portugal followed the example of Spain. Besides suffering the evils which arise from an ill-organised government and non-resident sovereign, she had for many years been reduced to the situation of a mere dependency on Brazil. The revolutionary movement began at Oporto, and speedily extended to Lisbon, where it was consummated, after an unsuccessful effort of marshal Beresford and the royalists to arrest its progress. In Naples the Spanish constitution found imitators not less zealous than in Portugal. The desire for a representative government had long existed in the south of Italy among the intelligent and middling classes of society. It was fostered and diffused by the activity of the Carbonari and other political associations. Hopeless of obtaining their object from the spontaneous grace of their sovereign, and encouraged by the example of Spain to confide in the efficacy of their own endeavours, the Neapolitans determined on insurrection, in which the army, headed by generals Pepe and Carascosa, was induced to co-operate. Deserted by the military, the king had no alternative save acquiescence: all existing political institutions were abolished, the Spanish constitution adopted, and Ferdinand and his son pledged their royal faith to its observance. The flame did not stop here, but early in 1821 burst out in Piedmont. Victor Emmanuel, rather than accept the Spanish constitution dictated to him by a union of citizens, soldiers, and students, directed by Santa Rosa and Lescio, resigned his crown, leaving prince Carignano regent of the kingdom, who, with the view of gaining time, and more effectually serving the royal cause, placed himself at the head of the insurgents. Even the provinces of the Turkish empire did not escape the fervor of constitutional movements. In Moldavia and Wallachia an insurrection broke out against the Porte, fomented by prince Ypsilanti, a retainer of the Russian court, and which, by extending into the Morea, or ancient Peloponnese, became, after a long struggle, the issue of which was delayed by intestine divisions—the natural concomitant of political revolutions—the foundation of the independence of Greece.

Except the establishment of Grecian independence and the severance of Brazil from Portugal, and its erection into an independent state, the stirring events of 1820-1 had no abiding results. The mass of the population were unprepared for regeneration. They were ready enough to join in fêtes and diversions, for they were agreeable to usage and their taste, but they had neither the disposition, the principles, nor the habits that interest men in political changes. It was only the minority of the adventurous and enlightened that co-operated in the revolutions: the peasantry and the populace remained quiescent, and continued—what they had been for centuries—the passive slaves of events. They did not oppose the revolutions, neither did they oppose their suppression. That the changes in the Peninsula and in Italy were not altogether premature is attested by the fact that the insurrectionists were able to overturn the old authorities, to establish new institutions, which they would have maintained, despite of their errors, had not external forces interfered. They were the paramount authority among themselves, but were unable to resist a coalition of foreign despots. For this a physical power was requisite; that could only be organised by a union of all classes, and a national enthusiasm the patriots failed to evoke. In consequence they were overwhelmed by foreigners. Naples and Piedmont were successively overrun by the armies of Austria. They encountered hardly any resistance. The former governments were restored, and, the better to guard against reaction, the fortresses and large towns were occupied by the invaders till the elements of the late risings had been dispersed, or made powerless by executions, confiscation, exile, and imprisonment. The fate of Spain was deferred two years longer. But consultations were held by the great powers, and the overthrow of the constitutional system determined upon at the congress of Verona, held at the close of 1822. Meanwhile the French were silently collecting a military force on the Pyrenees; first under the pretext of a sanitary cordon, next as an army of observation, and lastly, in the spring of 1823, the mask being thrown aside, they crossed the Bidassoa. In five months they penetrated to Cadiz, dispersed the cortes, and restored the despotism of Ferdinand. A simultaneous movement was organised in Portugal. Encouraged by the near approach of the French to the frontier, the royalists exerted themselves, succeeded in bringing over to their party some regiments stationed in Lisbon, and, aided by the queen and prince Miguel, re-established, contrary to his own inclination and protest, the king in absolute authority.

Such were the issues of the continental revolutions. Their progress was arrested by the forcible intervention of foreign powers, confederated under the denomination of the HOLY ALLIANCE. This celebrated league forms a remarkable feature in European history, and merits elucidation. It was established immediately after the overthrow of Napoleon, and grew out of the subversive principles of the French revolution. Russia, Austria, and Prussia were the leading confederates. England was solicited to join the compact, but George IV. declined on constitutional grounds, contenting himself with a tacit approval of its objects. These objects were laudable, so far as avowed, and as the avowed objects mostly are of every undertaking. They professed to go no further than the enforcement of practical Christianity, and the government of nations agreeably to the Christian doctrine. Their practices interpreted differently their designs, which appeared directed solely to the conservation, however replete with abuses, of existing governments, especially monarchical institutions. They claimed to derive all power from God. They denounced all political changes, not emanating from themselves, as infringements of their divine viceregency. They met periodically to determine the liberties of nations: at the cities where they assembled no strangers were allowed to remain; nor was a secretary or reporter permitted to be present during their discussions, lest he should divulge their mysterious proceedings; but they usually terminated with the promulgation of a manifesto darkly expository of their views and intentions. Royal congresses of this character were successively held at Troppau, at Laybach, and Verona. To Laybach Ferdinand of Naples was summoned to hear the fiat of the crowned heads, whether he should be a constitutional or absolute king. They declared in favour of the latter, and forthwith he was restored by Austrian bayonets, despite of his oath and the wishes of his subjects. The same high tribunal decreed the re-establishment of the Sardinian despotism. At Spain there was some demur, but finally the subversion of her constitution was resolved on, and France, or at least her ultra ministers, became the ready executive instruments of absolutism in the Peninsula.

The triumph of the French beyond the Pyrenees, though unjustly and treacherously achieved, was not unaccompanied with benefits to the world. It completed the separation between Spain and her late colonies; and the fears of European interference checked the tendency to disunion among the infant states of South America. A still more important consequence of French aggression was, its eliciting from England a prompt declaration of her intended policy towards the transatlantic powers. That policy consisted in opening commercial relations with them, towards the close of 1823, by the appointment of consuls in Colombia, Mexico, Peru, Chili, and Buenos Ayres, and the declaration by Mr. Secretary Canning to the French government, that England would not interfere with Spain in any attempt to reconquer her late colonies, but she "would not permit any third power to attack them, or reconquer them for her*." This was extremely unpalatable to the holy allies, whose leading aim was the entire restoration of the ancient system, even to the subjection of Greece to Ottoman domination; so far as that system did not impose sacrifices on themselves: as, for example, by the re-establishment of the kingdom of Poland. In this policy England had, under the foreign secretaryship of the marquis of Londonderry, tacitly acquiesced; and it was only about the period of the suicide of that nobleman she began to exhibit symptoms of jealousy at continental dictatorship. At the congress of Verona she openly dissented from the councils of the confederacy; and her ministers protested against the right of the confederates to meddle in the internal affairs of the Peninsula. Britain being dissentient was fatal to the efficiency, if not to the existence, of the regal combination; for by her might she could always impede, if not frustrate, their proceedings. The despots of the continent might thenceforward continue to announce, in circulars penned by Messrs. Gentz and Metternich, their mystical axioms of oppression, but the nations were aware that England had ceased to be either a sleeping or active partner in the firm, and she would neither co-operate in their plans, nor sanction their anti-progressive doctrines.

Coeval with this change in foreign policy was the adoption at home of a more liberal system of internal legislation. To legal reforms, financial economy, commercial and industrial freedom, public intelligence had long pointed, and these domestic ameliorations, not involving constitutional changes, were favourably listened to by ministers and their newly-incorporated allies, the Grenvilles. The times, too, had become auspicious. Symptoms of returning prosperity began to beam with a steady light on the horizon. From the peace, up to 1823, the country had suffered in different degrees the evils of transition. Trade had been dull, fluctuating, or embarrassed; agriculture hardly remunerative, and the landowners, burdened with mortgages and settlements contracted during the intoxication of the war, in a depreciated currency, could with difficulty submit to the reduction in rents the impoverished state of their tenants required. The consequences were loud complaints and desperate projects of relief. The abolition of tithes and sale of church property were talked of at county-meetings: the sequestration of the crown-lands, the reduction of the interest of the national debt, or its equivalent, a copious issue of paper money, were also expedients commonly mooted and favourably listened to. During the adverse circumstances of the people these suggestions were favourably received, but, the difficulties of the country surmounted, they were neglected or forgotten. Abundant employment for capital and industry, advancing prices, plenty of money, and boundless private credit, spread general contentment, hilarity, and an inordinate spirit of commercial enterprise.

The absence of political excitement since the Queen's Trial had been remarkable. The Whigs kept up, with an eagerness abated by the apparent remoteness of the object, the old feud with their opponents for power; but, unsupported by the masses, they could not effectively interfere with the crown in the choice of its servants. Radicalism had severed from them their popular allies, and they assumed the name, given them by one of their leaders (Mr. Tierney), of "His Majesty's Opposition," as more significant of their altered position. Their differences with the ministerialists were rather in degree than in principle. To the maintenance of established institutions in Church and State both were steadfastly devoted; but, though the whigs uniformly disowned the subversive doctrines of the radicals, they justly claimed to themselves the credit of having marshalled the way to the tories of a liberal commercial system; of a conciliatory policy towards Ireland; judicial, legal, and fiscal reforms; the suppression of monopolies; and the recognition of the nationality of the South American colonies.

In the dearth of party contention, the debates of parliament were mostly of a pacific character. They referred more to economical, legal, or commercial, than constitutional or political topics. Occasionally there were grand debates on foreign policy, catholic emancipation, the disfranchisement of corrupt boroughs, the influence of the crown and its secret revenues; but the staple and most interesting subjects of sessional discussion were agricultural distress, the currency and the Bank of England, the navigation laws, the laws relative to combinations of workmen, the silk-trade, commutation of Irish tithes, constitution of juries, and the punishment and reform of criminals. Ireland obtained a large portion of legislative attention, especially after the grievous famine of 1822; and in 1824-5 a searching inquiry was instituted, by a committee of the house of lords, into its social state and natural capabilities. Another subject efficiently pursued early in the king's reign was RETRENCHMENT in the public expenditure. Ministers were loth to return to a peace establishment in the army, navy, or public offices. During the waste and negligence of the war sinecures, pensions, and overpaid places had multiplied enormously. The whigs at intervals assaulted these abuses: but, from want of zeal or timidity, their attacks were limited to insulated excrescences, such as the supernumerary lords of the admiralty, an extra postmaster-general, or lieutenant-general of the ordnance. At length this unbeaten field was entered upon in good earnest ; first by sir Henry Parnell*, and afterwards by Mr. Joseph Hume, a Scotch member of great shrewdness, practical sense, and indomitable perseverance, which no official artifice could exhaust or baffle. Mr. Hume began his labours in 1821 ; he continued them in succeeding sessions with extraordinary resolution and ability, despite of the jeers of Canning, the ribaldry of Croker, and the solemn indignation of Huskisson ; and, supported by the public voice, the honest and independent members of both parties, and not unfrequently sheltered from the missiles of his assailants by the protecting agis of Henry Brougham's matchless eloquence, important economical reforms resulted from his exertions.

The great MERCANTILE CRISIS of 1825-6 forms an epoch in the commercial history of this reign. It had its origin in the prosperity of the antecedent years, which prosperity was indicated by the low rate of interest, and a boundless spirit of speculation in foreign loans, mining adventures in South America, and joint-stock schemes of every imaginable description for the employment of capital. Excess of riches produced general recklessness in the application of them ; and this redundancy was augmented by the profuse issues and advances of the Bank of England and country banks, combined with an inconsiderate extension of credit and confidence among individuals. The result was a very disastrous reaction, which long weighed on the energies and industry of the community. Before the revulsion, and in the absence of political excitement, the public mind had taken a very gratifying impulse. Instead of the abundance of peace being accompanied with licentiousness, as in former reigns, the people converted the advantages of their situation to moral and intellectual improvements. At no former period had there been manifested so general a desire for information ; a desire, too, not limited to any particular class, but extending to all classes of society. The more opulent formed themselves into philosophical and literary societies ; while the working people established mechanic, apprentice, and gymnastic institutions for mutual benefit and instruction. A new university was projected in the metropolis for the accommodation of the middle ranks of society. Cheap publications for disseminating useful knowledge were issued in incredible numbers ; and, both soil and seed being favourable, it was impossible to anticipate other, had not the mercantile crisis intervened, than a rich harvest of social advantages.

In 1827 there were symptoms, though feeble ones, of returning prosperity. That year is also memorable for the termination of the PREMIERSHIP of the earl of Liverpool. His ministry had been long but not brilliant. Its chief characteristic was inertness. Instead of an impulse, it had been a drag on the advancing intelligence of the community ; and the few and inefficient public reforms which had been carried during the twelve years that had elapsed since the peace, had been reluctantly conceded by the narrow and timid spirit of his administration. Moreover, his government had become weak, partly from the mutual jealousies of its members of superiority, and partly from a division of sentiment on the catholic question. On this they had agreed to differ ; a principle of co-operation often more convenient to the parties than conducive to efficiency or integrity of purpose. The short-lived ministry of Mr. Canning succeeded, after some curious incidents, which are detailed in the occurrences of the period. It was formed by a union with a large section of the whigs under the marquis of Lansdowne, who seasonably lent their aid to the new premier, abruptly deserted by his former coadjutors, on the ground that his general policy accorded with that the Opposition had for years past supported and recommended. Earl Grey was not a party to the coalition, which those who were defended as a means of averting the establishment of an illiberal administration, and of forwarding those measures of public amendment upon which the whigs had prided themselves, and which had not been compromised; neither would the introduction of them be delayed in consequence of their new alliance*. The death of Mr. Canning, four months after his elevation, did not dissolve the cabinet. Viscount Goderich succeeded him, and Mr. Herries became chancellor of the exchequer. The last appointment became a source of misunderstandings, which lord Goderich being unable or unwilling to reconcile, his ministry expired almost in its birth, towards the close of the year.

The formation of the WELLINGTON MINISTRY was the commencement, in 1828, of a new era. Civil disqualifications on account of religious differences had been too long maintained. They may have been defensible securities in the infancy of a protestant constitution, but had ceased to be expedient. Dissent was no longer a type of political discontent; nor catholicism, of a divided allegiance. The dissenters were loyal; they had become a numerous, opulent, and intelligent body; and the catholics had publicly disclaimed those dogmas which rendered them unsafe subjects of a protestant state. No solid pretext remained for the exclusion of either from their civil franchises. It was unprofitable injustice, as well as fraught with danger to the empire. It was a source of weakness in war, and of internal divisions and divided councils in peace. Ministry after ministry had fallen to pieces solely on this account. An efficient and united administration could not be formed, because men of ability and patriotism would not be parties to an obsolete system of intolerance. The legislative suffered as well as the executive. Its time was wasted: every year the subject was laboriously discussed, and every year produced the same mortifying nullity. Parliament became more like an ecclesiastical convocation, occupied in the profitless controversies of theology, than a lay assembly delegated to promote the temporal interests of the nation.

The policy of concession was not a new policy. It was the policy of the last reign, and was only interrupted by the French revolution. It began in 1778, by giving to Irish papists the rights of inheritance and of property, and absolving them from imprisonment for life for keeping schools†. In 1791 there were important concessions‡. The oaths and declarations of catholics were modified; their places of worship and schools for education were tolerated, and they were permitted to practise the law. Two years after, the army and navy in Ireland were thrown open to papists, and they were enabled to vote at parliamentary elections§. Subsequent to the Union, and during the regency, nothing was done for them, save an act of 1817, which placed English catholics on a level with the Irish in respect of admission to offices in the army and navy.

During the Canning and Goderich ministries the catholics indulged hopes of further ameliorations, which were entirely extinguished by the formation of that of the duke of Wellington. His grace was a tory and anti-catholic. Liberality was supposed to be alien to his nature; force and arbitrariness his sole weapons of domination. He was feared as well as generally disliked. All this, however, resulted from imperfect knowledge of the real character of the minister—his sterling good sense and ardent zeal for the public welfare. Past events had shown the mischief of an exclusive policy, its disturbing and weakening effect on the imperial government, and the danger of dismemberment with which it threatened the United Kingdom. Resolved to obviate these evils, the duke, with his wonted energy and promptitude, determined on a new course. The task was herculean, but masterly executed.

The first session of the duke's ministry was signalised by the adoption of lord John Russell's bill for the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, by which municipal corporations and offices of power and trust were thrown open to the dissenters. An efficient finance committee was appointed on the motion of Mr. Peel, and the first fruit of whose labours was the stopping a lavish waste of public money in the granting of life-annuities, founded on erroneous calculations of human longevity. Next followed commissions to inquire into the state of the common law, and the law of real property. These resulted from the luminous parliamentary exposition of legal defects and institutions by Mr. Brougham. An act to prohibit the circulation of Scotch small notes in England; and a corn-bill, in the main agreeing with that rejected in the preceding year, but rather more favourable to the agriculturist, concluded, in July, the important sessional business of 1828.

Meanwhile Ireland presented an extraordinary spectacle. To affirm she was on the verge of civil war was merely to reiterate what had been commonly alleged of her situation for the last half-century. She exhibited symptoms more alarming and unmanageable than actual rebellion. By a novel species of agitation, carried on by itinerant orators, who with the zeal of missionaries set forth the wrongs of their country, but who constantly deprecated illegal violence in seeking redress for them—who themselves cautiously kept within the bounds of the law—the Catholic Association had obtained almost the entire control of the population. They ordered a census of the people, levied tribute under the name of "rent," and assumed to be in every respect the representatives of the wishes and grievances of Ireland. A new source of authority was discovered by them in the forty-shilling freeholders. These had been mostly created by the landlords for political purposes. Under the influence of their priests they deserted their former masters, and submitted to the guidance of the catholic leaders. A new election for Clare afforded an unequivocal test of their power. Their great leader, Daniel O'Connell, stood for the county upon the strength of his right, and a new construction of existing statutes. He was returned by a large majority, and the ministerial candidate, supported by almost the whole of the landed gentry, defeated. In the event of a dissolution, the catholics boasted they could return, by the aid of the "forties," seventy members to parliament, pledged to oppose every measure of ministers till emancipation was granted. Against a power like this it was impossible to govern Ireland. The Orange societies and Brunswick clubs were revived by way of counteraction; but the contest was now one of opinion, not of physical force. A series of conversions rapidly followed this new aspect of Irish affairs. A brother-in-law of Mr. Secretary Peel was the first to avow his altered sentiments. Next followed the publication of a private letter of the premier, in which he expressed himself favourable to a settlement of the catholic question. Even the lord-lieutenant was convinced of the necessity of concession, and went so far as to encourage perseverance in the peaceful agitation scheme that had wrought such wonders.

Parliament met early in 1829. The opening speech disclosed the new policy forced on government. The Catholic Association was to be suppressed, the forty-shilling freeholders disfranchised, but catholic disabilities were to be removed. Necessity, not choice, had conquered. Still praise is due to the vanquished as well as the victors. They achieved the greatest of triumphs in conquering themselves, in surrendering to the common good inveterate and long-cherished sentiments. The king, the ministry, the church, and the aristocracy, were opposed to catholic emancipation, but controlled by imperative circumstances, directed by the energies of the prime minister.

Such an unexpected revulsion in public policy forms an instance of the little prescience of the wisest in political occurrences, and of the inappreciable causes by which they are produced. Sternness, inflexibility, coarctiveness, and a decided hostility to change, were the prominent manifestations anticipated from the Wellington administration. Contrary to these forebodings, it proved almost effeminate in its course, and certainly more conciliatory and promptly liberal in its concessions than any that ever governed the kingdom. The forty-shilling freeholders formed another anomaly of the time. They had been created as mere instruments of servility, for the perpetuation of the ascendancy of their landlords. They were considered so little worth that Mr. O'Connell actually gave them up—consented to their disfranchisement—in 1825: yet this despised order of freeholders proved, if not the saviours of the country, a very potent instrument in its regeneration.

There is one mode of solving a part of these paradoxes. It is often the interest of men that their present conduct should belie their previous reputation. This is peculiarly the case with political bodies, whose power depends on their popularity. Secure of the support of their own adherents, they seek to neutralise opposition by concession, and to strengthen themselves, by making converts in the ranks of their enemies, through the adoption of their measures and opinions. It thus happens that a tory ministry, whose authority is precarious, will often incline to a whig policy, and vice versa.

The remaining events of the present reign are not so important as to require notice further than that devoted to them in the Chronicle. Dropsy, which in the last three years had carried off the duke of York and the princess royal of England, terminated, in June, 1830, the protracted sufferings of the king. The seclusion in which his majesty had latterly lived was commonly ascribed to misanthropy, but arose from bodily infirmities that it was thought politic to conceal, and which rendered his appearance in public or even in private society irksome and distressing. Charity and beneficence continued to the last prominent traits in the conduct of George IV.

The transplanting of the Brunswick princes to England was favourable to their improvement. George I. was thoroughly German: he was too old on his accession to the British throne, and his reign too brief, to admit of his outgrowing in any sensible degree his native habits and acquirements. The reign of George II. was much longer than that of his predecessor, and his character superior; but, either from want of taste or aptitude, he hardly assimilated nearer than the grade of yeoman to the national standard of cultivation. George III. attained the rank of a respectable English squire, though greatly inferior to his successor in social polish and refinement. While the Hanover electors continued aliens in origin, language, and manners, it is not surprising that their prerogatives were contested, and their supremacy grudgingly admitted by the aristocracy. They were felt to be, and in truth they were, little more than the elected servants of the nobility; morally and intellectually their inferiors; hardly even in pecuniary revenue equalling many of the English lords. Much of this competitive equality disappeared in the former and entirely in the present reign. George IV. entered the lists under highly favourable circumstances. His path had been ably pioneered for him by his predecessor. Possessed of a magnificent civil-list, a princely education, richly endowed by nature, he might, independently of his illustrious descent and royal inheritance, fearlessly compete with his loftiest peers in all the pretensions on which aristocracy prides itself.

While prince of Wales, George IV. was mostly popular. Handsome in person, elegant in manners, free, joyous, a clever mimic and vocalist, racy, and amusing in conversation, he possessed the exterior embellishments that mostly win general favour, and made him the idol of the world of fashion, and, in no small degree, of the populace. It was creditable to his taste that he early attached himself to the brilliant, though rather dissolute, circle of Fox, Burke, and Sheridan. He was the votary of pleasure, of that epicurean description which unites wit and elegance with great license, and renders the intellect itself handmaid to luxurious self-indulgence. Though so far a voluptuary, habitual grossness cannot be imputed to him. His connexions with women were mostly of a kind that combined other and more refined attractions than those of sensuality, and of which the selection of his first mistress, the accomplished but vain Mary Robinson, and subsequently of the exemplary Mrs. Fitzherbert, are satisfactory instances. The existence of one legitimate daughter, and no natural offspring, negative the assumption of a very indiscriminate sexual intercourse.

George IV. had the characteristic courage of his family. "No man," said the duke of Wellington, "can intimidate the king." He had the firmness, with less of the obstinacy of his father. This is shown by the mode in which his acquiescence was obtained in the Catholic Relief Bill, against which he had to surrender prepossessions hardly less strong than those of George III. He submitted to the marital choice of the princess Charlotte, though prince Leopold was disagreeable to him, and though he had, by previous arrangement, betrothed her to the prince of Orange; but he was unwilling to control his daughter in a matter in which she was chiefly interested, especially after the lesson of practical wisdom afforded by his own unhappy marriage, having been degraded into a mere pecuniary contract and state contrivance. His secession from the Opposition, in 1793, implied neither caprice nor dereliction of principle, accompanied as he was by distinguished names to whom the public were accustomed, in doubtful emergencies, to look up for guidance and authority. He always manifested a wish to be reunited to his early friends, but not to submit to fastidious and imperious dictation. Such a disposition was apparent on the subsidence of the alarm occasioned by the French revolution, on the establishment of the regency, on the death of Mr. Perceval, and again on the formation of the coalition ministries of Mr. Canning and of lord Goderich; both of which he steadily supported in defiance of a powerful confederacy of the aristocracy.

The present reign was more free than the former from constitutional encroachments. The coercive acts of the regency were temporary expedients to meet a temporary emergency, and not settled features of the king's go-vestment. He gave a tacit approval to the professions of the Holy Alliance, which were Christian; but when their practices appeared inconsistent with their declared principles he opposed no obstacle to a public disavowal of all participation in their despotic schemes. George IV. was well content with the established prerogatives of the monarchy. He did not, like his predecessor, circulate private notes among his hereditary councillors, to intimidate or influence them in the free exercise of their legislative functions. Neither was favouritism remarkably predominant. Mr. Sheridan at one time appeared to exercise a private ascendancy at Carlton-house. He was well suited to the vocation, and would have been proud of it; but, if he exercised a covert authority, it was only for a short period, and he was not, as his after life attested, very munificently rewarded. The Hertfords, earl Moira, colonel Mahon, sir Benjamin Bloomfield, and sir William Knighton, have been successively charged with the office of court minion. The influence exercised by the last, in his situation of private secretary, and which was probably as great as that of any of his predecessors, has been partly unveiled in his Memoirs, and seems, contrary to expectation, to have had as great a reference to spiritual as temporal affairs. George IV. was too clever a man—for cleverness is generally conceded to him, he was too acute and penetrating, and had too morbid a sensibility to personal encroachments, slavishly to subject himself to individual influences. Besides, it was incompatible with his nature. It has been, with more truth than gallantry, said of him, that he had a "woman's character;" fickle, quickly suspicious, and the creature of impulse, rather than reason. He had, notwithstanding, the sagacity, like his father, to use men in their sphere, and for his purpose, but not much further.

Although not the passive instrument of either man or woman, it cannot be supposed that the king was entirely free from the common lot of princes, every one of whom is said to be governed either by his physician, his mistress, or confessor. There were about him, as well as other monarchs, secret and irresponsible influences. It is easy to perceive, from the partial disclosures of sir Wm. Knighton's Memoirs, that, though Liverpool, Wellington, and other premiers, had the trudgery and accountability of the government, the sunshine of the court, its choicest gifts, and confidence, passed through the channel of the privy purse; and of this novel and somewhat unconstitutional course of royal favour, those who sought it were not slow to avail themselves. For the last keeper of the privy purse the king seems to have had a sincere and affectionate regard. His presence was almost indispensable to his existence. His friendship, however, might have proved like his heart—"Irish;" intense, vehement, and tumultuous, but evanescent. The attachment the king manifested towards Knighton, Canning, and men of a like civil grade, and the countenance he afforded them, refutes the common imputation of regal morque and exclusiveness. It shows that, when the king found a man he delighted to honour, he had the manliness to do so, regardless of his humble birth or absence of aristocratic associations.

It has been said that the king's education was "princely;" such it appears to have been. It lacked nothing of the routine of instruction commonly appropriated to royal and noble personages. His chief teachers, Drs. Markham, Jackson, and Hurd, were embryo bishops, or church dignitaries, and of course theology had a due share of attention; and what was not theological or ecclesiastical was ornamental or scholastic. Possessing superior natural abilities, a retentive memory, quick and lively parts, a ready wit, correct taste, especially in the fine arts, for which his excellent ear and eye qualified him, with good elocutionary powers, the prince did credit to the limited sphere of tuition embraced by his tutors, and proved equal to the average of his courtiers in his knowledge of the classics, modern languages, constitutional law, and general acquirements. There was, however, it has been justly observed, no provision for scientific instruction in morals, legislation, the structure of governments, and natural philosophy. All that appertained to the drawing-room or the ball-room, the Liturgy, or the merely operative duties of the throne, the king was master of; but he was unversed in the higher requisites of the regal office—in those principles on which true national happiness depends; and which defect of early culture was the more to be lamented in George IV., as he was unquestionably animated by a desire, to the extent of his knowledge and ability, to promote the general welfare.

It is an advantage to a prince whose education has been neglected that the British monarchy is of a plastic nature—that its executive powers are adapted to age or adolescence—to the imbecile or masculine mind; in short, to every uncertainty of character and intelligence to which hereditary descent is liable. A child or a philosopher may be the sovereign of England. There is a permanent regency provided by the constitution for every casualty. Political responsibility only is varied, and the advantage at first sight appears in favour of an incompetent chief magistrate; for, if the king is efficient and active in the discharge of his duties, he exercises great powers without liability—he can do no wrong; whereas, in the case of an incapable monarch, the delegated authority necessarily devolving in name and reality upon his ministers, they exercise power, both in law and reason, under a veritable accountability to the nation for their administration.

One charge has been made against the character of George IV. of a very serious import. His personal veracity has been impugned. This, if true, not only denudes him of the distinction which sycophancy had assigned to him, of being “the first gentleman in Europe,” but of all claim to gentility whatever. It is founded on his solemn abnegation, on the sacred honour of a prince, of his marriage, either “legally or otherwise,” with Mrs. Fitzherbert. That this denial was untrue is now incontestably established on the testimony of lord Stourton*. It was solely on matrimonial terms that this conscientious lady would consent to a union with the prince; and a marriage was solemnized, not in a foreign dominion, as commonly supposed, and which would have made it invalid, according to the discipline of the catholic church, but in this country, in Mrs. Fitzherbert’s “own drawing-room, in her house in town, in the presence of an officiating protestant clergyman and two of her own nearest relatives.” Legally the marriage was void by the act of the late king; or, if a marriage, by an anterior statute, the Act of Settlement, the prince, by marrying a papist, forfeited all claim of succession to the crown. It is doubtless on the legal nullity of the marriage that the prince authorised the disavowal of it by Mr. Fox and his other whig compromisers. Mental reservation was practised; he was married, but not legally married: a Jesuitical evasion that would have been more passable had the bridegroom, as well as the bride, in lieu of a protestant prince, been in communion with the indulgent see of Rome. However married or not, it was an unusually convenient union. Both parties were accommodated by it: the pious scruples of the lady were soothed, the gentleman's passion gratified; and, by the ready double entendre of disavowal, the way for the payment of his debts smoothed; those debts which had doubtless partly accumulated from the magnificent bridal presents that showered on the betrothed immediately after the celebration of the hybrid nuptials, which one side construed into mere concubinage, the other into virtuous wedlock*.

Princes are only men, and require, like their subjects, the established salvos for human frailties. In considering the temptations to which they have yielded, we ought to allow for those they have successfully resisted. George IV., from the incidental advantages of station and person, might claim more than an average per-centage of this moral drawback. From the long absence of wholesome occupation—for he was an old man when he became regent—he became indolent, restless, and effeminate; absorbed in trifles—the coxcombry of dress and etiquette; or if anything better intervened, the luxury of novels, plays, paintings, or architecture. He was a man of pleasure; business was distasteful to him; and too exclusively devoted to personal indulgence, it produced the common results of sensual attachments, self-engrossment, aversion to conjugal and domestic ties, alienation from noble objects, and debasing habits of profusion and intemperance. Such, in brief, was the king: the good qualities nature had implanted were overpowered by the seductive lures of his exalted position. His biography is mean; it is unadorned by the pursuit or attainment of any great end. The vices of adolescence were not redeemed by the splendour of his meridian years. Through life he was only a grand-master of ceremonies. His prosecution of the princess Caroline was spiteful and vindictive. He was a vain man, especially of the rank of his family, an insult to which he never forgave. He was proud; very jealous of familiarity; and, if any were seduced into it by an ostentatious condescension, he suddenly turned upon them with an assumption of offended dignity. Servility formed the ready currency to royal favour, from both his menials and ministers. His passions were strong—their victims several. His idea of pleasure was sensual, notwithstanding the refinement of his mind. He indulged in the luxuries of the table; was fond of wine, music, and horse-racing. He was a spendthrift, careless of exceeding his income, and an evil example to his subjects as economist and husband. His tastes were magnificent, but costly to the nation. They were Eastern—glittering, fantastic, and showy, but profitless. Indolence and enjoyment were his idols. Everything around him breathed softness, richness, and repose. These are the more unfavourable traits. He was kind and affable to those about his person; he was benevolent. His charity was without ostentation; his religion without fanaticism. In elegant accomplishments he has been rarely equalled; in personal graces never excelled. He was lively and good-humoured in society; cheerful and warm-hearted at home. He was the very Comus of mirth in early life. Wherever there was gaiety—wherever “Sport leaped up to seize her beechen bough”—wherever there was a festive assembly of the people—there was the prince. It was only when oppressed with the infirmities of age, or the premature effects of the Circean cup he had freely quaffed, that George IV. became morose, selfish, recluse, and irritable.

* Three memorable denials of royal personages are on record, which severely tried the faith of contemporaries. First there is the written denial, in 1787, of the marriage of the prince of Wales with Mrs. Fitzherbert. Secondly, the denial by the duke of York, in his letter addressed to the speaker of the house of commons, dated Feb. 23rd, 1809, “not only of all personal participation but the slightest knowledge of the abuses” carried on in the army by Mary Anne Clarke. (Belsh. History of George III., xiii. 322.) Lastly, Queen Caroline, in a memorial addressed to the house of lords, on the day following the second reading of the Bill of Degradation against her, “most deliberately and before God asserted that she was wholly innocent of the crimes laid to her charge.”

The intellectual impulse of the last reign continued with unabated force during the present, and presented nearly the same outlines. Science continued more literary, and literature more scientific. Whatever was useful, ornamental, or ministered to enjoyment, received encouragement from both prince and people. Four acts of munificence distinguished the life of the king,—the literary mission to Portici for expediting the unravelling of the Herculaneum MSS.—the endowment of the Royal Society of Literature—his present of the library of George III. to the British Museum—and the support he afforded to the erection of St. David's College in Wales. The exploration of the ancient records of the kingdom, with a view to its judicial and historical illustration, continued a feature of the times. It was, however, chiefly the imitative arts or light literature, not the useful pursuits of science, that was especially distinguished by the patronage of the crown or its ministers.

In this reign began those splendid improvements of the metropolis by which architectural beauty was sought to be combined with utility and local convenience. The wonder of the age, however, was the further application of the powers of the STEAM-ENGINE; that unrivalled invention which had supported the war, and laid the foundation of commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural prosperity. Hitherto this mighty agent had been chiefly applied to the manufacturing arts, but in its new developments, it was extended to agriculture, road-travelling, and river and sea-navigation. Science in all her more gainful pursuits was cherished, not only as a source of individual opulence, but national grandeur. To the illustrious names of Priestley, Bradley, Arkwright, Maskelyne, Smeaton, Brindley, Cartwright, Dollond, Rumford, Black, Watt, Cavendish, and Playfair, which shed lustre on the reign of George III., may be added, as the contemporary portion of his successor, those of Davy, Wollaston, Dalton, Ivory, Babbage, Faraday, South, Young, Arnott, Airey, Leslie, Brewster, Herschel, Buckland, Telford, M'Adam, and Rennie. Chemistry, and its application to agriculture; geology, mineralogy, civil engineering, mechanics, anatomy, medicine, and geographical researches in Africa and the Arctic regions, constituted the boast of the period.

Political economy was sedulously cultivated by Malthus, Ricardo, Mill, M'Culloch, Thompson, and Torrens; but the economists were not agreed either as to the correctness or value of the additions made to the science since the days of Adam Smith. The great practical question was the tendency of population to become redundant, upon which the physical condition of the working-classes, the prudence of marriage, the rate of wages, colonization, and a public provision for indigence, almost entirely depended. Great contemporary interest was given to this truly national study by the unsettled state of the currency and banking, sudden vicissitudes in employment, and in commercial and manufacturing industry. It also derived importance from the narrow policy sought to be pursued by neighbouring states. Struck by our riches and greatness, but mistaking their sources, foreigners sought to emulate our prosperous career by fostering monopolies and mercantile restrictions, the futility and hurtfulness of which England had newly discovered and partly abandoned.

Except in its economical bearings, Political Philosophy was not successfully cultivated. The shrewd and practical but crude and unscientific work of Dr. Paley continued the standard publication. Jeremy Bentham sought to introduce more general principles in morals, jurisprudence, and legislation ; but, either from prevailing doubts of their soundness, perplexities in the style of his later writings, or their incompatibility with established opinions and interests, he had only partial success with his countrymen. Metaphysics were almost entirely abandoned to Dugald Stewart ; and even this accomplished writer, treading in the cautious steps of Dr. Reid, seemed more disposed to limit than extend the range of this nebulous science. Eloquence and the drama declined ; or rather the rhetorical embellishments of the former, and the imaginative extravagances of the latter, were less cultivated. Legislative questions had become more practical than theoretic or constitutional : tables and arithmetic superseded tropes and figures ; and the pyrotechnical flashes of Chatham, Burke, Fox, Windham, and Sheridan, disappeared amidst political economy, newspaper reporting, and the solid folios yearly issued by parliamentary committees, often replete with able and minute information on the most important interests of the empire.

The age, however, was neither dry nor exclusively scientific. It was brilliant with poetry, criticism, history, works of imagination, and the productions of the fine arts. Sir Walter Scott, Byron, Joanna Baillie, Maria Edgeworth, Jeffrey, Gifford, Lingard, Hallam, Roscoe, Palgrave, D'Israeli, Mackintosh, Wordsworth, Crabbe, Southey, Moore, Coleridge, Rogers, Hogg, Montgomery, and Campbell, are enduring names that would shed lustre on the proudest period of English literature. In essay and the lighter periodical writing, Hazlitt, Lamb, the Smiths, Leigh Hunt, Wilson, Maginn, and Lockhart, shone conspicuous, and completed, with other auxiliaries, the intellectual array who delighted their contemporaries and embellished the pacific era of George IV.

EVENTS AND OCCURRENCES.

A.D. 1820. Jan. 29. ACCESSION OF GEO. IV.—The new reign commenced without any expectation of changes. As regent the king had long exercised sovereign power, and his accession was merely an alteration in the name of the chief magistrate. During the life-time of the late king the heir-apparent had mostly lived in a state of estrangement from his majesty, partly from connexion with the whigs, and partly from diversity of taste and pursuits. George III. was as little tolerant of differences of manners as of opinion, and the thoughtless dissipation of the son—his constantly-recurring pecuniary embarrassments—his separation from the princess Caroline, and living openly in concubinage, were habits repugnant to the moral sensibilities of the royal parent. Horse-racing and prize-fighting had at one time formed favourite diversions of the prince. He was also prone to riotous conviviality and to gaming ; the last a vice to which both he and the duke of York became early addicted. His life, in short, if not absolutely rakish, had been that of a splendid voluptuary, who freely indulged in every pleasure that money, high station, and a fine person could procure. It made him unpopular with the industrious orders ; but by the gay world, who assumed a different standard of decorum, he was considered not to have transgressed the esta-lished license of personal indulgence ; and by them continued to be followed and looked up to as “the glass of fashion and mould of form.” The occurrences of the regency did not raise the prince in popular favour. The first years were brilliant by the events of the war and the conclusion of peace, but the latter had been marked by the prevalence of much distress and unusual political discontent. These were sought to be met by coercive acts of legislation, which produced internal quiet, especially as they happened to be aided by the revival of commerce ; but they augmented the unpopularity of the Liverpool administration. As the king gave no intimation of an intention either to change his responsible advisers (p. 701) or the spirit of his government, the new reign began sullenly, without indications of hope or general gladness.

30. George IV. held his first court at Carlton-house, and declared his intention “to maintain unimpaired the religion, laws, and liberties of the kingdom.” Being Sunday, the proclaiming of the king was deferred till next day, when the ceremony took place with the customary formalities.

Feb. 1. A bulletin announced the king's indisposition, supposed to arise from fatigue and anxiety. On the 9th the duke of Sussex had an interview of fraternal reconciliation. On the 12th his majesty was convalescent.

8. Died, at Hayes, in Kent, in his sixty-ninth year, sir VICARY GIBBS, late chief-justice of the court of common-pleas. He was the son of a surgeon, and born at Ketter; the native of a county which has been styled (Law Mag., xxii. 58), "the nursing mother of eminent lawyers." Educated at Eton, possessing much natural acuteness, with a mind exclusively and laboriously devoted to his profession, the failure of Gibbs in attaining legal preferment would have been more remarkable than his success. He rendered Erskine effective aid as junior counsel for the prisoners in the State Trials of 1794. The reformers thought they had made an acquisition in their able advocate, but Mr. Gibbs had no taste for politics; moreover, he was always high church, and a tory. As attorney-general, sir Vicary sought to subject the press to a reign of terror, supported by vexatious and rigorous prosecutions. In 1810, of the fifty-two newspapers published in London, about one-half had ex-officio informations filed against them. His proceedings were severely reprehended both in parliament and out, and did not serve the ministers. As a lawyer merely, and a successful one, he was naturally opposed to legal reforms; but in the house of commons he never was of much weight, and seldom spoke. He resigned his office of attorney-general for a judgeship of the common-pleas, and withdrew from public life in November, 1818, completely worn out. Sir Vicary Gibbs won no laurels in private or public life: not that he was without private worth, but he was a thoroughly disagreeable person. Self-sufficient, petulant, irascible, and tyrannical; a foe to mirth and recreation, he seemed destined to live and die over the dry bones of Coke and Lyttelton. His diminutive figure and sour visage did not belie his nature.

11. The Gazette contains the alterations in the church-service required by the death of the late king; the name of queen Caroline omitted; but, to obviate the invidiousness of this omission, neither is the name of the duke of York, presumptive heir to the crown, specifically mentioned in the Liturgy, only that of the royal family.

13. Duke de Berri assassinated on leaving the opera by Louvel, formerly a soldier in the imperial guard. His trial was delayed, in the hope that he would be induced to reveal his accomplices; but he constantly denied that he had any, and persisted in his first avowment, that he had not communicated his intention to a single human being, and that his object was the good of France. He was beheaded June 6th, pursuant to his sentence.

17. George III. interred at Windsor.

23. CATO-STREET CONSPIRACY. — For some time it had been known to government that an attempt to assassinate the king's ministers was meditating, and that Arthur Thistlewood was at the bottom of it. The time chosen for the execution of the plot was on the occasion of a cabinet-dinner at lord Harrowby's in Grosvenor-square. Acting on previous information, Mr. Birnie, a Bow-street magistrate, with twelve of the patrol, proceeded to Cato-street in the Edgeware-road, where, in a hay-loft, they found the conspirators assembled. The entrance was by a ladder, by which Ruthven, Smithers, and others of the patrol, ascended. On the door being opened, twenty-five or thirty men appeared armed: Ruthven stated that he was a peace-officer, and required them to lay down their arms. Thistlewood opposed the officers with a drawn sword, and Smithers, rushing forward to seize him, was pierced, and instantly expired. A desperate struggle ensued in the dark, the lights having been extinguished; pending which, captain Fitzclarence arrived with a detachment of guards, who surrounded the premises, and nine of the desperadoes were taken. Thistlewood and the rest escaped; but the former was soon after seized in bed at an obscure lodging in Finsbury.

29. Parliament dissolved by proclamation.

Mar. 3. Mr. Parker, a retired tradesman of Woolwich, murdered, together with his housekeeper, and an attempt made to set fire to the house. The murderer was discovered, and executed on Pennenden-heath, July 31. He was named Nesbitt, had been in the artillery, and was an illiterate and abandoned character.

11. Westminster election terminated in the return of sir F. Burdett and Mr. Hobhouse, the whig candidate, the hon. G. Lamb, being rejected. For Middlesex, Messrs. Byng and S. C. Whitbread were returned. For the city of London, Messrs. Wood and Wilson, sir W. Curtis, and the lord-mayor were the sitting members: Waithman and Thorpe rejected.

16. Trial of Mr. Hunt and others begins at York, before Mr. Justice Bayley, for a conspiracy at Manchester on the 16th August. The trial lasted ten days. Four of the defendants were found guilty of assembling an unlawful meeting with unlawful banners. The verdict was subsequently impeached in the court of king's bench, but confirmed; and, May 15th, Mr. Hunt was sentenced to be imprisoned in Ilchester gaol for two years and six months, and Healy, Johnston, and Bamford to one year's imprisonment in Lincoln gaol. Hunt and Bamford were their own counsel through these proceedings.

23. Sir Francis Burdett found guilty at Leicester of a libel on government, in his letter to his constituents, reflecting on the Manchester outrage of the 16th August. The baronet was tried before Mr. justice Best, and pleaded his own cause.

Apr. 1. Walter Scott, esq., the popular poet and novelist, created a baronet, and the first creation of the new reign.

5. AFFAIR OF BONNYMUIR.—A sort of insurrectionary movement in the south-west of Scotland, since known to have been mainly the work of spies. On the morning of the 2nd an incendiary placard was posted on the walls of Glasgow, calling on the people to effect a revolution by force; and recommending the owners of the factories to suspend their works till the struggle was over. (Ann. Reg., lxii. 37.) On the 5th there was an assemblage of about fifty radicals, in lieu of 5000 that had been expected, at Bonnymuir, some of whom were armed with pikes, and some with pistols or muskets. Their plan was to proceed to the Carron iron-works, and equip themselves with artillery. They were dispersed by a troop of cavalry, and nineteen of the rebels, after a slight resistance, captured. Numerous arrests followed in Renfrewshire, Lanarkshire, and Ayrshire; and, on the very day of the skirmish on Bonnymuir, a committee of eleven, supposed to be the provisional government, were taken into custody. A special commission sat in the different counties, in the summer, to try the insurrectionists; three of whom were executed.

11. Sir Charles Wolseley and Joseph Harrison, a schoolmaster, tried at Chester assizes for sedition, and found guilty. They were sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment each, and to give securities for future good behaviour.

19. The trials of the Cato-street conspirators began at the Old Bailey, and ended on the 27th, when they were found guilty.

20. Messrs. Brougham and Deuman admitted attorney and solicitor-general to the queen in the courts of law, and took their places within the bar.

24. The proprietor of the Observer fined 500*l.* by the court for transgressing their order in publishing the proceedings pending the trial of Thistlewood and his associates, but not enforced.

27. NEW PARLIAMENT opened by the king. The general election had produced little change in the composition of the house of commons. It had not gained any new ornament; neither had it lost any of those who were wont to take an active share in parliamentary business. The king's speech adverted to the prevalence of distress among the labouring classes, and the machinations of the disaffected through the circulation of seditious and irreligious publications. In both houses the address was voted without a dissentient voice.

May 1. Arthur Thistlewood, James Ings, Thomas Brunt, Richard Todd, and William Davidson, were executed at the Old Bailey. They were all in humble or indigent circumstances; and had been convicted of one of the wildest and most atrocious plots on record. During the trial, and at the place of execution, they conducted themselves with firmness, and even hardihood. Davidson was the only one of the sufferers who appeared open to religious impressions. The chief conspirator, Thistlewood, was in his 50th year, and had started in life with some fortune and education. He had been a lieutenant in the army, and was, during the reign of terror, in France, where he had imbibed his political tenets. Owing to some alleged affront he had challenged lord Sidmouth to fight a duel, for which he had been fined and imprisoned. Reduced to indigence, both he and Ings had received small sums of money from Edwards, the government spy. There was evidence to prove that Edwards was the original framer of the plot. The crowd at the execution was immense, but unattended with any marked expression of popular feeling, except that the ceremony of decapitation excited general disgust. Five of the conspirators had their sentences commuted for transportation.

5. Mr. Brougham, preparatory to the settlement of the civil-list, moved for an inquiry into the droits of the crown and admiralty and other branches of the hereditary revenues, not usually deemed to be within the control of parliament. Motion negatived by 273 to 145 votes.

6. The Jesuits banished from Russia. At the time of issuing the decree their number was estimated at 800; and many withdrew to China.

8. Merchants and traders of London, headed by Mr. Baring, petition the house of commons to remove the restrictions on foreign trade. A petition of similar tenor was presented, by Mr. Kirkman Finlay, a few days after, from Glasgow. Reversal of the navigation-laws, opening of the China trade, repeal of the wool-tax, and the import of timber from Norway on the same terms as from Canada, were the objects sought.

9. Sir James Mackintosh introduced six bills to mitigate the criminal laws.

14. Died, in his 70th year, HENRY GRATTAN, M.P., the celebrated Irish orator and statesman. It was to his zeal and abilities Ireland was mainly indebted for the patriotic spirit evinced in 1780, which extorted a relaxation in the selfish policy of England. Mr. Grattan's eloquence was more distinguished for warmth, brilliancy, and rapidity, than correctness and solidity. He was opposed to the Union; but, as a member of the imperial parliament, he gave his support to the war with France. In politics he was a conservative-whig; and almost with his dying breath cautioned his countrymen against the new infection of radical doctrines. By a clause in his will his Queen's-county estate was to revert back again to the public, provided his children (of which he had thirteen) should all die without heirs.

20. Ali-Pasha, of Janina, declared himself independent of Turkey. After displaying for some time a singular union of craft and ferocity, and trying to take advantage of the Greek insurrection in 1821, this fierce old Albanian at last paid the forfeit of his head for rebelling against the Porte.

26. Lord Lansdowne moved for the appointment of a committee to consider the means of extending the foreign trade of the kingdom. His lordship ably detailed the restrictions which impeded commerce, and expressed himself in favour of free trade. Lord Liverpool agreed in the abstract policy of free trade, but thought there was danger in an abrupt departure from an old system. — Committee agreed to. At this period there was a general acquiescence, both in the legislature and in the country, in the wisdom of unrestricted commercial intercourse among nations; and Dr. Smith's principles, after fifty years, had triumphed.

June 2. A bottle picked up on the N.W. coast of Ireland, in lat. $54^{\circ} 56'$ N., long. 9° W.: it contained a paper, dated June 20, 1819, lat. $38^{\circ} 52'$, long. 64° W. of Greenwich, stating that it had been thrown into the sea to ascertain the strength and direction of the Florida gulf-stream.

6. ARRIVAL OF QUEEN CAROLINE. — For the remainder of the year public attention was almost exclusively fixed on the investigation into the conduct of the queen. It had been currently reported for some years, in the upper circles, that the princess of Wales had been living in habitual adultery with a man called Bergami, whom, from the office of courier, she had raised to the dignity of chamberlain, and familiarly admitted to her table. It was to investigate the truth of these reports that the Milanese commission had been appointed in 1818, under the direction of Sir John Leach, and the result of whose inquiries was, that the English ministers abroad were ordered not to give the princess, in their official character, any public recognition or reception. The princess, in consequence, became an outcast from the courts of Europe. By the death of the late king she became queen of England, which made it necessary to determine on the conduct to be adopted towards her in that capacity. Mr. Brougham, her professional adviser, had, in 1819, privately offered to Lord Liverpool that the princess should have an annuity of 35,000*l.* a-year settled upon her for life, on condition of permanently residing abroad, and not assuming, in the event of the demise of the crown, the title of queen. (Ann. Reg., lxiii. 20.) Such an arrangement was now peculiarly acceptable to government; they even went further, and proposed that her majesty's annuity should be raised to 50,000*l.*; but it was found that the offer of Mr. Brougham had been made without the privity of his client; and the mystery of his conduct was further augmented when it was discovered that he had kept back from her a knowledge of the ministerial proposition till after her majesty's determination became fixed to visit England, in vindication of her character and the assertion of her rights. (Ann. Reg., lxii. 127.) Indeed, the learned gentleman seems to have held more confidential intercourse with the persecutors of the queen than his royal mistress. The alternatives offered to the queen before she sailed from Calais were, either that she should relinquish the royal title on the terms proposed, or her conduct abroad be subjected to a public inquiry. Boldly determining to face her enemies, she landed at Dover, from the ordinary packet, on the 6th, accompanied by alderman Wood and lady Hamilton, after a six-years' absence from England. Her entry into London was a triumph, and she was received with joyful acclamations by the people. On the same day a message was delivered to both houses of parliament, informing them of the king's intention to communicate certain papers respecting the conduct of the queen.

7. Message from the queen delivered to the house of commons, challenging the fullest inquiry into her conduct.

14. Address presented from the common council of the city of London, congratulating the queen on her arrival in this country. The example was speedily followed, and the metropolis kept in a ferment for months by addresses and processions in honour of the queen's return to England.

19. Died, at his seat, Spring-grove, Middlesex, in his 77th year, Sir JOSEPH BANKS, president of the Royal Society, and whose name, with that of Dr. Solander, is familiar to the reader of the first voyage of discovery of captain Cook. Inheriting, at the age of eighteen, a noble patrimony, Mr. Banks did not abandon himself to the pleasures of fashionable life, but gave the preference to pursuits of natural history, to which, through life, he continued passion-ably attached. In 1778 he was made a baronet, and elected president of the Royal Society. When after some differences arose with his mathematical brethren, who thought their favourite studies neglected; but they soon subsided, and nothing further occurred to disturb the long reign of the president. Sir Joseph took an active part in the establishment of the African Association and the Horticultural Society. He died without issue.

21. Great distress in the south of Ireland: eleven banks stop payment.

28. Attempts at reconciliation having failed, a secret committee of the house of lords proceeded to open the green bag, containing the inculpatory documents against the queen. Lord Erskine and the marquis of Lansdowne having declined to act on the committee, lords Ellenborough and Hardwicke were substituted in their places.

FRANCE.—The diffusion of property in France is shown by the following return of electors paying the greatest amount of taxes from 1000 francs:—

f.	f.
1000 to 1500	6724
1500 „ 2000	2617
2000 „ 2500	1410
2500 „ 3000	827
3000 „ 4000	853
4000 and upwards	332

The amount of taxation is estimated at about one-fifth of the income.

July 4. The secret committee made their report, recommending a solemn inquiry into the conduct of the queen.

5. Lord Liverpool presented a Bill of Pains and Penalties against the queen, on the ground of her adulterous intercourse with Bergami, and providing that her majesty be degraded from her rank and title, and her marriage with the king dissolved. The assumptions on which the bill was founded stood,—1st. that, in the year 1814, the princess of Wales, at Milan, in Italy, engaged in a menial situation Bartolomeo Bergami, a forger of low station; 2nd, that a degrading intimacy ensued; 3rd, that she engaged his family in her confidential service, bestowed upon him extraordinary marks of favour, obtained for him orders of knighthood, titles of honour, and conferred on him a pretended order, instituted by herself, without just authority; 4th, the second charge repeated and extended, that, by her conduct, scandal was brought on his majesty's family and kingdom.

6. Sir R. Fergusson moved, in the commons, for an account of the expenses of the Milan commission, which, it was alleged, had cost 25,000*l.*; and for half this sum sir Ronald affirmed that witnesses might be procured in Italy to ruin the character of any man or woman, however respectable.—Motion got rid of by the order of the day.

7. The king's coronation, which had been fixed for August 1st, is indefinitely postponed.

Twelve Italians, eleven men and one woman, witnesses against the queen, landed at Dover from France. They were roughly treated by the populace.

14. Symptoms of insubordination among the foot-guards.

A revolution effected at Naples on the 5th instant. The troops joined the people, and a constitution adopted on the model of that of Spain.

18. Captain Brown has just completed the first chain-bridge in England, across the Tweed. The river is 437 feet from bank to bank, and the bridge is without any central support.

29. King reviews the city light-horse.

Aug. 4. Major Cartwright, Wooler, Edmonds, Lewis, and Maddocks, convicted at Warwick assizes of conspiracy in the selection of a “legislatorial attorney,” to represent, in parliament, the town of Birmingham. Bills of exceptions were tendered to the court on the part of the defendants; and the discussions on the verdict occupied the court of King's Bench during several terms: it was not till Easter, 1821, the verdict was affirmed. Major Cartwright was sentenced to pay a fine of 100*l.*, and the others to suffer various terms of imprisonment.

6. Died, at Ostlands, in the 54th year of her age, the duchess of York, eldest daughter of the king of Prussia. She was married to the duke of York in 1791: they had long lived separate, but on friendly terms.

19. The attorney-general, sir Robert Gifford, opened the charge against the queen. He concluded it on the 21st, and called the first Italian witness, Majocchi, whose appearance had such an effect upon the queen, who was present, that she uttered an exclamation of surprise, and hastily left the house.

30. A revolution in Portugal.

Sept. 7. Case against the queen having been closed, the lords adjourned to the 3rd of the ensuing month, to give time to prepare the defence. It was also the day of the greatest solar eclipse that has been visible since 1714, or will again be visible till 1847. It excited great interest in the metropolis, especially in the neighbourhood of the house of lords, where all the passages were crowded with peers, viewing the heavens through coloured glasses; their lordships having left the solicitor-general nearly deserted in the middle of his summing-up.

30. Twenty Italian witnesses in favour of the queen landed at Dover. Popular enthusiasm was such that the sailors jumped into the sea to convey them in their arms on shore.

Oct. 1. Polish diet terminated its sittings. Numerous petitions had been presented to it, suggesting improvements in the agricultural and commercial regulations of the kingdom. They especially prayed that the Polish army might be clothed in Polish cloth, and the importation of English merchandise prohibited so long as English corn-laws remained in force.

2. The recent political revolutions in Spain, Portugal, and Naples, celebrated at the Crown and Anchor tavern.

3. Proceedings against the queen recommenced, when Mr. Brougham delivered a powerful address, that occupied two days, in her majesty's defence. He was followed by Mr. Williams; and, the lords having determined to limit the opening to two counsel, the examination of witnesses followed.

8. Christophe, King of Hayti, committed suicide. Hearing of a revolt of his troops, he exclaimed, "It is over with me," and shot himself. His character has been differently described: by one as bloody and tyrannical; by others as an ardent but rash patriot, "intent on the improvement of his people." (Life of Wilberforce, v. 83.) He was succeeded by president Boyer in the government of the island.

9. Franklin, alias Fletcher, connected with ministers, charged, at Bow-street, with publishing inflammatory hand-bills, purposely to excite disturbances in the metropolis; a practice, he is supposed to have carried on for years past. He was detained by one magistrate, but liberated by sir Robert Baker, and escaped to France. A Mr. Denis O'Brien, who held a colonial appointment, was charged with being implicated in these nefarious practices.

A parliamentary return showed that the expenses of the queen's trial already amounted to 110,000*l*.

11. Spanish cortes resolved to sell the property of the clergy, and suppress monastic orders.

15. First diet of Germany opened.

23. Thomas Davidson, a printer, found guilty of publishing two blasphemous libels. The defendant conducted his own defence; and was three times fined in the course of it, by Mr. Justice Best, for using improper language, either towards the bench or the established authorities. Mrs. Carile was also tried for two similar libels, and found guilty. The prosecutions were at the instance of the Society for the Suppression of Vice.

24. Witnesses in behalf of the queen having been all examined, Mr. Denman commenced the summation of the defence in a luminous speech, that occupied two days in the delivery. He was followed by Dr. Lushington, who remarked on the peculiarities of the case in a man seeking a divorce from his wife at the age of sixty, and from whom he had been twenty-four years separated by his own act, and for the gratification of his own appetites. The attorney-general began his reply on the 27th, and did not close till next day, when the solicitor-general followed, whose address lasted till the 30th; after which the house adjourned.

Nov. 2. Accounts received at the Admiralty of the safety of the north-west expedition, under lieutenant Parry. They had passed opposite to the Coppermine river of Hearne, in lat. 75°, long. 115°: they had wintered in long. 110°.

10. CLOSE OF THE QUEEN'S TRIAL.—The judicial part of the proceedings against the queen having closed, the lords met on the 2nd, to discuss the second reading of the Bill of Degradation. Lord Chancellor Eldon, in a brief but forcible speech, avowed his conviction that adultery had been proved, relying chiefly on the fact that the queen had slept under the same tent with Bergami on the deck of a polarre. Lauderdale was strongly of the same opinion. Grosvenor would have thrown the book in the king's face rather than have been guilty of the first act of indignity towards her majesty, by the omission of her name in the Liturgy. Harewood wished he was as thoroughly convinced of the queen's innocence as he was of the impolicy of passing the bill. Donoughmore generally discredited the evidence adduced against her majesty. On the ground of both justice and expediency earl Grey opposed the bill. Liverpool considered the sudden elevation of Bergami to the rank of chamberlain, and the marked partiality shown by the queen to his family, established the existence of an "infatuated passion." Arden would never consent to brand with everlasting infamy a member of the house of Brunswick. Falmouth would support the bill, divested of this divorce clause; and Harrowby said that might be omitted. Ellenborough affirmed it was for "the safety of domestic virtue that conduct like the queen's should be marked as infamous, ignominious, and base." Ashburton and Erskine thought the preamble unproved. Newcastle had been absent during the trial, but was convinced, from reading the evidence, of the queen's guilt. Lansdowne warmly replied to the duke, then went minutely into the evidence, and expressed his conviction that it was not such as to justify the passing of the bill. Grenville thought an adulterous intercourse was "much too sufficiently and fully proved." Rosslyn said the witnesses were both "suspicious and corrupt." Other lords expressed their sentiments, and the debate continued till the 6th. Upon a division there were, for the second reading of the bill, 123 peers; against it, 95: majority 28. The dukes of York, Clarence, and Cambridge voted in favour of the bill; the duke of Gloucester against it; the dukes of Sussex and Cumberland did not vote. Some were in favour of degradation, but not divorce. Upon a division, 129 voted that the divorce clause should be retained; and 62 for its expulsion. The failure to get rid of the divorce clause, combined with the strong popular excitement in the queen's favour, and the little probability of carrying the bill through the commons, determined many peers who had voted in favour of the second reading to oppose the third. Upon the third reading of the bill, on the 10th, the ministerial majority had fallen from 23 to 9; the numbers being 108 for, 99 against. Immediately the result was known, lord Liverpool announced the intention of government to abandon the further prosecution of this extraordinary proceeding. The news that the bill was relinquished diffused a transport of joy through the metropolis. At night the town was illuminated, which was repeated on the Saturday and Monday following. Public agitation pending the trial was greater than had ever been known: processions were daily, and almost hourly, taking place to Hammersmith, where the queen resided, carrying addresses of congratulation, or to deprecate the prosecution. The powers of the press were vigorously exerted to keep alive the popular excitement. No reserve was observed, either on the part of the peers or the conductors of the press, in communicating, without disguise or curtailment, the entire mass of evidence that could be elicited by the most searching interrogatory from valets, courtiers, chambermaids, and chamberlains. The consequence was, that the newspapers became the daily vehicle of more gross and revolting details than can be found in the history of the most abandoned of the Roman emperors. The working and middle classes were almost without exception in favour of the queen. Their feelings, like those of lord Archibald Hamilton, were irrelevant to the merits of the trial, and arose from a deep impression of the provocations she had received, and the long and vindictive persecution she had sustained.

23. Parliament suddenly prorogued without the usual form of a royal speech; the object sought was alleged to be to avoid the delivery of a message from the queen, complaining that no provision had been made by ministers for her residence or maintenance.

25. Decision in the king's bench, that sufficient evidence had been given that sir Francis Burdett had, by putting a sealed letter into a post-office in Leicestershire, published a libel on his majesty's government in that county; that the trial in Leicestershire was therefore legal; and that consequently no reason existed for a new trial in Middlesex, where the letter was first opened, read, and made public.

29. The queen went in state to St. Paul's to return thanks for her happy deliverance; 150 gentlemen attended on horseback, and the crowd was immense. So great was the desire to obtain a view of the procession that various sums from five shillings to two guineas were given for single stations at windows. Among the gentlemen attending on the queen were sir Robert Wilson. Joseph Hume. M.P., hon. Keppel Craven, and Mr. Hobhouse. At the entrance to the Cathedral a committee of 60 ladies, all dressed in white, received her majesty.

30. Sir Humphrey Davy elected, in opposition, to lord Colchester, president of the Royal Society, in place of the late sir Joseph Banks.

Dec. Numerous congratulatory addresses were presented to the queen, in the course of this month, from different classes of the people; and counter-addresses to the king, from the universities and the chief municipal and ecclesiastical corporations.

11. Mr. Wright, the editor of the Parliamentary Debates, and formerly a partner with Mr. Cobbett in the bookselling business, obtained a verdict of 1000*l.* damages against Mr. Cobbett, for three libels inserted in his Political Register.

17. Congress of sovereigns at Troppau transferred to Laybach, nearer to Italy. No strangers were allowed to reside at Laybach during this convocation of crowned heads; and to make their councils more secret not a secretary was permitted to be present at the conferences of the ministers.

22. At the Schoolmasters' dinner Dr. Kelly announced that the duke of Orleans had presented to the society a lithographic engraving, from a picture painted at the command of the duke, exhibiting his royal highness in the character of a schoolmaster, he having during the revolution become a teacher of mathematics in Switzerland.

In a letter to his constituents of this date Mr. Canning stated that his sole reason for resigning his place of president of the Board of Control is the late proceedings against the queen, and that he had no other difference with his colleagues.

22. A society established, assuming the title of The Constitutional Association, for opposing the progress of disloyal principles; sir John Sewell, LL.D., elected president.

28. Francis Jeffrey, the Scottish advocate, and editor of The Edinburgh Review, chosen rector of the university of Glasgow.

A prospectus issued for establishing, under the patronage of the king, a Royal Society of Literature, for the encouragement of indigent merit, and the promotion of general literature. Nothing, however, was done towards the institution of this society till June of the following year.

EDUCATION.—A general account (Ann. Reg. lxii. 234), showing the state of education in England:—Endowed Schools: New schools, 302, children, 39,590; ordinary schools, 3865, children, 125,843; total children, 165,433, revenue, 300,525*l*. Unendowed day-schools: new schools, 820, children, 105,582; dames' schools, 3102, children, 53,624; ordinary schools, 10,360, children, 319,643; total children, 478,849. Sunday-schools: new schools, 404, children, 50,979; ordinary schools, 4758, children, 401,838; total children, 452,817.

SPAIN, PORTUGAL, AND ITALY.—These countries were this year the scene of revolutions, so auspicious in their commencement as to threaten the entire ruin of the conservative compact of the Holy Alliance. In Spain the troops intended for the subjugation of South America revolted against the government, and, a general spirit of resistance to Ferdinand's spreading through the kingdom, the faithless monarch was compelled to swear fidelity to the constitution of 1812, which he had before sworn to defend. The example in Spain extended to Portugal. In August a revolution occurred in Oporto, of which the declared objects were the establishment of a constitutional monarchy. At Lisbon the regency, in the absence of the king in Brazil, endeavoured to gain time, but, the junta of Oporto having proceeded to the capital, all parties coalesced to establish a provisional administration in the name of king John. The revolution in Naples commenced in July, and like the preceding was chiefly effected by the military, who demanded a constitution on the model of that in Spain. Attempts were made to subdue them by force, but the court, on sounding the disposition of the other military in the capital, found they were actuated by the same spirit. When this was known, king Ferdinand submitted to necessity, and declared his assent to the new order of things. The Neapolitan parliament was convoked, and opened by Ferdinand, assisted by the hereditary prince in the character of lieutenant-general. Meanwhile the sovereigns of Russia, Austria, and Prussia, met at Troppan; they invited Ferdinand to join them to consult on the means of promoting what they called the happiness of nations. He obeyed, and was conveyed to Leghorn, on his way to Laybach, on board an English ship-of-war, leaving however a solemn declaration behind him to adhere to the main principles of the new constitution.

A.D. 1821. FOREIGN AFFAIRS.—Events

on the continent had a striking but illusory interest. At the commencement of the year the Piedmontese army revolted, and following the example of Naples proceeded to frame a new constitution. The king, disliking the infringement of his prerogatives, resigned the crown to his brother, who refused to accept it, and, a body of Austrians marching into Piedmont, the Sardinian despotism was promptly restored. Simultaneously a large Austrian army approached the Neapolitan frontier, where they were met by general Pepe, but his army fled at the first onset with the Austrians, who, in consequence, advanced to Naples without farther resistance. The parliament, which had relied on the fidelity of the king, was dissolved, the people were disarmed, the ancient authorities restored, and persecution took place against the leaders of the late revolution. In Romagna many persons were arrested as Carbonari, and a still greater number in Lombardy. Thirty-four of these were brought to trial in the autumn. Several were sentenced to death, but this was commuted for imprisonment in the castle of Spielberg for 21 years in some cases, and for 10 years in the rest. Spain continued to be agitated by political struggles; the friends of liberty were divided; they proceeded with too much precipitancy in the subversion of the abuses of an ancient system, strong in the prejudices of the people, and the support of a powerful priesthood. Portugal, though drawn into the revolutionary career by the example of her neighbour, continued peaceable and orderly. John VI., on his arrival from Brazil, readily swore to protect the constitution established in his absence, proclaimed the cortes, and the kingdom forthwith entered on a course of political and social regeneration. Beyond the Atlantic, the year witnessed the establishment of the independence of Colombia, and the fall of the Spanish power in Mexico and Peru. Brazil, triumphantly abolishing its old institutions, assumed a more conspicuous rank among free nations, and took a great step towards dissolving the ties that bound it to Portugal. In England there were symptoms of returning commercial prosperity and greater internal tranquillity. The chief domestic occurrences were the death of the queen—the king's coronation—his visits to Ireland and Hanover—and the bitterness of newspaper controversy.

Jan. 4. Mr. Gittam, of Nordelph, Norfolk, undertook for a wager of 100 guineas to skate a mile on the ice in three minutes. He performed the task 15 seconds within the time. Unfortunately he lost his life the same night, on his way home, by coming, whilst skating, with great force in contact with a willow-tree, not far distant from his own house at Upwell.

16. Mr. Duncan Campbell refused at the mansion-house to be bound over to prosecute a thief, to do which, it appeared, he was not bound by law.

23. Parliament opened by the king in a speech of moderate tenor, in which a provision for the queen was recommended. The addresses in both houses passed without divisions. Mr. Wetherell moved for papers, with the view of showing the illegality of the omission of the queen's name in the liturgy: the crown and the whig lawyers were divided in opinion, and the subject got rid of by the previous question.

24. About the hour of closing the bank of Jones and Loyd, a thief snatched a parcel off the counter, with notes to the amount of 4200*l.*, and got clear off.

25. The duke of Wellington incurs much popular censure by terming a county meeting "a farce;" it was meant, however, to apply only to county meetings on the queen's business, that would hear only one side.

31. The queen, in a message to the commons, declined to accept any pecuniary allowance until her name was inserted in the liturgy. Her majesty soon after altered her resolution, and an annuity of 50,000*l.* was settled upon her by parliament.

Feb. 3. Mrs. Carille sentenced to two years' imprisonment, in Dorchester gaol, for publishing an alleged libel. The husband was already confined in the same prison.

6. The king visited Drury-lane theatre for the first time since the commencement of the regency, and was favourably received, but the news of the queen was often heard to interrupt the acclamations.

8. Sir F. Burdett sentenced to pay a fine of 2000*l.* and to three months' imprisonment, for his letter reflecting on the Manchester affair. A meeting of the baronet's constituents was held on the 12th, to raise a subscription to pay the fine.

16. Duel at Chalk-farm, by moonlight, between Mr. Scott, editor of the London Magazine, and Mr. Christie, barrister: the former was mortally wounded, and died on the 27th, much regretted. The quarrel arose with Mr. Lockhart, who took offence at some of Scott's literary articles; but Mr. Scott declined a meeting with Mr. Lockhart, unless he would first disavow being the editor of Blackwood's Magazine. A misunderstanding then ensued between Mr. Lockhart's intended second and the deceased, which had a fatal termination. Coroner's jury having brought in a verdict of wilful murder, Mr. Christie and the seconds were tried at the Old Bailey, and acquitted.

21. Lord Lansdowne, in moving for the appointment of a committee on foreign trade, enlarged on the causes of existing embarrassments; which he ascribed, in a great degree, to the diminution of consumption in the country. Lord Liverpool, on the contrary, ascribed them to increased production; and to establish his proposition adduced statements of the increase of the consumption of beer, spirits, and other excisable articles, during the last four years.

25. Order of council fixes the rewards to be given to government ships that explore the Arctic Circle to the 150° W. longitude, or the 83° N. latitude.

March 1. Mr. Hume's motion for a reduction of 10,000 men in the army lost; sixteen divisions during the discussion.

16. Mr. Plunkett's bills for the removal of catholic disabilities read a second time; majority for the second reading, 254; against it, 243. They were opposed by Peel, Bankes, sir Wm. Scott, and Wetherell; supported by Mackintosh, Wilberforce, and Canning. They passed a third reading in the commons, but were thrown out by the lords.

April. True bills found by the grand jury of the Middlesex sessions against Wardell, editor of the Statesman, Thelwall, editor of the Champion, Dolby, publisher of the Political Dictionary, and Mary Ann Carille, for seditious libels. They were preferred by the Constitutional Association, which, by assuming the duties of the law-officers of the crown, and being supported by the joint subscriptions of the ultraloyal, soon became generally unpopular.

11. Duel in Paris between Manuel and Beaumont, two wealthy agents of the Bourse, in which the former was killed. It originated in the seduction of the wife of M. Manuel, whose body the clergy refused to inter, because he had been killed in a duel.

Thirty-five bills found at the Old Bailey for passing forged notes.

A lady (Ann. Reg. xiii. 56), apparently labouring under considerable fatigue, called at a cottage near Turnham-green, and applied for refreshment, for which she tendered a bank-note. The inhabitant, a female, left the house for the purpose of procuring change, and on her return found the stranger gone. On hearing, as she believed, the cry of her infant, she hastened to its cradle, but to her utter dismay discovered her own child had been taken away, and another, of a tawny colour, placed in its stead. Cash to the amount of 100*l.* was fastened to its breast.

23. Greek patriarch of Constantinople executed at the door of his own church. Great numbers of Greeks massacred in several parts of Turkey.

28. Monument erected in St. Andrew's-square, Edinburgh, to the memory of the late viscount Melville, by a subscription of the officers and seamen of the British navy.

30. The Fury, captain Parry, and the Hecle, captain Lyon, proceeded on their voyage of discovery.

GREEK INSURRECTION.—The Greek insurrection, which for eight years after engaged a large share of attention, commenced in the spring. It had its origin in the principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia, where resistance to the authority of the Porte was organized by Ypsilanti, a Greek prince in the service of Russia. The Boyars, however, declared against the prince, who was unable to make head against the Turks. Meanwhile there was a rising in the Morea, and the flame extended to the islands of the Archipelago, where the Greeks fitted out fleets to cruise against their oppressors. Expectations were indulged in of a war between Turkey and Russia; provocations had been received by the latter, which obliged the Russian ambassador to leave Constantinople, yet the Russian armies made only demonstrations. It is supposed that, as the Greeks fought for independence, and did not seek a Muscovite in lieu of an Ottoman master, Alexander left them to fight their own battles, rather than countenance in any form the spirit of insurrection. The rising of the Greeks led to the beheading of the patriarch of the Greek church at Constantinople, accompanied by barbarous indignities to his person. The execution served as a signal for a general massacre of Greeks in Europe and Asia; while the Greeks, fired with indignation, resisted their assailants, and a mutual massacre, as horrible as any on record, filled most of the great cities of Greece and Asia Minor with victims.

HORTICULTURE.—In the reign of George III. the number of exotics introduced into England was 6750; in the reign of Elizabeth, 578; in the reigns of Charles I. and II., 578; in that of James II., 44; of William III., 298; of Anne, 230; of George I., 182; and 1770 in that of George II. The total number of exotics now in the gardens of this country is 11,970.

May 5. DEATH OF NAPOLEON BUONAPARTE.—The late French emperor was in his 52d year, and died of cancer in the stomach, a disease to which his father and sister had fallen premature victims. Upon opening his breast the malady that destroyed him was apparent, though its progress may have been hastened by mental affliction, and the unhealthy climate of St. Helena. He had been confined to his chamber since the 17th March, and on the 15th April began making his will, commening, "I die in the Apostolical Roman religion, in which I was born;" and next expressing a wish that his "ashes may repose on the banks of the Seine, in the midst of the French people, whom I have loved so well." The rest is history, of which Napoleon is now almost as much a portion as Cæsar or Hannibal. In determining his character we have the advantage of beholding him through his entire course, of witnessing his rise and fall, and of seeing him under those contrasted aspects of prosperous and adverse fortune that are wont to elicit the good and bad qualities of our nature. The result is that he was a man of transcendent abilities, to whom circumstances were favourable; that his career was wonderful, but not supernatural, yielding to the common influences which sway the lot of individuals. He attained eminence by wisdom and moderation; he lost it by the seductions of prosperity. His biography is an instructive lesson. The young artillery officer studious, discreet, self-denying, attentive to his duties, and seizing every opportunity to recommend himself to his superiors, could hardly fail of promotion in ordinary times, more especially in a crisis when talents were needed and merit sure of distinction. With tongue, pen, and sword; a prepossessing exterior; exempt from degrading vices, a correct judgment, quickness of observation, great self-reliance, energy, decision, and a sagacity that could pierce every perplexity, Napoleon was sure to win his way. At the head of the Army of Italy he lost none of the qualities that had fixed attention, and in subordinate employments inspired confidence. He was a hero, and the soldiers adored a leader so competent to lead them to battle, and whose soul breathed only republican patriotism and martial glory. Like most successful adventurers, Buonaparte was a great dissembler. He affected to sigh for peace in the midst of brilliant victories; to shun popular applause, and be more a votary of science than of ambition. It was only after he became First Consul that his hidden nature appeared, or that his better qualities were perverted by the intoxication of sudden exaltation. The wary taciturnity that had marked his early life now left him, and he overwhelmed those who approached him with an oracular volubility. Success inspired unbounded confidence in his own powers; he became arrogant, dictatorial, self-willed, restless, encroaching, and tyrannical. The sceptre of Charlemagne awaited him; his fiat was to be European law. Hence the aggressive wars of the empire; his perfidious intervention in the affairs of the Peninsula; his vain efforts to ruin British commerce; and his last gi-gantic enterprise against Russia, when Fortune dashed the "warrior tyrant" to the earth as suddenly as she had raised him. Grandeur of soul did not desert him amidst his astounding reverses; he bore himself nobly, was loth to leave France less than he found her, and only bent to overpowering numbers after exhausting in her defence, with desperate energy, all the resources of his military genius. His second attempt to seize the crown was worthy of his renown. Great and decided in conception, adventurous and heroic in execution, it failed because neither the kings of Europe, nor the enlightened of the French nation, would trust him. On the rock of St. Helena his mighty spirit first began to quail beneath the successive strokes of his adverse destiny. Though not subdued by misfortune, his temper was soured by petty annoyances. Indignant at the supposed treachery of the English ministry in detaining him a prisoner, he descended to altercations with his keepers, more analogous to scenes among the gossips of Richardson's novels than those of his former greatness. Notwithstanding these outbreaks of littleness elicited during the bitterness of his exile, he maintained a lofty bearing, unalterably fixed on grand objects. He had also amiable and generous qualities, which are shown by the number and fidelity of his friends. He was proud and irascible, susceptible of injury, and keenly vindictive. It is not unlikely he died in the ostentation of Catholicism to spite his Protestant gaolers. His conversation was remarkable; it was varied, either sportive or sublime, vivid, picturesque, and replete with new and magnificent ideas. His disposition was to action rather than meditation, and his mind was more imaginative than philosophical. Formed on the model of Plutarch's heroes, his aim was to astonish by the splendour rather than the benevolence of his exploits. He disliked metaphysical abstractions; they had no motive force in them, and moreover, being of a levelling tendency, abated the pride of individual superiority, which was his glory. His ruling passion was power, to which he made religion, pagantry, fear, selfishness,—everything subordinate. Though calculating, and capable of combining many and distant results, he committed the egregious error of seeking to govern the present by the obsolete analogies of past times. His political system had no other foundation than the restless territorial domination of old Rome; it was the arbitrary will of one successful chieftain trampling on modern science, rights, and justice. His usurpation was an insult to his contemporaries, which they felt and resented, and his empire, dependent almost solely on his own might, would probably have ended like that of the Macedonian conqueror, with his own existence, had it not been overthrown by the crowned heads, with whom he had vainly allied his fortunes. His career was astonishing, but savoured of the melo-dramatic. Surrounded with a theatrical bravery and display, it dazzled the multitude and the military, whose idol he still continues; but the wise must always lament the illusions of his vain-glorious pursuits. Apart from his public course his character was not particularly exceptionable; the domestic affections and virtues existing in fair proportion, and he was the slave of no gross personal vice or folly. Ambition made all his crime. To self-aggrandizement, virtue, truth, honour, and justice were sacrificed. He never sought more good than ministered to his own elevation; therefore mankind owe him nothing, and his fall was a blessing to the world.

May 8. The order of knighthood having been surreptitiously obtained by two medical practitioners at the king's levees, an order was issued from Carlton-house, directing that no person should be introduced to be knighted unless his majesty's consent had been previously signified to the lord in waiting, by one of the secretaries of state.

11. A person named Cooper, mistakenly supposed to be the editor of the John Bull, and Weaver, the printer, committed to Newgate for a breach of parliamentary privilege, in misrepresenting a speech of Mr. Grey Bennett.

12. Congress of the sovereigns of Russia, Prussia, and Austria, at Laybach, terminated. The chief subject of their deliberations had been the revolts in Piedmont and at Naples. Before separating they issued a circular, expressive of their determination to maintain "that social order under which Europe has enjoyed so many centuries of glory and happiness. Useful or necessary changes in legislation, and in the administration of states, ought only to emanate from the free-will and the intelligent and well-weighed conviction of those whom God has rendered responsible for power." The monarchs expressed their intention of re-assembling in the ensuing year.

DISFRANCHISEMENT OF GRAMPOND.—In this month parliamentary reform excited interest, and motions on the subject were made by Mr. Lambton and lord John Russell. A bill introduced by the latter for the disfranchisement of Grampound, convicted of corruption, passed into a law; and by the bill, as it passed the commons, the franchise was transferred to Leeds, under a 20^l. qualification (10^l. lord John Russell proposed). But the lords refused to pass the bill in this shape; and, in lieu of giving two representatives to Leeds, they gave two additional ones to the county of York. The boom, small enough at first, became a nullity.

18. Mr. Kent exhibited his machine for walking upon water, in one of the wet-docks at Leith. It consisted of a triangle of about ten feet, formed of rods of iron, to each angle of which was affixed a case of block-tin, filled with air, and completely water-tight.

24. Government having withdrawn the annual grant of 3000^l. from the Board of Agriculture, the members determined to support it by an annual subscription among themselves.

25. Three manufacturers of forged bank-notes executed at Warwick. 10,000^l. of forged notes were found in their possession, and the plates from which they had been struck.

Mr. John Hunt, of the Examiner, sentenced to one year's imprisonment in Cold-bath-fields, for a libel on the house of commons, in stating that it contained more public criminals than public guardians. Thomas Flindall, of the Western Luminary, was at the same time sentenced to eight months' imprisonment for a libel on the queen.

June 1. Five Jews apprehended at Leipsic, for issuing Dutch forged paper to the amount of 100,000^l.

27. ECONOMY AND RETRENCHMENT.—The session of parliament was remarkable for the commencement, by Mr. Hume, of a severe scrutiny into the public estimates. His object was to show the immense disproportion between the peace expenditure of 1792 and the present; and, to establish this, he brought forward, in an elaborate speech of the 27th, various statements illustrative of the expenditure of the two periods. The general expenditure had increased from 16,000,000^l., in 1792, to 53,000,000^l.. The military force, regular and irregular, had increased from 92,430 men to 263,867; and the expense from 2,330,349^l. to 8,926,421^l.. The expense of the navy in 1792 was under 2,000,000^l.; it was now 6,382,766^l.. The increase in the expense of the different public offices was shown to be enormous, and to require curtailment. Although 850,000^l. was granted for the king's civil list, various other charges were thrown upon the public under the head of civil contingencies. Salaries had been increased, and sinecures multiplied; the offices of receivers-general of taxes and of distributors of stamps were mostly executed by deputies; the principals held large balances of public money, and were often in arrear at their deaths. Immense savings might be effected by an improved mode of collecting the public revenues. Out of a revenue of 66,000,000*l.* upwards of 4,000,000*l.* were paid for the expense of collecting it. Mr. Hume concluded by moving a resolution expressive of the necessity of retrenchment, and of an adjustment of the expenditure to the increased value of the currency and the distressed circumstances of the country. An amendment was moved by Mr. Bankes, not greatly differing from the original resolution; and Mr. Hume's resolution rejected by 174 to 94. The details, however, produced made a great impression on the country, and even on the members of government, many of whom were unconscious of the waste in their own departments, and of the greater economy that might be introduced therein without detriment to the public service.

July 4. New theatre in the Haymarket opened.

A letter from Mr. Scoresby states that the Congreve rockets had been successfully used in the whale-fishery.

The queen having, by memorial to the king, claimed a right to be crowned, the privy-council assembled at the Cockpit, Whitehall, to hear counsel in support of her majesty's claim. Messrs. Brougham and Denman were heard in favour of the claim; the attorney and solicitor-general against it. After long deliberation the lords of the council reported that queens consort were not entitled of right to be crowned at any time; which report being communicated to the king, he approved of it.

11. Parliament prorogued by commission.

17. Spain having ratified the treaty for the cession of the Floridas to the United States of America, these much-coveted provinces were formally taken possession of by general Jackson. The republic made, likewise, an acquisition of territory to the westward of the lakes, by purchasing above 5,000,000 of acres of fertile lands from the Indians. It was paid for in merchandise to the value of 25,000 dollars, and an annual payment of less than 2000*l.*

19. CORONATION OF GEORGE IV.—This ancient solemnity was performed in a style of great splendour. Preparations had been making for upwards of a twelvemonth, and in general the precedent of James II. was followed, as described by Sandford. Three tiers of galleries, supported upon columns, were erected on the eastern and western sides of Westminster Abbey, and directly under the south window was the royal platform, on which the thrones and king's chair were placed, superbly decorated. Beneath the galleries were sideboards or cellarets, communicating with passages by sliding panels, for the convenience of the waiters. Separate boxes were provided for the accommodation of the royal family, foreign ministers, and lord great chamberlain. A flooring of wood was laid down in the body of the hall, fourteen inches above the pavement. There were six dining-tables, each 56 feet long and 7 wide. The decorations were in the Gothic style, the better to correspond with the occasion and the building; and a triumphal arch of great beauty was composed of the various orders of architecture existing in the hall itself and in Westminster Abbey. The covered platform, over which the procession moved from the north door of the hall to the west door of the abbey, was 1500 feet in length. In addition to the preparations for the grand banquet, the adjoining courts of law were fitted up for private dinner-rooms, for dining nearly 2000 members of the procession. The preparations in Westminster Abbey were on a corresponding scale of magnificence. Great care was taken of the ornaments by encasing them in boards; and in the erection of the galleries not a single nail or hook was driven into the venerable fabric. Both in the hall and the abbey seats were reserved for the reporters for the public press. At some of the entrances were seen Cribb, Jackson, and other pugilists, intended to assist the doorkeepers in maintaining order. On each side of the platform, from the hall to the abbey, an amphitheatre of seats was erected, to accommodate 100,000 spectators. All the houses and places in the vicinity, from which a view of the pageant could be obtained, were covered with galleries and seats, the prices of which varied from twenty guineas to one guinea. About 7000 tickets were issued by the lord chamberlain and the earl marshal for admission to the hall and abbey. On Wednesday there was a grand rehearsal of the duties of the champion, and of all others who had duties to perform. That night the king slept at the speaker's house. The firing of guns and ringing of bells, at one o'clock next morning, announced the opening of the gala; and so early as two o'clock the streets were filled with the carriages of persons going to witness the ceremony. At five a considerable number of the company had arrived and taken their places in the hall. The corporations of London, Oxford, and Dublin came by water from Blackfriars' bridge. About five the queen arrived in her state-carriage; but no preparation had been made for her reception, and, not having an admission-ticket, her majesty was obliged to retire. At nine the peers, great officers of state, and all who were to take part in the procession, were assembled, in the costumes of their ranks and offices, in the hall; presenting, with the galleries occupied by the peeresses, foreign ambassadors, and others, in rich dresses, a scene indescribably picturesque and magnificent. At ten precisely his majesty entered, splendidly attired: the persons in the galleries rose to receive him; and the trumpets struck up "God save the king." Almost immediately after the procession began to move towards the Abbey, the king walking under a canopy of cloth of gold, supported by Henry Brougham, M.P., and the other barons of the Cinque-ports. As the different personages went along the platform popular feeling was manifested, some being hushed, others cheered. The administration of the coronation-oath, homage, unction, and other rites of the abbey, occupied about five hours. When the king re-entered the hall, with the crown on his head, he was received with enthusiastic cheers and waving of handkerchiefs: he retired for an hour to repose himself, when his guests took the opportunity to eat their dinners. During this scene the ladies and gentlemen from the galleries promenaded between the tables, and some partook of the refreshments so abundantly supplied. About five the royal banquet was served; the deputy earl marshal, the lord high steward, and lord high constable attending the first course, on horseback, in splendid robes, and their chargers richly caparioned. Next followed the challenge of the king's champion, the proclamation of the royal titles by the heralds, the officers-at-arms crying "Largesse." A noble lord then proposed the king's health, with three times three, which was drunk with rapturous applause. Lord Chancellor Eldon said they ought to have drunk it with nine times nine. The king drank the health of "his peers and his good people." His majesty having dined, "Non nobis Domine" was sung, and the king shortly after quitted the hall. Immediately a scramble ensued for the viands he had left on his table. The hall was lighted by wax-lights, but they were unnecessary, as the business of the day was concluded before dark. The weather was beautiful, the sun shining brightly all day. The amusements set apart for the people consisted of the ascent of a balloon, a boat-race on the Serpentine, an exhibition of fire-works in Hyde-park, and the throwing open the theatres for free admission. The expenses of the coronation amounted to 238,000*l.* (Hansard's Parl. Debates, ix. 1107.) The crown worn by the king was of unexampled brilliance and richness. The jewels of the crown were valued at 65,000*l.*; and ten per cent. interest was paid to Rundell and Bridge for the loan of them. The total quantities of provisions for the dinner and banquet were as follows:—7442 lbs. of beef 033 lbs. of veal, 20 quarters of house-lamb, 20 legs of house-lamb, 5 saddles of lamb, 55 quarters of grass-lamb, 160 lambs' sweetbreads, 389 cow-heels, 490 calves'-feet, 250 lbs. of suet, 160 geese, 720 pullets and capons, 1610 chickens, 520 fowls for stock (hens), 1730 lbs. of bacon, 550 lbs. of lard, 912 lbs. of butter, 8400 eggs. Of wines,—champagne, 100 dozens; Burgundy, 20 dozens; claret, upwards of 200 dozens; hock, 50 dozens; Madeira, 50 dozens; sherry and port, 350 dozens; iced punch, 100 gallons.

23. Westminster Hall thrown open to the public for three days.

24. Court of Parma goes into mourning for Napoleon Buonaparte; the duchess Maria Louisa being the widow of the emperor. No mourning in any other European court.

26. The king holds a splendid drawing-room; 2000 persons present.

Coronation-medals distributed by the speaker to each member of parliament, on sending his receipt for it. They weigh a full ounce of gold each, and are well executed.

30. The Queen taken ill in Drury-lane theatre.

31. The king left Carlton-house on a visit to Ireland. He was to embark and dine on board the royal yacht at Portsmouth.

Aug. 2. DEATH OF QUEEN CAROLINE.—Her majesty had for some days suffered from constipation, which baffled the skill of her physicians. She was in her 53rd year, and member of an heroic but unfortunate family. Her father, the duke of Brunswick, lost his dominions and his life at the battle of Jena; and her brother, in 1815, was slain in Belgium. Her marriage with her cousin, the prince of Wales; their separation a twelvemonth after; the princess going abroad; her return to England; and her trial for adultery, are incidents already noticed. Immediately the queen ceased to be an object of persecution the excitement in her favour began to subside; and the little interest evinced on the day of her unsuccessful attempt to take part in the coronation showed the change that had taken place in the popular sentiment. She was felt for as an oppressed, but not blameless, princess. That her marriage should turn out unhappy was to be expected: it was a marriage of interest, not of the affections. George III. urged forward the union, as a mode of reclaiming a dissolute son; and the match became one of pecuniary convenience, formed with a dissipated prince, already affianced to Mrs. Fitzherbert, to whom he was attached, and connected by ties of pleasure with others. Under such cir-circumstances Caroline had little chance of domestic bliss; neither was she peculiarly fitted, by character or education, to win the regards of her husband. Her heart and understanding were good, but not cultivated. Accustomed to the military license of a German court,—self-willed, hasty and vehement in temper, with little taste for refined pursuits,—it was not likely she would prove acceptable to a fastidious consort, spoiled by self-indulgence. Naturally, the queen was lively and joyous, affable and condescending, fond of being beloved and confided in by those beneath her. She liked music, and had a taste for mechanics; and occasionally indulged in the construction of toys and ornaments. Buoyant in spirits, and careless, she “forgave anything but dulness.” (Diary of George IV. i. 255.) She was affectionately regarded by George III., which weighs much in favour of her character; but her royal mother and sisters-in-law soon ceased to be her friends. Though not intellectual, she was shrewd enough to penetrate the wiles of the successive cliques of politicians who sought to make her grievances the ladder of their ambition. Either as a mode of annoying her enemies, or from conscious innocence, she was regardless of suspicious appearances. Hence her adoption of the sail-maker's son, Austin, her visits to Vauxhall and masked balls, and her mingling familiarly with the fiddlers and vocalists of the theatres. Abroad, her conduct was so unseemly, in adopting a handsome courier for her confidant, that all her English attendants left her service. Her popularity in England was partly the result of the unpopularity of the king, partly of faction, partly of a generous sympathy with misfortune, and a conviction that, if not without fault, she was more sinned against than sinning. Her majesty met death with the characteristic courage of her family; and, as she herself declared, without regret. Her body lay in state at her villa, near Hammersmith; and, on the 19th, was conveyed through the metropolis, on its way to Brunswick, its final resting-place. The day proved one of the wettest of the season, yet countless multitudes assembled to form part of the procession. Instead of the funeral passing through London, a circuitous route had been directed by the king's ministers; which apparent indignity so incensed the people, that an affray arose with the guards, and two lives were lost. By barricading the streets, the people succeeded in forcing the procession through the city, whence the royal corpse was hurried with indecent precipitancy to Harwich, the port of embarkation. At Colchester, pursuant to the queen's will, a plate was affixed to the coffin, with an inscription, dictated by herself,—“Here lies Caroline of Brunswick, the ~~ignored~~ (erroneously ‘murdered,’ in the Edinburgh Review, cxxxv. 51) queen of England.” This was removed, in spite of the protestations of the executors, by the agent of government, who had the management of the funeral. The remains of the queen reached Brunswick on the 24th, attended by lord and lady Hood, Dr. Lushington, serjeant Wilde, and lady Ann Hamilton. They were deposited in the family vault of the house of Brunswick—already the receptacle of fifty-seven of Caroline's illustrious relatives.

10. The remains of major André interred at New York, with the view of their removal to England.

15. The king landed in Ireland. His reception was enthusiastic. From the entrance of the vice-regal lodge, in Phoenix-park, he made a short address to the people, assuring them that “his heart had always been Irish.”

24. The inquest on Francis, who was shot at the queen's funeral, returned a verdict of wilful murder against a life-guardsmen unknown.

Sept. 3. A religious society established at Paris, called the Société de la Morale Chrétienne, of which the duke de la Rochefoucault Liancourt, a catholic, and the baron de Staal Holstein, a protestant, are members. Its main object is declared to be the inculcation of the importance of the precepts of Christianity, and their application to the practical uses of social life.

12. Coroner's jury on Richard Honey, shot at Cumberland-gate while viewing the queen's funeral, returned a verdict of manslaughter against the officers and men of the 1st regiment of life-guards, after sitting fourteen days, ten hours per day.

14. The king having expressed some displeasure at the conduct of sir Robert Baker, in suffering the queen's funeral to pass through the city, he resigned his situation of chief magistrate at Bow-street. He was succeeded by Mr. Birnie.

15. The king arrived at Carlton-house from Ireland. He left Dunleary harbour (since called King's-town) on the 5th, but had been detained by tempestuous weather.

20. Major-general sir Robert Wilson removed from the army, by order of the king, for the decided part he had taken in the queen's favour. A public subscription was set on foot for sir Robert, to compensate him for the loss of his commission, which amounted to upwards of 10,000*l.*

24. The king embarked at Ramsgate to visit Hanover, and landed at Calais.

The Duke of York, archbishop of Canterbury, lord chancellor, and other noblemen, were appointed lords-justices, to administer the government during his absence.

Oct. 5. George IV., having passed through Lisle, Brussels, Aix-la-Chapelle, and Minden, entered his German dominions. On the 11th he made his public entrance into Hanover, drawn by eight milk-white horses. The joy of the people was extreme at the sight of the first member of the Brunswick family who had exchanged the ancient title of elector for that of king of Hanover. Ten days were spent in the capital amidst rejoicings and festivals. The king underwent the fatigue of a second coronation. He reviewed the military; received the civic authorities; visited the university of Gottingen; spoke German; and joined in a grand hunting-party at Diester.

9. The walls of the metropolis placarded with a statement to the effect that the body of Olive Wilmott Serres, princess of Cumberland, had been taken in execution for debt; and that a legacy of 15,000*l.*, bequeathed to her royal highness by her late uncle, George III., was unjustly withheld from her by the government. According to the representation of the said princess, her mother was married to the late duke of Cumberland in 1767; that the nuptials were kept secret, the duke marrying a second wife; and that she, his legitimate daughter by the first, was born in 1772. The story is only valuable by showing the natural addiction of some minds to imposture. Olive was the daughter of a Robert Wilmott, a house-painter at Warwick, and was brought up by the Rev Dr. Wilmott, about whom she published a book, to prove the doctor the real Junius. (Ann. Reg., lxiii. 150.) The fabrication not succeeding, she started herself as Olive, princess of Cumberland, having previously been married to a foreign artist, named Serres. Mrs. Serres had a singular taste for documentary evidence, generally contriving that the writers of her letters and certificates should be dead before they were produced.

Nov. 2. Lord Byron's tragedy of Marino Faliero, having been translated into French verse, is hissed off the stage at the Théâtre Français.

8. The king arrived at Carlton-house from Hanover.

15. Mary Anne Carlile, sister of Richard Carlile, sentenced to pay a fine of 500*l.*, and a year's imprisonment, for publishing a theological libel.

19. A respectable farmer, named Shea, his wife, seven children, and five labourers, who resided in the county of Tipperary, were burnt in their dwellings in the night by an armed banditti. Such of the unfortunate victims as attempted to escape were fired at by the miscreants, who surrounded the premises, and drove them back into the flames. Shea had dispossessed his under-tenants and the cotters on his farm, because they refused either to pay rent, or labour for its discharge.

24. Proprietor of the John Bull sentenced to pay a fine of 1100*l.*, and to nine months' imprisonment, for a libel on lady Wrottesley, charging her with an intrigue with a menial servant.

31. Monument to Martin Luther erected at Wittenberg. Before the statue was uncovered the ancient and celebrated hymn, "Ein fester Burg ist unser Gott," was sung in chorus by a vast assemblage of spectators, and had a sublime effect.

A curious case of copyright occupied the lord chancellor this month. Mrs. Rundell, mother of the silversmith on Ludgate-hill, upwards of fourteen years ago, wrote a book on cookery, and gave it to Mr. Murray, who published it, with additions, and some embellishments. The work at first did not command a rapid sale; but, after a few years, it rose to 12,000 annually. Mrs. Rundell now wished to resume the copyright, and obtained an injunction against the sale of it by Murray; who, in his turn, obtained an injunction against the sale of it by the authoress with his additions. The lord chancellor said that, under the circumstances, he doubted whether a copyright existed; but, without deciding that point, his lordship dissolved the injunction against Mr. Murray.

During the last ten years, it appears (Ann. Reg., lxiii. 181), there have been 163 suicides in the city and liberties of Westminster, of which number 63 were females. The greatest number of suicides was in July, and the fewest in October.

Dec. 5. M. Berenger, the popular French song-writer, sentenced to a fine of 500 francs, and three months' imprisonment, for an outrage, in his writings, against public morals and religion.

29. Marquis Wellesley arrived at Dublin, as the new lord-lieutenant; and, as he was known to be favourable to the catholics, he was not very welcome to the protestant faction.

PRINCE HOHENLOHE.—The curiosity of the Bavarians was much excited by a pretended worker of miraculous cures, in the person of prince Hohenlohe. The principal scene of his performances was Bamberg. Dupes were soon accumulated: in a short time there were hundreds who could attest his efficiency in their own persons, and thousands who were willing to attest it in others. His fame waxed great; and the daughters of even princely houses repaired to him, to receive health and beauty through the power of his word: for prayer and exhortation were the means by which he made the blind to see, and the lame to walk. Unfortunately for the prince, the police were sceptical: they insisted that he should operate publicly, not secretly; and that a commission of the medical faculty should be present at his cures. Looking upon this supervision as degrading to his holy mission, the prince suddenly left Bamberg, to seek new proselytes, and less prying inquisitors, in the Austrian capital.

RAIN.—The quantity of rain that fell in 1820 was 26 inches; in 1821, 41 inches.

SMALL-POX.—792 persons died of the small-pox within the London bills of mortality in the last year. This is about one-third of the average number of those who perished annually in the metropolis before the introduction of vaccination; showing either the neglect of vaccination, or its inefficiency.

ENGLISH NEWSPAPERS.—A parliamentary return shows that there are forty-two newspapers, or other stamped journals, published every Saturday, Sunday, or Monday, exclusive of eighteen others, published on other days, or twice or thrice weekly. There are eight morning and seven evening papers published in London; the circulation of the former about 100,000, of the latter, 12,000. The total circulation of the London newspaper-press is estimated as follows:—

Of Saturday, Sunday, and Monday editions. . .	3,250,000
Of other weekly, twice and thrice a-week papers . .	1,750,000
Of daily papers. . .	10,500,000

Grand total, yearly. 15,500,000

Of country newspapers there are, of English provincial, 135; Scottish, 47; Irish, 126; total, 308

EDUCATION IN FRANCE.—The number of communes having one or more schools, in 1817, was 17,800; in 1820, 24,124. The number of scholars in 1817 was 865,721; in 1820, 1,063,919. The population of France in 1820 amounted to 30,407,907. In 1817 there were 990,023 births, and 786,338 deaths; making an excess of births, amounting to 203,685.

MISCELLANIES.—A daily paper commenced in Lancashire.

A.D. 1822. The present was an interesting but not eventful year. It was more remarkable for speculation than action. In the British parliament important questions were discussed but not decided. Among the leading subjects of debate were the state of the currency, criminal law, agriculture, Ireland, parliamentary reform, the influence of the crown, the Scotch burghs, and newspaper press. It was a singular feature of the year that agricultural distress had almost become an European calamity; in France and the Netherlands, as well as England, there were loud complaints of the ruinously low prices produced by fruitful seasons. While, however, the agriculturists of the continent and of Britain were suffering from abundance, a grievous famine arose in Ireland, showing the anomalies of her situation, resulting either from the staple food of her population differing from that of surrounding nations, or the limitation of her commercial interchanges with her neighbours. Her distresses from scarcity were aggravated by the agrarian outrages, originating in the pressure of tithes and rack-rents, on the peasantry and small farmers. Several of the ringleaders of these disorders were apprehended by the civil and military power, and great numbers executed or transported. A new lord-lieutenant was appointed in the marquis Wellesley, the insurrection act passed, and the habeas corpus act suspended, the object of which coercive measures was at least to produce temporary tranquillity. Abroad the chief subjects of interest were the congress of sovereigns at Verona, the progress of the Greek insurrection, the struggles between the liberals and ultras in France, and the erection of Brazil into an independent empire.

Jan. The shop of Carlile, the vendor of irreligious publications, is now fitted up with a novel contrivance for baffling the law-officers of the crown. Publications that are legal are sold openly in his shop, while those of contrary character are sold from a window in his back parlour, having a turning machine, one end of which conveys the desired book to his customer, the other the money to the vendor. The person who conducts the apparatus is invisible, and the room barricaded.

5. Mr. Loveday, an Englishman resident in France, petitioned the French chamber of deputies on the seduction of his daughter to the catholic faith.

30. Thames outward-bound East-Indian man wrecked off Beachey-head; twelve of the crew perished, the remainder were saved by captain Manby's life-preserver.

Cortes of Portugal present a laudatory address to Jeremy Bentham, on his writings in behalf of liberty.

Several pieces of plate voted to Mr. Hume, M.P., for his services in enforcing retrenchment and economy.

THE GRENVILLES.—In the course of the month ministers strengthened themselves by a union with this section of the opposition. The marquis of Buckingham was elevated to a duke; Mr. C. Wynne was placed at the head of the India board, and another of the family was named envoy to the Swiss cantons. The accession of the Grenvilles was considered a dereliction of principle, but except the catholic, to which they were favourable, there was no other question on which they differed from the general policy of the Liverpool government. The loss to the opposition was probably greater than the gain to the ministry. Lord Grenville had retired from public life; and no other member of his small party had such talents for oratory or business as to make his aid of much value. In Ireland the catholics were gratified by the removal of the anti-catholic Saurin, and Mr. Plunkett succeeded him in the office of attorney-general. Another ministerial change was the retirement of lord Sidmouth from active employment; who, retaining his seat in the cabinet, was succeeded in his office of home secretary by Mr. Peel. This gentleman became a useful auxiliary to lord Londonderry in the commons, and his political prepossessions mainly coincided with those of his predecessor.

Feb. 4. Will of the late queen proved in the prerogative court. The effects are sworn under 20,000*l.*

5. Parliament opened by the king. His majesty regretted that his visit to Ireland had failed to produce tranquillity; manufactures and commerce were represented to be prosperous, but agriculture to be labouring under difficulties. Amendments to the address were moved by sir F. Burdett and Mr. Hume, but negatived by large majorities.

11. INSURRECTION ACT.—The number and daring of the Whiteboys and other nocturnal bands in Ireland rendered defensive measures necessary for the protection of persons and property. The disorders were agrarian, they arose out of the letting of land, rents, and tithes, and were unconnected with religious or political animosities. To meet them ministers proposed to suspend the habeas corpus act, and to renew the insurrection act. By the provisions of the last the lord lieutenant was empowered, on the representation of justices in session that a district was disturbed, to proclaim it in a state of insurrection; interdict the inhabitants from leaving their homes between sunset and sunrise, and subject them to visits by night, to ascertain their presence in their own dwellings. If absent, they were considered idle and disorderly, and liable to transportation for seven years! The act encountered considerable opposition, but, together with the bill for the suspension of the habeas corpus act, received the royal assent on the 11th inst.

16. An injunction refused to restrain the piracy of lord Byron's "Cain;" the lord chancellor had doubts about the moral tendency of the work, and till they were removed by the verdict of a jury for damages, in a court of common law, he would not extend to the publication the protection of property.

20. Died, at an advanced age, JOHN STEWART, commonly called "Walking Stewart," having, to gratify the amor videndi, wandered on foot over most parts of the habitable globe. Early in life he left the service of the East India company, with an intimation that he was destined to a nobler vocation than the making out of "invoices for a company of grocers." After visiting the principal cities of the East, and crossing the desert of Arabia to Marseilles, and thence through France and Spain to England, he went over to the United States of America, all of which he traversed. It was the luxury of seeing himself, not of benefiting others, that seemingly prompted his incessant locomotion, for it does not appear he published to the world the results of his observations. One eccentric opinion of Stewart's was, that the time would come when the wives of the rich would cease to bear children, those of the poor only undergoing the labour. He received a grant of 15,000*l.* from parliament to compensate him for losses sustained in the service of the nabob of Arcot. The last ten years of his life were spent in the neighbourhood of Charing-cross, that he might live, as he said, in Dr. Johnson's "full tide of human existence."

25. REDUCTION OF NAVY FIVE PER CENTS.—Mr. Vansittart proposed in parliament his plan for reducing the interest of the Navy five per cents. to four; holders not signifying their dissent to have 105*l.* in a new four per cent. stock, and persons dissenting, to be paid off in numerical order. By this scheme an annual saving to the public of 1,140,000*l.* would be effected; besides a farther saving of upwards of 90,000*l.* of annual charge, which would be gained by a similar reduction of the Irish five per cents. The high prices of the public funds obviated all difficulty in the execution of this financial operation, and the holders of the five per cent. stock found it expedient to acquiesce in the minister's terms. The dissentients were in number only 1373, and the stock held by them amounted to 2,615,978*l.*; not a fifteenth part of the five per cent. capital.

26. General Berton heads an insurrection against the Bourbon government at Soummer: it was speedily defeated by the national guards, and the general, with several accomplices in his wild scheme, put to death.

28. Sir N^o Conant and other police magistrates found guilty of conspiring to deprive a publican of his licence.

March 1. House of commons resolved, by a majority of 182 against 128, to reduce ('snuff out,' Mr. Wilberforce termed it) two junior lords of the admiralty, leaving ministers in a minority of 51.

6. The tide was so low, owing to a strong south-west wind, in the Thames, near London-bridge, that it was fordable in many places; numerous persons walked across, and several valuable articles that had lain at the bottom of the river for years were picked up.

8. United States of America recognise the independence of the South American republics. Congress voted 100,000 dollars to defray the charges of diplomatic intercourse with the new governments.

9. Mrs. Donatty, a retired widow lady, barbarously murdered at No. 16, Robert-street, Bedford-row: the assassin left a sack filled with plate and other valuables, which from the circumstance of being disturbed he did not carry off.

10. Severe restrictions imposed on the French journals and periodicals; they were opposed by M. Talleyrand.

Litigation has arisen between M. Lafitte, the banker in Paris, and the representatives of Napoleon. In 1815 Buonaparte lodged with the house of Lafitte 4,222,000*l.* in cash, and the remainder of 5,000,000*l.* in securities. The bank gave him a receipt, acknowledging the 5,000,000*l.* to be payable at sight; also a letter of credit on bankers at Philadelphia, payable at sight, for the same amount. The securities were never realized—a part of the 4,222,000*l.* were remitted to Napoleon's order, and the balance, being 3,149,000*l.*, remains payable to the representatives of Napoleon. The point at issue is, who are the legal representatives?

20. Will of Thomas Coutts, esq., an eminent banker, who died last year, aged 86, proved, and the personal property sworn under 600,000*l.* Mrs. Coutts, formerly Miss Mellon, of Drury-lane theatre, to whom Mr. Coutts had been married eight years, was left universal legatee, to the exclusion of three daughters by a former wife. To Mrs. Coutts was also bequeathed the banking-business in the Strand.

26. Court of chancery decided that Mr. Lawrence's lectures were out of the protection of equity, owing to containing passages inimical to christianity.

Sir Alexander Boswell killed in a duel by James Stuart, esq., of Dunearn; the meeting originated in some literary effusion of the former, inserted in a newspaper recently started in Scotland, for political purposes.

27. Mr. Canning appointed governor-general of India, and sergeant Blossett chief-justice of India.

Several instances occurred this month, in the county of Norfolk, of the malicious destruction of threshing-machines, and of the stacks and buildings of farmers, by incendiaries.

30. At the special commission at Limerick, many of "captain Rock's" men convicted; some executed, others transported.

April. FAMINE IN IRELAND.—(Owing to the failure of the potato-crop, through the heavy rains of last year, the south of Ireland was afflicted with a grievous scarcity of the staple food of the population. The price of potatoes was quadrupled. Before the end of the month the province of Munster was in a state of actual starvation. The peasantry crowded into the towns and villages, in the vain hope of finding employment or subsistence. At Banis, many were heard inquiring what crimes were punishable by confinement, as they were willing, by such means, to procure food even in prison. The sufferings of the people were augmented by typhus fever, which spread its ravages. Intelligence of this general distress arriving in England, prompt measures were adopted for its alleviation. A committee was formed in London, and corresponding committees in different parts of the country. The benevolence of individuals was such that large funds were speedily at their disposal, and, being well managed, the Irish soon experienced the benefits of British sympathy.

4. Captain Birley, and others of the Manchester yeomanry, were tried by a special jury, at Lancaster assizes, for unlawfully wounding Thomas Redford; August 16th, 1819. After a trial of four days, before Mr. Justice Holroyd, the jury returned a verdict of acquittal. A motion was made in the court of king's bench, May 2nd, to obtain a new trial, which was refused, the judges delivering their opinions seriatim against it.

11. Newman Knowles, esq., appointed recorder of London, in the room of sir John Silvester, deceased.

13. Sir John Sewell, and other members of the Constitutional Association, tried for a conspiracy, but acquitted.

20. Alderman Wauthman obtained 500*l.* damages from the John Bull, for a libel, imputing to him perjury, and the receiving of stolen goods.

25. Thomas Denman, esq., elected common-sergeant of the city of London, after a sharp contest with Mr. Bolland, by a majority of 131 of the common council against 119.

29. Lord John Russell's motion on parliamentary reform negatived by 269 to 164. His lordship's plan was to add 100 members to the house; 60 for counties and 40 for large towns. This, he urged, had become politic from the evidence of increasing intelligence among the people, especially the middling classes. He was replied to by Mr. Canning, the champion of the existing representation.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESSES.—On the 29th the house of commons resolved itself into a committee, to take into consideration the report of the agricultural committee. On that day three different schemes were proposed for the relief of the farmers and landlords; one by the marquis of Londonderry, the second by Mr. Ricardo, and the third by Mr. Huskisson. That of the marquis was adopted. The pressing evil was the low price of produce, which disabled the farmer from paying his rent, and the landlord from supporting his former expenditure. The remedies chiefly insisted upon were a reduction of taxes, especially those affecting agriculture; secondly, the abolition of tithes; and, thirdly, the reduction of the interest of the national debt. (Ann. Reg. lxiiv. 2.) The last had begun to be very generally insisted upon at public meetings, and its equity defended on the ground of the increased value of the currency since the passing of Peel's bill for the resumption of payments in specie. The exclusion of foreign corn from the British markets had ceased to be relied upon as a panacea, as very little had during the last three years been imported, and the lowness of price resulted from the abundance of home produce. One novelty in lord Londonderry's scheme was the advance of a loan to the agriculturists, on the security of corn. The idea was not favourably received, and was sharply ridiculed as a species of pawnbroking, unworthy of the government. Moreover, it was urged that the bankers were always ready to advance to the farmers on adequate security; and that it would be impolitic for government to incur greater risk than individuals. Project of a loan was in consequence left out of the minister's plan.

30. A bill introduced by Mr. Canuing for the admission of catholic peers into the lords. It passed the commons, but was thrown out by the upper house.

May 2. Lord Normanby moved a resolution for the reduction of one of the two postmasters-general, which was carried against ministers by 216 to 201.

Duel between the dukes of Bedford and Buckingham, in consequence of some expression of the former at a county meeting; both parties fired, Bedford in the air, and the business terminated amicably.

It is a fact that, though trade is encouraged in France, a merchant or manufacturer, since the return of the Bourbons, if he receives a patent of nobility, must take out "letters of relief," conveying the king's pardon for having descended to trade.—(Ann. Reg. 1822, p. 82.)

5. Vauxhall-gardens sold for 25,000*l*.

6. St. Paul's cathedral lighted with gas.

8. The number of aliens in England 24,930.

9. An iron steam-boat exhibited on the Thames; it is propelled by a thirty-horse engine, and is intended to navigate between London and Paris, being the first instance of a direct water-communication between the two capitals.

14. Parliament awarded 800,000*l*. to the army under the command of the duke of Wellington, for property and stores captured in the Peninsula, in the years 1812, 1813, and 1814. The grant for naval prize was 116,400*l*.

Commitments under the game-laws in England had increased from 558 in 1816, to 1467 in 1820.

24. DEAD WEIGHT ANNUITY.—The amount of military and naval pensions, and civil superannuations, was about five millions annually. On the 24th Mr. Vansittart brought forward his amended scheme for relieving the immediate pressure of this dead weight, by extending it over a longer term of years than the natural lives of the annuitants. For this purpose an annuity of 2,800,000*l*. was appropriated, out of the existing revenue, for forty-five years, and vested in trustees for the discharge of the then payments, which, for that year, were estimated at 4,900,000*l*., subject to yearly diminution by deaths. It was computed that, according to the ordinary duration of human life, the annuities for the lives of the then holders would be equal to the annuity of 2,800,000*l*. for forty-five years. The trustees were, therefore, empowered to sell, from time to time, such portions of this annuity as would provide the funds required for the payment of the dead weight, according to a computation made of the amount which would, probably, be due in each year. The bank of England became the contractor for a portion of the annuity. There was no novelty of principle in the project; it was only the old one of anticipating distant resources by throwing the burden of the existing generation on the next. It had the further disadvantage of incurring an useless expense for management; whereas the sinking-fund, amounting at the time to about five millions, might have been applied to existing exigencies, and a real saving effected.

JUNE 11. CURRENCY QUESTION.—A question opened in the house of commons, on a motion of Mr. Western, which often subsequently occupied its attention. It referred to the effect on prices of Mr. Peel's act of 1819, for the resumption of cash-payments. According to the views of Mr. Western and Mr. Attwood, the value of money had been enormously increased by the resumption of payments in specie by the bank, and its necessary preliminary, a diminution of the circulation. Prices had in consequence fallen; rents, taxes, annuities, and all fixed payments become more onerous. They were opposed by Messrs. Huskisson, Peel, and Ricardo; and on the motion of the former a resolution was carried, by 194 to 30, "That this house will not alter the standard of gold or silver, in fineness, weight, or denomination."

19. Price of gold 77*s*. 6*d*. the ounce, being 4*d*. below the mint price, a circumstance which has not occurred since the year 1797, and was of rare occurrence previous to that period.

20. Bank of England lowered the rate of discount to 4 per cent., and extended the time of bills from 65 to 95 days.

Tonnage of ships, entering the port of Liverpool, has increased from 446,788 in 1812, to 892,902 in 1822.

The clerk of the insolvent court mentioned to a parliamentary committee a paper, in common circulation among debtors, containing instructions how to harass their creditors. By the process described a debtor, incurring an expense of 30*l*., may by the forms of law put his creditor to an expense of 314*l*.

By an order of the court of exchequer, the harsh and absurd process of issuing writs of aid is restricted.

25. Mr. Abercrombie moved for a committee of the house of commons to inquire into the conduct of the law-officers of the crown in Scotland, with respect to the public press. It seems the lord advocate, sir Walter Scott, and other ministerial partisans, had been instrumental in setting up certain scurrilous newspapers, that were made the vehicle of attacks on their political opponents. The exposure by Mr. Abercrombie drew from Messrs. Hope and Menzies, two of the parties implicated, letters of remonstrance, which were deemed by the house a breach of privilege, and they were summoned to the bar. They appeared there, but no ulterior proceedings followed, and the business was got rid of.

July 6. Royal guards at Madrid declared against the constitution, but, being attacked by the militia and citizens, were overpowered, and their instigators banished.

19. The innkeepers on the Dover road petitioned against the adoption of steam-navigation from London to Calais.

A charge of sodomy made against the hon. and rev. Percy Jocelyn, bishop of Clogher. Last night he was detected in the back-room of a public-house in St. Alban's-place, St. James's, in a situation with Moverly, a private soldier of the guards, which led to his instant apprehension and removal to the watch-house. There were seven witnesses to the fact. It seems, however, that the capital offence had not been completed; in consequence Mr. Dyer, the magistrate at Marlborough-street, accepted bail to the amount of 1000*l.* for the future appearance of the delinquent. Moverly was committed to take his trial; but some days after he too was bailed. The bail, of course, was forfeited, and the bishop degraded by the sentence of his ecclesiastical superior.

22. Proprietor of Blackwood's Magazine convicted of libels impugning the conduct and scholarship of professor Leslie; damages 100*l.*

24. Parliament appeared to-day in a novel character, that of the patron of literature. On the motion of the chancellor of the exchequer, 2000*l.* was voted towards the printing a complete edition of the ancient historians of the realm. This was the more necessary, as some of those in circulation were incorrect, and many remained in manuscript. It was seconded by sir James Mackintosh.

27. A soldier, who had received 300 lashes, was found by a coroner's jury, at York, to have been strangled to death.

29. Several English actors, attempting to perform the English drama at the Théâtre Porte St. Martin, at Paris, were hissed and treated in a very unhandsome manner by the Parisians; the police did not interfere, and the behaviour of the audience applauded by the French journals.

Aug. 6. END OF THE SESSION.—Parliament was this day prorogued by the king. Agriculture, finance, the currency, the pressure of taxes, and the improvement of the navigation-laws, had formed the chief topics of discussion. On the latter five acts were passed, the main purposes of which were to repeal obsolete commercial statutes—to relax in the strictness of the laws enacted for the encouragement of British shipping—and to afford to our colonies a more direct intercourse with foreigners.

The New Marriage Act had excited considerable interest. By the marriage act of 1754, all marriages of minors, celebrated without the consent of certain specified persons, are declared null. A bill passed the commons, giving validity to marriages which according to the existing law were null, and providing that the marriages of minors, celebrated without due notice, should not be void, merely voidable, and liable to be annulled only during the minority of the parties, at the suit of parents or guardians. The retrospective clause of this bill was the only part retained by the lords, who declared against the nullity of marriages. The New Act is said (Ann. Reg. lxi. 236) to have mainly originated in the marriage of the marquis of Donegal with Miss May, who was the natural daughter of a gentleman celebrated for assisting persons of fashion with loans of money. The brother of the marquis sought to set this marriage aside, to render the children illegitimate, and himself, should the marquis die without lawful issue, heir to his title and estates. In law the marriage was void, inasmuch as the provisions of lord Hardwicke's act had not been observed, but it was now protected by the retrospective clause of the new statute.

A parliamentary report of this session showed that there were 89 members of the house of commons, not including those who have naval or military commissions, who hold offices or pensions, either in possession or reversion, to the amount of 170,343*l.* The members holding naval and military commissions were 79.

10. The king embarked at Greenwich for Scotland, and on the 15th landed at Leith. His majesty passed the night of the 18th at Dalkeith, as a guest of the duke of Buccleugh, and next day held a leaves in the ancient palace of Holyrood. He wore the highland costume. After a variety of festivities, a procession to Holyrood-house, a review, and dining with the corporation, the king re-embarked at Queensferry on the 27th, and on the 30th arrived in the Thames.

12. DEATH OF THE MARQUIS OF LONDON-DERRY.—The foreign secretary was in his 54th year, and had for some time been the leading member of government, in the house of commons. Either from the pressure of his public duties, or other cause, he had previously exhibited symptoms of insanity, which terminated in suicide, by cutting the carotid artery, at his seat, North Cray, in Kent. He was unpopular, but esteemed in private life for a gracious and gentlemanly bearing. The cruel and corrupt part he had acted or tolerated in Ireland in the suppression of the rebellion, and in effecting the union, always weighed upon his reputation, which was not redeemed by his subsequent official life in England. The tenor of his foreign policy, in which the interests of kings, not of their subjects, were chiefly considered, and his proneness to arbitrary measures at home, proved him an unfit minister for a constitutional monarchy. He was reputed a successful negotiator, and was honoured with the public thanks of parliament for his services in effecting the "settlement of Europe" at the general peace. Except in diplomacy his abilities were ordinary; attentive and pains-taking, but without invention or varied knowledge, and his oratory, though occasionally effective, was generally either in the extreme of feebleness, or turgid and incorrect. The populace evinced their dislike of the marquis at his funeral, by raising an exulting shout when his coffin was conveyed into Westminster Abbey, to be deposited between the remains of Fox and Pitt.

Sept. The commander-in-chief orders that the records of the services of each regiment in the British service shall be prepared, and deposited in the office of the adjutant-general.

11. Day-patrols established in London.

12. Revolution in Brazil. Pedro, son of the reigning king of Portugal, and who had been left viceroy of the province in the absence of his father, was installed on the 12th inst. emperor of Brazil. It terminated the American sovereignty of Portugal. The Portuguese troops in Brazil who were opposed to separation from the mother-country, were shipped off to Portugal.

consisted of 202 volumes, printed before the year 1500; 1000 folios, 4500 quartos, and 8000 octavos, together with 50,000 controversial tracts, and 688 MSS., mostly relating to Danish history, purchased by Mr. Nestler, bookseller, of Hamburg, for about 600*l*.

Dec. 14. Riot at the Dublin theatre, by the Orange party, on the marquis Wellesley going to the play, when a bottle and other missiles were thrown at the vice-regal box. Not more than thirty persons were engaged in this disgraceful tumult.

15. CONGRESS at VERONA.—The proceedings of the sovereigns did not terminate till the middle of this month, and had been carried on with great secrecy. Their general principle is not to tolerate any change in the European governments, least of all such as do not emanate from themselves. In a circular, dated the 14th inst., the insurrection of the Greeks is considered a rebellion against the legitimate Turkish empire. Upon the subject of Spain there was a difference of opinion. M. de Montmorency, the ultra-minister of France, represented the actual government of Spain as inconsistent with the safety of monarchical power; and called upon the sovereigns to re-establish the despotism of Ferdinand. To this policy Russia was decidedly inclined; Austria and Prussia were less resolute for violent measures, though strongly opposed to the proceedings of the cortes; England advocated peace, and denied the right of foreign powers to interfere in the affairs of the Peninsula. (Ann. Reg., lxiv, 218.) Meanwhile France had exhibited strong indications of warlike purposes: Chateaubriand, and other ultras had for some time been fomenting conspiracies in Spain, and secretly furnishing with arms and ammunition the priest-ridden insurgents against the constitutionalists. An army, which during the previous year had been assembled on the frontier, under the pretext of preventing the fever at Barcelona from spreading into France, changed its name from that of a Sanitary Cordon to an army of observation. A note of M. de Villele, the new French prime minister, of the 27th, removed all doubt as to the designs of his government; it was to the effect that unless Spain altered her political constitution, France would use force to convert her from her revolutionary theories.

21. A society formed in London for prosecuting fraudulent debtors.

The subscriptions raised in Britain for the relief of the distressed Irish amount to 350,000*l*; by grant from parliament, 300,000*l*; by local subscriptions in Ireland, 150,000*l*; making a total of 800,000*l*.

FOREIGN LOANS.—A remarkable feature of the present year was the extent to which speculation in foreign securities was carried, and the variations in their value. Besides a multitude of European loans—Russian, Prussian, Spanish, Danish, Neapolitan—some of the new states of South America came into the money-market. The government of Chili raised a loan of a million sterling; that of Peru one of two millions. These were readily contracted for, and soon rose to a high premium. An adventurer, named Gregor Macgregor, who, though a British subject, chose to assume the title of cacique, or king of Poyais, found persons credulous enough to engage to advance 200,000*l* to his nominal kingdom, on the faith of its imaginary revenues. The low rate of interest, and facility with which money could be obtained, fostered the wild spirit of speculation. Many of the bankers and capitalists made advances on the scrip of the new loans, which augmented the amount of unemployed capital, and the means for further transactions. In November there began to be signs of reaction. A mystery hung over the proceedings of the congress at Verona; the French threatened to invade Spain, and doubts were thrown on the validity of M. Zea's contract for the Columbian loan. A panic ensued: the prices of all foreign securities fell rapidly, and thousands were ruined or impoverished.

SCIENCE AND ARTS.—Mr. Charles Babbage announced that he had invented various machines by which some of the more complicated processes of arithmetical calculation may be performed with certainty and dispatch.

Sir H. Davy's experiments on the papyrus of Herculaneum closed without producing any marked result. Iodine and chlorine separated the rolls, without injuring the ink, which is of charcoal, on which these agents have no action; but the papyrus itself, containing much undecomposed vegetable matter, baffled the investigation. In general the writing is only on one side; MSS. are rolled round sticks, like the webs of silk-mercers.

M. Humboldt estimated the number of the known species of plants at 56,000, and those of animals at 51,700.

France ascertained to contain 25 libraries, containing 1,700,000 volumes; 613 printing-offices; 1025 booksellers, and 192 paper-merchants.

The French exhibition of paintings this year contained 1715 articles; namely, 1372 paintings of all sizes, landscapes, portraits, &c.; 158 statues, busts, and bas-reliefs; 171 engravings and designs; 14 plans and architectural models.

A.D. 1823. RETURNING PROSPERITY.—

The country at the beginning, and through the whole of this year, exhibited unequivocal marks of a steady and progressive prosperity. Every branch of manufacturing industry was in a flourishing state. The cotton-trade was unusually brisk; there was a considerable increase in the quantity of silks and woollen-cloths manufactured; and in consequence of augmenting exportation the demand for hardware and cutlery was reviving from the state of stagnation in which it had been in since the conclusion of the war. The shipping interest, which had experienced more than a proportional share of the late depression, participated in the general improvement. The agriculturists still complained of their embarrassments; and in January no less than 16 counties had sent requisitions to their sheriffs to call meetings, to consider the causes of their distresses. At these meetings the remedies chiefly suggested were a remission of taxes, a reform of the house of commons, a depreciation of the currency, a commutation of tithe, and an appropriation of the redundant wealth of the church to the public exigencies. The landed interest, however, before the end of summer, began to share in the benefits resulting from prosperous commerce and manufactures, and their political agitation subsided.

Jan. 1. A room opened, in Capel-court for transacting business in foreign securities, which had been previously conducted on the royal exchange.

3. A meeting at Norwich, on the subject of agricultural distress. A series of resolutions were proposed by Mr. Thurtell and seconded by Mr. Coke, but they were promptly rejected, and a petition, proposed by Mr. Cobbett, was adopted with rapturous acclamations. It recommended an appropriation of part of the church property to the payment of the public debt; a reduction of the standing army; an abolition of sinecures and undeserved pensions; the sale of the crown lands; an equitable adjustment of contracts; the suspension of all legal process, for one year, for the recovery of rent and tithes; and the repeal of the taxes on malt, soap, leather, hops, and candles. A counter-petition was got up by the whigs, and when the two petitions came to be presented to the house of commons, Mr. James was the only member who expressed approbation of the Norwich doctrines of spoliation.

5. Russia, Austria, and Prussia recall their ambassadors from Madrid.

12. The Quakers start a subscription for the relief of the Greeks.

17. A county meeting at Hereford, and Mr. Cobbett's Norfolk petition rejected.

22. Great meeting for parliamentary reform at York: the requisition had been signed by 2000 freeholders.

27. Died, at his house in Bedford-row, in his 86th year, CHARLES HUTTON, LL.D., late professor of mathematics in the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich; a votary of science, who rose to eminence by his own spontaneous exertions. Dr. Hutton was a native of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, where he had been a schoolmaster, and, during a paroxysm of enthusiasm, a preacher among the methodists. Among his scholars was John Scott, the future lord chancellor. As a proof how little Dr. Hutton's abilities were impaired, either by his literary labours or advanced age, it may be mentioned that, within the last two years of his life, he corrected the intricate computation of Cavendish on the mean density of the earth, and drew up a paper relative to the most appropriate curve for the arches of the projected New London Bridge.

28. Louis XVIII., in his speech to the two chambers, announced the intention of sending 100,000 men into Spain, to put down the constitutional system. "Let Ferdinand VII.," said the king, "be free to give to his people institutions which they cannot hold but from him, and which, by securing their tranquillity, would dissipate the just inquietude of France."

31. Mr. Vansittart, who had made an indifferent chancellor of the exchequer, exchanged that office for the less toilsome one of chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, and was raised to the peerage, by the title of Lord Bexley: he was succeeded by Mr. Robinson. Mr. Huskisson was made president of the board of trade; and, in his stead, Mr. Arbuthnot became first commissioner of the land revenues. These changes were popular, especially among the favourers of free-trade.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—A statement appeared of the votes given for and against ministers on the great questions during the past session of parliament. The results were as follows:—

	For.	Against.
40 counties of England,	25	37
59 cities and boroughs, open election	59	107
99 close cities and boroughs	151	12
33 counties, and 66 burghs of Scotland	25	11
32 counties of Ireland	24	14
33 cities and boroughs of Ireland	21	7

Feb. 4. PARLIAMENT opened by commission, the king's illness preventing his attendance. The chief topics of the speech were the improvement of the revenue, and the facilities it would afford for a further remission of taxes. His majesty had deprecated foreign interference in the affairs of Spain; the continued depression of agriculture was lamented; but the prosperity of manufactures and commerce was dwelt on with satisfaction. The addresses passed without much remark, further than an attack on funded property by lord Stanhope, and a forcible denunciation by lord Lansdowne, in the upper, and Mr. Brougham, in the lower house, of the meddling doctrines of the holy alliance.

5. Mrs. Wright, who had been convicted of an irreligious libel, and imprisoned, was brought into the King's-bench to receive further punishment for having, in her defence, persisted to state matters which the court deemed offensive. She was sentenced to be imprisoned in Cold-bath-fields for eighteen months, to pay a fine of 100*l.*, and find security for good behaviour for five years.

13. A meeting of 250 solicitors of the metropolis, to consider of the propriety of securing justice to their clients, by employing only such gentlemen of the chancery bar as had leisure efficiently to attend to the legal business placed in their hands.

27. Meeting at the Mansion-house, to consider the claims of the London clergy to 2*s.* 9*d.* in the pound on the net rental, in lieu of tithes, oblations, &c.

28. An investigation into the state of lord Portsmouth's mind, which occupied seventeen days, terminated; when the jury unanimously pronounced him to be of unsound mind, and incapable of having managed his affairs since 1809.

Duel between the Neapolitan generals, Pepe and Carascosa, near Kew-bridge. They fought with swords: Pepe disabled his opponent by a thrust in the right shoulder.

Mar. 3. M. Manuel suspended for one session from his seat in the chamber of deputies, for language offensive to the ultra-loyalists. Next day he took his place as usual, when a piquet of the national guard refusing to eject him, the gendarmerie were called in, who forced him out. Lafitte, Foy, and other liberal members, to the number of 170, withdrew from the chamber for the remainder of the session, and the supplies for the Spanish war were voted by the supporters of Villele.

4. Mr. Hume moved for a committee to inquire into the state of church property in Ireland. He embodied his views in four resolutions, one of them affirming that the property of the bishops and chapters is public property, subject to the disposition of the legislature, regard being had to existing interests. They were sharply opposed by Mr. Peel and Mr. Plunkett, and negatived without a division.

It appears from an account published by parliament, that six individuals, since the year 1809, have bequeathed sums for the payment of the national debt to the amount of 66,626*l.*

7. A splendid entertainment given at the London-tavern to the Spanish and Portuguese ambassadors, lord William Bentinck in the chair.

14. Died, at Turville-park, near Henley-upon-Thames, in his 85th year, general

DUMOURIER, a name that fills some interesting pages of modern history. He was born of noble though not affluent parents, and was classically educated. His life was one of great vicissitude. He entered the army at 18, and made his first campaign against the same duke of Brunswick whom, in 1792, he drove from the French territory. Unable to guide the revolution, he resorted to the questionable expedient of calling in the aid of foreigners to oppose the republicans, and re-establish the monarchy. Failing in this enterprise, he became an exile, chiefly in England, where he lived on terms of intimacy with many of our nobility, and was an especial favourite of the late duke of Kent. Dumourier was a man of spirit, of quick parts, a warm, frank, and generous nature. His conversation was animated, and, having seen much of the world, diversified with a variety of knowledge, and great discrimination of character.

20. Bank reduced its half-yearly dividend from five to four per cent. The effect on bank stock was excessive; it fell from 236 to 210.

24. Dr. Wollaston elected an associate of the French institute, in the room of the late Dr. Jenner. Out of nine men proposed by the institute for election, from all the learned and talented men in the world, five were Englishmen.

April 2. Duke of Angoulême, commander of the French army of the Pyrenees, published an address to the Spaniards, setting forth the motives of the invasion of the Peninsula to be, the suppression of the revolutionary faction which held the king captive, that excited troubles in France, and produced an insurrection in Naples and Piedmont. On the 7th the French crossed the Bidassoa, previously to which Ferdinand and the cortes removed from Madrid to Seville.

4. Eliza and Bryant and her daughters were tried at the assizes at Taunton, before Mr. Justice Burroughs, for a violent assault on Anne Burgess, a reputed witch. It appeared that the defendants, on a presumption that the prosecutrix had bewitched a child of the elder Bryant, seized her, and inflicted several severe wounds upon her, upon a supposition that drawing blood from the witch would end the charm: this they did under the advice of a pretended conjuror named Baker. The jury found them all guilty, and they were sentenced to four months' imprisonment each.

16. Measures adopted for the suppression of West-end fair and Brook-green fair, owing to the atrocities committed there.

17. PARLIAMENTARY ALTERATION.—The question of the catholic claims being about to be introduced, sir F. Burdett expressed his determination of withdrawing from the house of commons, pending the "farce of its annual discussion," and accused Mr. Secretary Canning, who wished the subject to be postponed, of compromising his opinion for sake of office. Mr. G. Bennett questioned the consistency of Mr. Plunkett no less than of Mr. Canning. Mr. Brougham followed up the attack with great vehemence. In a climax of bitter invective he accused Mr. Canning "of being doomed to the disquiet of a divided cabinet—of sitting with his enemies, and pitied by his friends—of succumbing to lord Eldon, and exhibiting the most incredible specimen of monstrous truckling for the purpose of retaining office that the whole history of political tergiversation could furnish."—Here he was interrupted by Mr. Canning rising, in evident warmth, to say, "that is false." A pause ensued, the speaker interfered, and by the dexterity of sir R. Wilson an assurance was obtained that the affair should not be prosecuted out of doors.

24. A mass of papers, including the correspondence with foreign courts relative to Spain, having been laid before parliament, the grand debate on our foreign policy began in the lords. The same subject was taken up in the commons, on the 28th, and was agitated for three successive nights. The general impression seemed to be that ministers had been deficient in energy,—had leaned more to the policy of the confederated despots than the interests of the Spanish patriots; and that if they had seriously felt any indignation against French aggression, it was more from apprehension of danger to the Bourbon government than the Spanish constitution. An amendment in favour of ministers, was carried, so little laudatory of their conduct, that the opposition, on the suggestion of Mr. Brougham, voted in its favour.

26. Newcastle Courant had advertisements announcing 82 ~~lands~~, containing 20,000 acres, to let.

The length of streets already lighted with gas in the metropolis is 215 miles.

Cabriolets for two persons began to be used in London.

May 2. Mr. Peel's currency bill of 1819 came into operation; it had no effect, as the bank, having got a sufficient store of gold, had anticipated the period of commencing specie-payments by two years.

15. Numerous meeting of the friends to the Greek cause, at the Crown and Anchor, Lord Milton in the chair. Animated speeches were made by sir James Mackintosh, lord J. Russell, Mr. Hobhouse, archdeacon Bathurst, &c. The duke of Bedford and Mr. Hunt subscribed 100*l.* each.

16. House of commons passed unanimously a resolution to the effect that it is expedient to adopt measures for ameliorating the condition of the slave-population of the colonies, with a view to their entire emancipation and admission to an equality of civil rights with the rest of the king's subjects. This first and important declaration in favour of the freedom of the African race, was followed up by a circular from lord Bathurst, dated the 28th, to the governors of the West India Islands, containing various suggestions for bettering the condition of the negroes.

24. The French entered Madrid.

30. Rebuilding of London-bridge determined on by the court of common council. The estimated expence 300,000*l.*; inclusive of the approaches, 700,000*l.*

June 1. Some quarries of white and green marble have been discovered in the west of Ireland; the first is said to be superior for sculpture to Italian marble.

EXHUMATION. — David Morrison sentenced to seven years' banishment by the Scotch court of judicatory, for violating sepulchres. On his trial Mr. Barclay, a teacher of anatomy, deposed that some bodies became decomposed in a few days, others lasted much longer; in some the features could not be known in 48 hours, while in others they might be recognised for a week; but much depended on the previous illness. In three weeks a subject becomes unfit for the purposes of dissection. In two weeks the outer skin comes off; with it the nails and the hair would be loose, but marks on the body might be identified. Relatives frequently mistaken in the bodies they claimed; and one instance he knew where a body, made of leather, was insisted on as being the one they were in search of.

2. A counter-revolution effected at Lisbon by the military, headed by don Miguel, second son of the king, who is re-established in absolute power. The cortes separated, having previously drawn up a protest against any change in the constitution of the year 1822.

11. A bill passed a third reading in the house of commons, by a majority of eight, for repealing the regulations by which magistrates are empowered to fix the wages of the Spitalfields silk-weavers. The masters were in favour of the repeal, the journeymen against it. Owing to the opposition of the lord-chancellor, the bill was lost for the session, though supported by the earl of Liverpool.

18. Meeting at the London-tavern, in favour of Spanish independence; Mr.

Lambton subscribed 1000*l.*, and sir F. Burdett 500*l.*. The common council of London voted 1000*l.* for the same cause, and 1000*l.* to aid the Greeks.

25. A horrid tragedy occurred in London. A dissolute student of law, named Abel Griffiths, being reproved by his father, who refused further supplies, the former seized a brace of loaded pistols, and first shooting his parent, then shot himself. The parricide was buried in the cross-road, and was the last so interred, the act altering the mode of interment of suicides receiving the royal assent in the ensuing month.

July 4. A petition presented to the house of lords, signed by 200 ministers and 2000 persons, against the prosecution of writings against the Christian religion.

It appears that property in the West Indies, within the last three years, has fallen one-half or one-third in value.

19. Parliament prorogued by commission. The flourishing condition of all branches of commerce and manufactures, and the great abatement in the difficulties of the agriculturists, were dwelt upon in the royal speech. During the session 269 bills received the royal assent, 96 being public and 173 private. 1760 petitions were presented to the house of commons, and 20 select committees were appointed.

28. Several requests held at the penitentiary, Milbank; 400 persons taken into the infirmary. A too rigid discipline in respect of diet and confinement the assigned causes.

Aug. 3. S. Horrocks, M. P. for Preston, nearly assassinated with a cleaver, by a lunatic and discontented cotton-spinner.

8. Daring burglary at Lambeth-palace; the thieves were disappointed of their prey, as the archbishop, before leaving town, had sent eight chests of plate to his silversmith's for security. The same gang attempted Lambeth-church adjoining, on the 10th, but here, too, they were disappointed, the church plate not being on the premises.

Died, in his 83rd year, Pius VII., a mild and christian character, who had governed the Roman catholic church upwards of 23 years. His holiness always dispensed with the ceremony of kissing the great toe when an Englishman was presented to him; it was commuted into a cordial and affectionate embrace.

28. Meeting of bankers and merchants to consider the practicability of forming a chamber of commerce in London.

31. The French surprise and carry the Trocadero, a small island in the harbour of Cadiz.

Sept. 9. Sale of the splendid furniture and rarities of Mr. Beckford, at Fonthill-abbey, began and lasted eleven days.

11. DEATH OF DAVID RICARDO, M. P.—This gentleman was in his 52d year, and died of inflammation of the brain, arising from an abscess in the ear. He had recently acquired celebrity as a writer and speaker on subjects of political economy, and was much esteemed for his conciliatory manners. His father was a Dutch merchant and stockbroker, and young Ricardo was educated in Holland, though born in London, for the same pursuits. Displeasing his parent, who was a Jew, by an early marriage with a quakeress, he was left very much to his own resources: his probity and industry, however, obtained him assistance among his father's connexions, and he became a member of the stock exchange. Here his mathematical turn, shrewdness, and intelligence, found appropriate exercise, and he rapidly accumulated immense wealth. As a member of parliament Mr. Ricardo's course was independent, and on questions of currency, finance, and commerce, he was listened to with deference by all parties. By his clear and comprehensive reasonings he helped to confirm in the legislature those liberal ideas of mercantile policy that had been advocated by the leading whigs, and had been recently adopted by a portion of the ministry. His "Principles of Political Economy and Taxation" were highly applauded on their first appearance, as containing a new revelation of economical truths; but subsequently an opinion began to prevail that the author, by a logic too abstract, had been led into some fallacies concerning rent, tithe, wages, and profits, and that Adam Smith's antecedent exposition of those topics was substantially unassailable.

12. London-bridge committee determine to build the new bridge on a new site, but as near as possible to the old one, which will be left standing till the new bridge is finished.

19. A proclamation, giving currency to double sovereigns or two-pound pieces.

Oct. 3. INVASION OF SPAIN.—The surrender, after a short resistance on the 3rd, of Cadiz, the "cradle," as it was considered, of liberty, terminated with a sort of iniquitous eclat the interference of the French in the affairs of Spain. In five months, without meeting any resistance of consequence, they had overrun the country from the Pyrenees to the Straits of Gibraltar. Their progress was facilitated by the treachery of the Spanish generals—Abisbal, Morillo, and Ballasteros; Mina was almost the only chief who was true to the patriot cause, and who, after receiving an amnesty for his followers, retired into England. The cortes, who had carried along with them, much against his inclination, Ferdinand, from Madrid to Cadiz, liberated him on the 1st instant; when he forthwith issued a proclamation, annulling all the acts of the constitutional government from March, 1820. The proceedings of the cortes had not been free from faults; they had evinced a want of energy, of practical ideas, and unanimity; while on the other hand they had had great difficulties to contend against in the ignorance of the peasantry, and their bondage to the priesthood, and the treacherous intrigues of the French ultras. Only part of the French army evacuated the Peninsula in the course of the year; 40,000 men retaining possession of the fortresses, to guard against reaction.

29. Captain Parry arrived off Shetland, from his exploratory voyage to the Polar regions. He had failed in the chief object of the expedition; and, owing to the unhappy selection of his course, did not proceed so far west, by twenty, nor north by ten degrees, as on his former voyage. Only five men were lost by illness and accidents during the voyage.

The three grand musical festivals, held within the month at Birmingham, York, and Gloucester, produced the large sum of 30,500*l*.

Nov. 7. Riego, the Spanish constitutional general, hung on a gibbet of extraordinary height at Madrid. He met death with firmness, but ascended the ladder with difficulty, in consequence of the swelling of his legs, owing to the fetters he had worn since his arrest.

17. Convention signed at Vienna for the settlement of the Austrian loan, by which the emperor agreed to pay 2,500,000*l*. in satisfaction of the whole British claims.

DEATH OF THOMAS LORD ERSKINE.—This accomplished advocate died on the 17th, in Scotland, where he was born in 1750. He was the third and youngest son of the tenth earl of Buchan, and was educated at Edinburgh. The poverty of his family rendering a profession necessary, he tried first the navy then the army, and did not enter on his legal studies till his twenty-sixth year. His success at the bar was immediate, and without probation: he was soon in possession of the best second business in the court of king's bench, that is of the business in which the lead is not given to counsel who are not yet arrived at the dignity of a silk-gown. This distinction he obtained in 1783, five years after being called to the bar. Special retainers now poured in upon him; he had soon sixty-six of these off his circuit, each endorsed with a fee of 300 guineas. (Life of Witherforce, ii. 164.) He was in all the great legal causes of the time—of Carnan, the bookseller, admiral Keppel, Warren Hastings, the dean of St. Asaph, and the state trials of 1794. Erskine was by nature an orator; ready, acute, bold, imaginative, with varied powers of elocution; a melodious voice and fine person, combined with manners singularly bland, courteous, and respectful. His eloquence, however, was of a kind that is now rarely heard at the English bar, and perhaps is not the most appropriate to a court of justice; consisting in its leading characteristics of fanciful allusions, sentimental appeals, exclamations, and profusion of ornament. He was a strenuous vindicator of the constitutional rights of juries; and it was to them, rather than the intelligence on the bench, his most successful forensic efforts were addressed. As a senator his abilities and knowledge were secondary; nor did he acquire enduring celebrity as a political writer. He was the author, however, of a pamphlet on the French war of 1795, to which he was strenuously opposed, that speedily ran through forty-eight editions, owing probably to his great professional repute. The time lord Erskine held the great seal was too brief to afford a conclusive test of judicial ability. His public career terminated with the Grenville ministry. Cut off from the emoluments of the bar by the etiquette of a peerage, and with a pension barely adequate to its support, the rest of his life was "bound in storms and shallows,"—wasted in saloons and soirées, in garrulous vanity, and abortive aspirations to literary distinction.

Dec. 27. Plymouth dock having greatly increased in size, is, at the desire of the inhabitants, called "Devonport," and an order to that effect appeared in The Gazette.

In the course of this year several streets in London were broken up and re-paved with granite, broken in small angular pieces, according to the suggestion of Mr. M'Adam.

The king presented to the nation the library of George III. at Buckingham-house, consisting of 120,000 volumes.

The society of arts presented Mr. Cobbett with a large silver medal, for the discovery of a plat from English grapes, which it was thought would supersede the worm.

Mr. Bradley has shown that a pair of sparrows, during the time they have their young to feed, destroy on an average every week 3360 caterpillars.

Joseph Nollekins, R.A., 86, an eminent sculptor, who by habits of strict parsimony amassed 300,000*l.* At Paris, colonel Thornton, 60, a celebrated sportsman of Yorkshire. Sylvester Douglas lord Glenbervie, 80, an Irish peer, well known in official life, and translator of the first cantos of "Ricciardetto," with notes. At Erthington, R. Bowman, 118, a husband-man, who did not marry till he was 50, and then had six sons but no daughters. Wm. Coombe, 83, author of "Tour of Dr. Syntax," &c. John Hope earl of Hope-toun, a distinguished commander in the war of the Peninsula. Robert Bloomfield, 57, author of the "Farmer's Boy," &c. Matthew Baillie, M.D., 63, physician to the late king, and eminent medical writer. At Gato, on his way to Timbuctoo, Belzoni, the enterprising traveller: he was a native of Padua, and well known in London by his stature, which was above six feet and a half. At Magdeburg, a voluntary exile, since the restoration of the Bourbons, M. Carnot, one of the most honest and able of the French republicans. At Rochetts, near Brentford, John Jervis earl St. Vincent, 89, admiral of the fleet, whose fame is identified with the naval victory of February 14, 1797.

A.D. 1824. PROSPERITY AND SPECULATION.—The present period may be aptly compared to the year 1768, when internal peace, unexampled prosperity, and the rank and influence of the nation abroad formed the exulting theme of contemporary writers and future historians. The public hemisphere appeared without cloud, and it was impossible but to look forward to successive years of augmented glory, increasing opulence, and unrivalled domestic improvements. Even country gentlemen had ceased to complain, and agriculture, by a rise in the price of wheat of full 30 per cent. since 1822, had entirely recovered from the previous depression. This improvement was effected without legislative expedients, which at best could only have afforded temporary relief, by the sacrifice of other interests of the community. The improvement of the landed interest was the natural consequence of the general improvement in the condition of other classes. While the cultivators of the soil enjoyed a comparative monopoly of the home-market, it was impossible but thriving manufactures, increasing population, and a growing foreign trade, should relieve them from embarrassments. Such was the natural remedy of the agricultural distresses; it resulted from an augmented power of consumption in the people, that enabled them not only to consume more, but to give a higher price for the produce of the soil. A diminution in public burdens also contributed to the relief of the farmers, and the diffusion of general comfort and prosperity. Twenty millions of taxes had been repealed since the peace, which augmented the incomes of individuals, and the means of industrial activity. Public prosperity was evidenced in the abundance of capital, and consequent low rate of interest. The bank of England reduced the rate of interest on advances, and other great companies followed the example. In the course of the year interest in the money-market had fallen one-half, which induced capitalists to seek foreign investments. There was scarcely a state in the Old or the New World to which loans were not advanced by this country; in France, Spain, Portugal, and South America, hardly a ship or soldier was put in motion, or a mining adventure entered upon, without the aid of English capital. At home a gambling spirit of speculation arose under the pretext of schemes for the employment of money. Every morning gave birth to one or more new projects. Table-beer, ale, and milk-companies; steam-navigation, banking, and insurance companies of various kinds; washing, baking, and new dock companies were a few of the endless varieties under which new and highly-promising speculations were constantly issuing. Many devices afloat were so obviously intended to entrap the unwary, that the legislature interfered to guard the public against their unprincipled contrivers. A resolution passed the house of lords declaring that no bill for the purpose of incorporating any joint-stock company would be read a second time till two-thirds of the proposed capital of the company had been actually subscribed. This checked gambling in the share-market. Amongst the various projects started some useful bodies were incorporated, of which the plan embraced public works of utility, but they formed a small proportion to the mass of delusive or fraudulent devices, in which a vast amount of real and efficient capital was lost or locked up in inconvertible enterprises, yielding little or precarious, and distant returns of profit.

Jan. 1. Austrian loan of 2,500,000*l.* brought into the market. The price at which subscribers receive their shares is 82 per cent., to be paid in five instalments.

Iturbide, ex-emperor of Mexico, arrived in England. About six months after he returned to South America, leaving his children in this country, but was arrested at Soto la Morina, and shot, which terminated his rash attempt to recover his throne.

Alexander of Russia has testified his approval of the invasion of Spain, by transmitting the grand cross of the order of St. Andrew to Chauteaubriand, the ultra foreign minister, and strenuous adviser of that enterprise, omitting Villele, president of the council.

5. TRIAL OF THURTELL AND HUNT.—

The trial of these men, at Hertford, for the murder of William Weare, excited great interest, owing to its perfidious and ruffian circumstances. Mr. Weare was a gambler, and connected by similarity of pursuit with Thurtell, Hunt, and Probert. Hunt was a public-singer, and had kept a tavern; Probert had been a wine-merchant; John Thurtell was the son of a respectable alderman of Norwich, and had recently been before the public as witness in an action brought by his brother against an insurance-office for the recovery of the loss he had sustained by the burning of his silk-warehouse. The murder was perpetrated on the 24th of last October, in Gills-lane, two or three miles from Elstree. On that day Thurtell had invited Weare down to Probert's cottage, to take the diversion of shooting, on their way thither, in a gig, Thurtell, in a solitary part of the lane, drew out a pistol and fired in the face of his unsuspecting companion, which failing of its purpose, Weare leaped out of the chaise, and was followed by Thurtell, who notwithstanding his cries for mercy despatched him by thrusting the barrel of the pistol into his head, and turning it round in his brain. Probert and Hunt were privy to the intended murder, and shared some of the plunder of the unfortunate man at the cottage of Probert, where they all met after the murder: in the course of the night they went into the lane, put the body of Weare in a sack, and flung it into a pond. The first day of the trial was almost entirely spent in hearing evidence, when the court adjourned till the next, at the request of Thurtell, who then began his defence. It was delivered in theatrical style, was every bombastic, stuffed with false sentiment, and concluded with a solemn asseveration of innocence. Hunt's defence was read for him, and his feebleness formed a strong contrast with the unabashed demeanour of his accomplice. The jury found both guilty. Thurtell between sentence and execution admitted that justice had been done to him; he met death with the same hardihood he had committed the murder. Hunt's punishment was commuted for transportation for life, on the ground of some promise held out to him by the committing magistrate; Probert was admitted king's evidence, and escaped for this time.

8. At a prize-fight for 600 guineas, between Spring and Langan, on the Worcester race-course, at which 40,000 people are supposed to have been present, a scaffold gave way, by which one person was killed and several were wounded.

9. Will of lord Erskine registered in the prerogative court; the personality sworn under 1000*l*.

16. The arduous operation of removing the thigh at the hip-joint performed at Guy's hospital, for the first time, by sir Astley Cooper, in the presence of some of the surgeons and students of the institution. The limb was removed in the space of 20 minutes, the securing the arteries and dressing occupied 15 more; the whole was completed in 35 minutes. During the operation the patient was extremely faint; but some wine being given him, and fresh air admitted, he recovered.

24. A Latin MS. by Milton discovered in the state-paper office. The subject is religious, and fills 735 pages, many of them closely written, and believed to be in the hand-writing of the poet's nephew, Phillips, with interlineations in a different hand. The situation which Milton held of Latin secretary to Cromwell accounts for such discovery in the state-paper office.

Feb. 1. Died, in his 75th year, at Cheltenham, the reverend sir HENRY BATE DUDLEY, prebendary of Ely, and magistrate for four counties in Ireland, and seven in England. This gentleman established the Morning Post and the Morning Herald, the latter in 1760, the former a few years previously. He was one of the most original and enterprising spirits of his time, and the associate of Garrick, Colman, Bonnet Thornton, Cumberland, and other wits, and himself the author of several theatrical pieces. As a table companion he had few equals; even the judges sometimes lost their gravity at his sallies, which were rarely offensive. About fifty years ago he obtained much notoriety by his duels with Mr. Bower, the husband of the countess of Strathmore, and captain Story. (See Jan. 13, 1776.) It is a singular fact that one of the ladies about whom parson Bate, as he was called, quarrelled, was the beautiful Mrs. Hartley, an actress, who died at Woolwich the same day with himself. We know no similar coincidence, except in the deaths of two very dissimilar characters, namely, of the two American presidents.

3. Parliament opened by commission, owing to the king's indisposition. The royal speech was highly congratulatory on the general prosperity and the order prevalent among all classes of the community. The appointment of consuls to the new states of South America was admitted, and the subject of the slave-population in the West Indies adverted to in guarded terms. Addresses passed in both houses unanimously.

4. A convention between Britain and Austria laid upon the table of the house of commons, by which the former agreed to accept 2,500,000*l*. as a final compensation for claims on the latter power, amounting to 30,000,000*l*.

A subterranean labyrinth discovered near St. Giles's-gate, Norwich, containing marine shells.

5. Mr. Wilberforce, after being elected six times for the county of York, and nearly 40 years its popular representative, retired from parliament. The care of his "black clients," as George III. used to term them, and whom he had long faithfully served without fee, he consigned to Fowell Buxton, M.P.

6. Missionary John Smith died in the gaol of Demerara, where he was waiting the decision of the British ministry on his sentence of death for high treason, in exciting the negroes to rebellion. The royal pardon arrived while the unfortunate man was in the agonies of death.

10. From the quarterly return of the coroner of Manchester, it appeared that out of the numerous cases of death 29 had been owing to intemperance, and 26 to drowning, caused by the effects of intoxication.

Samples of wheat, for which this time last year only 3*s*. per quarter were offered, were sold at Canterbury-market at 80*s*. per quarter.

20. Prospectus of a loan of 800,000*l*. for the aid of the Greeks brought out under the sanction of the Greek committee.

A musical phenomenon appeared in the person of George Aspull, a child only eight years old, who performed the most difficult pieces of Kalbrenner, Moscheles, and Czerny, with great ease and appropriate execution. He likewise sings ballads to his own accompaniment on the piano, in a voice weak, owing to his youth, but with peculiar taste and delicate expression.

22. A bill brought forward by Mr. Peel settles the point that prisoners cannot be compelled to labour on the tread-wheel, before trial and conviction.

23. Mr. Robinson brings forward the annual budget, portraying in glowing terms the general prosperity, and pointedly reprobating the notion of the inability of an unreformed parliament to redeem the country from its difficulties. He announced his intention of reducing the interest of the four per cent. stock to three and a half per cent., by which a saving of 375,000*l.* a-year would be effected to the public.

26. Fire at Pickford's wharf, occasioned by the bursting of a bottle of inflammable liquid, to which a light had been incautiously brought in contact. Damages estimated at 30,000*l.*

The flourishing state of Manchester is evidenced by the fact that 16,000*l.* has been subscribed towards the literary institution of that town.

March 2. Revolt of the pacha of Egypt, who had been dispatched by the Turkish government against the Greeks. Patras surrendered to the Greeks. The first number of a newspaper in modern Greek has arrived in England. The type was sent from this country, by the Greek committee.

36. Public meeting to erect a monument, by subscription, to Dibdin, the naval song-writer, who died in indigence.

38. SILK TRADE.—House of commons resolved, on the motion of Mr. Huskisson, to reduce the duties on the importation of raw silk, and that after July 5, 1826, the importation of manufactured silk goods should be allowed on the payment of a duty of 30 per cent. The substitution of a prohibitory duty for the absolute prohibition of foreign silk goods tended to the prosperity of the silk trade, though much opposed by the weavers. Prior to this change the trade had been subject to constant fluctuation, and in the absence of foreign competition no improvements had been introduced into the manufacture. It had been the most protected of any branch of industry, and had thriven the least. The reduction of duty on raw silk brought the manufactured article more within the reach of the poorer classes, and less subject to changes of fashion than when confined to the use of the rich. Employment in consequence, after the inconveniences of the transition state had been surmounted, became more uniform and less liable to sudden alternations of prosperity and distress.

9. An important document received from Mexico. It is a decree of the constitutional congress of Mexico, which declares that "the Mexican nation adopts for its government the forms of a representative federal republic."

According to an account presented to the house of commons, the average amount of public money in the hands of the bank of England last year was 5,526,635*l.* The profit of the bank, at 3 per cent. (the rate which government pays them for the loan of their capital of 15 millions), is therefore upwards of 165,799*l.* in its capacity of banker to the public departments.

10. The niece of lord Bathurst, while riding near the banks of the Tiber, at Rome, was suddenly thrown into the river by the falling of her horse, and drowned.

11. Public attention excited by the affair of Mr. Battier, late of the 10th hussars. It appears to be the practice of the officers of the 10th "to recruit among themselves," that is, to admit no stranger into the regiment except he be of their choosing. Mr. Battier, who had obtained a cornetcy from the duke of York, without having passed this ordeal, was in consequence sent to Coventry, and refused the acknowledgments usual among gentlemen. The result was that Mr. Battier was obliged to retire on half-pay, which he subsequently forfeited by sending a challenge to the marquis of Londonderry, colonel of the regiment.

15. An address to the king to acknowledge the independence of the South American states, was moved in the lords by the marquis of Lansdowne. It was a subject, he said, of the utmost importance, involving the interests of 21 millions of people, containing within themselves all the elements of future greatness and strength. Lord Liverpool concurred in the principles of the marquis, but differed as to the application of them. Address negatived by 95 to 34.

16. Mr. Canning brought forward the ministerial plan for bettering the condition of the slave-population. It consisted of an experimental attempt, limited to the island of Trinidad, and did not answer the expectations of Mr. Buxton, the leader of the emancipationists.

22. The collection of pictures of the late Mr. Angerstein, thirty-eight in number, purchased by government for 57,000*l.*, as the nucleus of a national gallery. Sir G. Beaumont liberally gave his pictures for the same purpose.

28. On this and the preceding Sunday a gentleman named Robert Taylor, formerly a minister of the established church, lectured in support of Deism, in a place lately used as a theatre, in Grafton-street, Dublin. He harangued the audience from a stage, dressed in canonicals. It passed off quietly the first time, but on the second exhibition he was compelled to retreat behind the scenes.

It is said that ten admirals have died every year during the last ten years. The dry-rot in the shipping, and mortality among naval commanders, forming alarming symptoms of decline in maritime power.

The standards of weights of foreign countries, which were lately transmitted to England by the British consuls, to be compared with our own, have been deposited at the mint, in the tower.

PARIS.—The annual average of rainy days in Paris is 184. The period of greatest mortality is March and April, of the least August and July. The greatest number of marriages take place in May, the smallest in March and January. Of every hundred works published in Paris, 68 relate to the belles lettres, history, or politics; 20 to the sciences and arts; and 12 to theology and jurisprudence.

April 1. On the appointment of lord Gifford to be master of the rolls, it has been stated there is no precedent of a peer filling that office; there is, however, a precedent for it in the person of lord Bruce, a Scotch peer, who came from Scotland with James I., and filled that office to the time of his death.

At Wexford assizes one of the jury could not agree with his brethren to a verdict of acquittal, when the following stratagem was resorted to. The dissentient wrote down "guilty," then retired, and his brother jurors added "not."

4. Will of Luke White proved, whereby he left 30,000*l.* a-year real estate, and 100,000*l.* in money, to his widow and offspring, after spending 200,000*l.* in elections. To his eldest son, who had offended him, he left only 5000*l.* a-year. Early in life, he had lived by hawking books about the streets.

19. DEATH OF LORD BYRON. — This highly-gifted nobleman was born in 1788, at Dover, and expired at Missolonghi, having generously brought the influence of his renown, his fortune, and his person, to aid in the cause of Grecian independence. His lordship's first publication, under the title of Hours of Idleness, was not favourably received. The Edinburgh Reviewers, who wielded the critical sceptre with great force, described the poetry of the "young lord" as of a kind which neither gods nor men can tolerate. It is likely that the youthful aspirant—for he was then a minor—being robust enough in intellect to outlive this Scotch discipline, that it operated more favourably in the future development of his powers than if he had received indiscriminate and undeserved praise. Accordingly his next publication exhibited a marvellous improvement—originality, imagination, strength, character, and much beauty of composition. From the time of the publication of the first two cantos of "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage," in 1812, Byron became a subject of almost European concernment. Every fresh production of his pen was looked forward to with impatience, was read with avidity, interested all hearts, and occupied almost all literary journalists in the analysis of its merits. The interest excited by his genius was heightened by his eccentricity; his contempt for established opinions and institutions; his pride and misanthropy; his unhappy marriage and separation; his reckless dissipation; his wanderings in the East, and voluntary exile from England. After a brief but intoxicating career he perished untimely, ere he had explored a very wide and diversified field of literary glory. Possessing a noble thirst for fame, an intense and glowing soul, an intellect acute, energetic, active, and observing, it is impossible to divine what he might have become had length of days been vouchsafed to him. As it is he has left splendid remains, often debased by affectation, tawdriness, and extravagance. His dramas were failures, the rest are fragments drawn from the well-spring of his own mind; personifications of his own real or would-be characters, and not very inviting philosophy. One besetting sin does, and always ought to detract from the interest of his poetical creations—they want manly beauty. All his characters are unamiable; they are proud, vindictive, sensual, scornful, selfish, satanic beings; there is also a want of truth and keeping in them; for though depicted as possessing strength, energy, devotedness, and fidelity, they must, as creatures of mere animal passion and impulse, have been weak, fickle, vain, and inconstant. His lordship was a good satirist; he had the scorn, hate, and enviousness of one. In high life, in particular, he was a regular Mephistopheles, with very alarming powers of suggestion and penetration. The poet married, in 1815, the only daughter of sir Ralph Milbanke Noel, with a large fortune, which he soon spent. By this lady he had an only child and heiress. He was succeeded in his title and estates by his cousin, captain Byron, of the navy.

12. For a wager of 600 guineas six officers of the guards rowed from Oxford to Whitehall, in a six-oared boat, against wind and tide, in five hours and forty-five minutes.

15. An inquest held on a man at Wichester, whose death was caused by suffocation, from a spontaneous enlargement of the tongue. The deceased was in every respect healthy, till within about twenty hours of his dissolution, when he complained of a soreness on his tongue, and said he thought it was swelling, which proved to be the case, and it continued to enlarge, until in spite of all medical aid, it reached such an enormous size as to cause death by suffocation. The body was opened, but not the slightest cause could be found for this extraordinary malady.

25. Mr. Harris, accompanied by a female named Stocks, ascended in a balloon from the City-road. After pursuing their course in safety some time, on endeavouring to let out the gas for their descent, some impediment prevented the re-closing of the valve, and the too rapid escape of the air precipitated them to the earth, near Croydon. The man was killed by being dashed against a tree, and the female was dreadfully stunned, but recovered.

31. Earl Grey brought forward, in the lords, the petition of the roman catholics of Ireland. The catholic body had now altered their complaints; they no longer placed emancipation in the front of their grievances, but demanded, as more important preliminaries, a reform in the temporalities of the protestant church, a better regulation of juries, and the disfranchisement of municipal corporations. A petition similar in import was presented by Mr. Brougham, in the commons. Both the peer and commoner expressed their dissent from the new claims of the catholics.

June 1. Mr. Brougham moved for an inquiry into the proceedings at Demerara against missionary Smith: they had drawn forth numerous petitions, and excited much commiseration for the sufferer; but, after a debate of two days the motion was negatived.

7. Five of Carlisle's shopmen sentenced to various terms of imprisonment, from three years to six months, for selling Paine's "Age of Reason."

9. Sir W. Congreve's rocket-factory, at West Ham, exploded. The explosion was occasioned by a spark struck off in nailing up a case in the finishing-room. Two lives were lost.

Project started for forming a ship-canal between the Bristol and the British channels, to avoid the dangerous navigation round the Land's-end. Annual loss of lives in effecting that passage estimated at 200.

10. A conversation to-day, in the Old Bailey, respecting lawyers' fees. Mr. Adolphus said, "lawyers never returned fees. Counsel could not recover fees, and once paid they were never returned. The profession of the law was not to be regarded on the same footing with a mere trade." Mr. Alley, on the other side, said, he "knew not what the practice of other gentlemen might be; but he pledged his honour that he never neglected to return a fee if anything prevented him attending to the interests of his client."

15. Petitions presented from the great mercantile houses of London, Leeds, and Liverpool, praying for a recognition of the independence of the new states of South America.

25. Bank of England resolved to lend money, at 4*l*. per cent. interest, on government securities, or on bank stock; the lowest sums advanced to be 5000*l*.

Parliament prorogued by the king. The session had been popular, and signalized by the abandonment of the duty on law proceedings, the repeal of the combination laws, attempts to consolidate the criminal laws, and improve the condition of the slave-population. It was also remarkable for the absence of party violence, the conciliatory tone of ministers, and the manifestation of a patriotic spirit of national improvement.

Notwithstanding the excellence of the instruments, and the talents of the surveyors, it appears from the recent verification of Mr. Tiarks, that as to all places on the south coast of England, 1" of longitude for every 4' of longitude westward of Greenwich, requires to be added to the results of the Trigonometrical Survey, in order to obtain its true longitude.

30. Company established at Merton, for washing linen by steam.

WAR WITH THE ASHANTEES.—Disastrous intelligence arrived this month from the British colony at Cape Coast Castle. A war had commenced with the Ashantees, a nation formidable from their ferocious valour, and a certain degree of civilization that placed them almost on a level with Algerines. Hostilities originated in the protection we had afforded to the Fantees, with whom the Ashantees had been at war, and driven for shelter into the British settlement. In the beginning of January sir Charles McCarthy, the governor of Sierra Leone, set out to penetrate to Coomassie, 250 miles distant, and the capital of Ashantee. Before he had formed a junction with major Chisholm, as he intended, he was attacked with great fierceness by the enemy, his retreat intercepted, himself slain, and the greatest part of his force, amounting to 2000 men, were massacred or taken prisoners. Emboldened by their success, the Blacks descended to the shore, with a full determination to drive the English and their native auxiliaries into the sea. But here they were checked by the aid of intrenchments, the strength of the castle, and the able dispositions of colonel Sutherland. This, however, was effected with great loss on our part, and in July the colony was reduced to extremity, when sir John Phillimore arrived, with military stores, and a reinforcement. The Ashantees retired into their own country, threatening to renew the war in the spring.

July 1. Thomas Thurtell, brother of the murderer, sentenced to two years' imprisonment, for a fraudulent attempt to obtain insurance-money from the county fire-office.

6. Lord Byron's will proved in Doctors' commons; John Cam Hobhouse and John Hanson, of Chancery-lane, executors. His personal estate in England sworn under 10,000*l*. The will is dated July 29, 1815, and with the exception of a bequest of 1000*l*. each to his lordship's executors, is made solely in favour of Mrs. Leigh, his lordship's sister, and her children. A codicil, dated November 17, 1815, bequeathed to his executors, in trust, 5000*l*. for the benefit of Allegra Byron, an infant, twenty months old, whom his lordship had protected, to be paid to her at twenty-one years of age, "provided she does not marry a native of Great Britain."

10. Henry Baring, M. P., recovered 1000*l*. damages from captain Webster, in an action of crim. con. Defendant had suffered judgment to go by default.

12. Remains of lord Byron conveyed from London, to be deposited in Newstead abbey.

The Fame, Indiaman, was lost by fire, when sir Stamford Raffles, late governor of Bencoolen, with his family, narrowly escaped, with the loss of a valuable collection in literature and natural history, intended to illustrate the history of Sumatra.

14. The arrival of the king and queen of the Sandwich islands caused much public interest. It was rumoured that the voyage had been undertaken to obtain the protection of England against the encroachments of Russia in the South seas. The queen unfortunately caught the measles, of which she died, which event was followed by the death of her consort, four days after. The bodies of both were sent to Owhyhee, to be interred.

it includes a portion of wine, beer, and coffee; banyan days are abolished, and 2*s*. per month added to the pay, in lieu of spirits.

New society of christians formed at Manchester, one of whose tenets is to abstain from animal food, and live entirely on vegetables. Their practice is founded on a literal interpretation of the scriptural injunction, "Thou shalt not kill."

Trade of Rochdale has increased so much that of flannels and baizes about 20,000 pieces of 46 yards each, are manufactured weekly. The activity of the Nottingham trade is without precedent; the net lace, bought by French dealers, is immense. This net, in France, is ingeniously worked up with silk or cotton patterns, which, when sent back to England, fetches a high price.

Sept. 1. This was the hottest day of summer; the thermometer in the shade, at two o'clock, was at 89 degrees Fahrenheit. Several horses dropped down in the stages from the heat. In Holland the heat was more intense; at the Hague the thermometer stood at 92½ degrees in the shade.

8. The Gazette without a bankrupt.

16. Died, in his 69th year, and the tenth of his reign, Louis XVIII. of France. He was brother of Louis XVI., who was beheaded, of the duke of Berri, who was assassinated, and of Charles X. who succeeded him, and was driven from the throne. The late king possessed most of the qualities which in private life constitute an agreeable companion—an amiable temper—considerable colloquial powers—much acquired information—and a keen relish of social enjoyments, especially those of the table. Though professedly a good catholic, and partial to the ancient system, he evinced, subsequent to his second restoration, more discretion than some of his ultra advisers in his efforts to re-establish it. Louis was the author of several literary trifles, of no great merit, one an account of his journey, or rather flight to Coblenz, which Talleyrand characterized as the "Journey of Harlequin, who is always afraid and always hungry."

23. Died, in his 84th year, at his house, in Burton-crescent, Major CARTWRIGHT, a gentleman who for half a century had laboured, with great singleness and honesty of purpose, in the cause of political reformation. So early as 1775 he published a tract, "American Independence the Glory and Interest of Great Britain." He founded, with the aid of Dr. Jebb and Granville Sharpe, the "Society for Constitutional Information." During the last seven years the Major had taken a leading part among the radicals in the advocacy of universal suffrage and annual parliaments. He was a reformer on the basis of prescription, derived from some remote period of Anglo-Saxon history, rather than of the natural rights of man. In his last moments he expressed his confidence in the final triumph of his hopes, but said that it could only be "effected by virtuous instruments, which he hoped time would supply."

29. Charles X. abolished the censorship on the press, which made the commencement of his reign popular.

Mr. Sadler, in descending with his balloon near Blackburn, struck against a chimney, and shortly after fell to the ground, by which he was killed.

Oct. 1 New academy in Edinburgh opened; 400 boys were present. Sir Walter Scott, in an able speech, dilated on the advantages of a good education, and touched upon the leading features of the institution.

2. Club of water-drinkers established in Lancashire; they sit round a table, on which is placed a jug of water, from which the members drink in succession. It seems to have been the beginning of temperance societies.

Town of Wetherby, the property of the duke of Devonshire, has been sold in 174 lots. The English estates of the late marquis of Ormonde were publicly sold, being the largest ever disposed of by auction. They were sold in three lots, and produced 315,800*l.*, exclusive of the timber.

24. New York papers contain accounts of the enthusiastic reception given to Lafayette, on his arrival in that country. The veteran republican paid a visit to Joseph Buonaparte, at his retreat near Trenton.

30. Mr. Fauntleroy, a banker, in partnership with Marsh, Tracey, and Co. tried at the Old Bailey, and found guilty of forging a power of attorney for the transfer of stock. The case excited interest, owing to the enormous extent of the forgeries committed—about a quarter of a million—and the respectability of the delinquent. An attempt was made to arrest judgment on a point of law, but unsuccessfully. At the bar he struck by his high-bred appearance, but failing to obtain pardon his courage forsook him, and at the scaffold he presented a sad spectacle of agony and despair.

Nov. 8. The Columbus, an American timber-ship, of gigantic dimensions, arrived in the Thames. It is 300 feet in length, 50 broad, 30 deep in the hold, and measures 3900 tons, being upwards of 1000 tons larger than any ship in the British navy. It is flat-bottomed, and the bottom two feet wider than the deck. This enormous floating-barge brought over 6300 tons of timber, but it was lost on the return voyage.

23. Lord Chancellor refused an injunction to restrain Mr. Fletcher from preaching in Albion-chapel, Moorfields. He had been suspended from his functions by the synod of the secession church of Scotland for a breach of promise of marriage.

Gazette contains a notice of an intended application to parliament for a bill to erect a superb quay along the north shore of the Thames, having a foot and carriage-way from Whitehall to Blackfriars-bridge.

Dec. 20. Mr. Abernethy, having applied for an injunction to restrain the proprietor of The Lancet from publishing his lectures in that periodical, it was refused, on the ground of the lecturer not being able to produce the manuscript from which his lecture had been delivered, whereby it might be identified: thus negating a claim to copyright in any extemporary discourse not previously written out.

21. Miss Foote, a favourite actress, obtained 3000*l.* damages against Mr. Haync, for breach of promise of marriage.

STEAM-GUN.—This invention, by Mr. Perkins, was among the most popular of the mechanical discoveries of the year. It is formed by introducing a barrel into the steam-generator of any engine, and, by the addition of two pipes towards the chamber of the gun, introducing a quantity of balls, which by the action of a handle in the chamber are dropped into the barrel, and fired, one by one, at the rate of from 400 to 500 balls in a minute. The explosive force of the steam is such that a musket-ball fired against an iron plate, at the distance of 100 feet from the gun, is completely flattened.

Capel Loft, 73, a constitutional lawyer of varied acquirements in mathematics, classics, poetry and criticism: Mr. Loft was a profuse contributor to the periodical press; in 1815 he appeared before the public as the legal advocate of Napoleon, and endeavoured to prove that his deportation to St. Helena was contrary to law as well as policy. At Chiswick, William Sharp, 73, an eminent engraver, and remarkable for credulity, being a believer in Brothers, Wright, Bryan, Southcott, and other pretended prophets, who appeared in his time. Robert Charles Dallas, 73, miscellaneous writer; his last work, "Recollections of Lord Byron." Sir James Bland Lamb, 73, better known as sir James Burgess, and of considerable contemporary notoriety in politics and literature; he was the founder, in concert with another under-secretary of state, of the Sun newspaper, sanctioned by Mr. Pitt. William Lowry, F.R.S., 62, a distinguished artist and man of intelligence. Rev. R. C. Maturin, the eccentric curate of St. Peter's, Dublin, and author of the tragedy of "Bertram." In the Crimea, the celebrated baroness Valerie de Krudener, 59, the idol of fashion at the court of Berlin, in 1798, but who became a penitent Magdalen, and whose religious enthusiasm prevailed over the reason of Alexander emperor of Russia. She is said to have originated the celebrated compact of the Holy Alliance.

A.D. 1825. FOREIGN LOANS AND JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES.—The general prosperity was such that money or credit could be obtained for every enterprise, and the natural consequence of universal confidence was a general tendency to over-trading and speculation. Besides an infinite number of domestic undertakings, in which the country had embarked, and which enhanced the prices of labour and commodities, a vast field of adventure had opened in South America. This partly arose from the determination of the English ministry to recognise the independence of the transatlantic states, and to appoint charges des affaires to Columbia, Mexico, and Buenos Ayres. Peru, Chili, and Guatemala, it was anticipated, would also be soon similarly treated, and raised to the rank of independent nations. The conduct of government inspired confidence in individuals, who ceased to have any hesitations in advancing loans to the new governments, or in embarking in mining and other ventures. The money sent out of the country, a large portion of which was lost, was immense. The instalments paid on foreign loans, mining shares, and other speculations, in 1825, were estimated to amount to 17,582,773*l.* Those on foreign loans only amounted to 11,304,623*l.*, and were as follow:—

£.		£.
1,000,000	{ Brazilian loan } of 1824 . . .	330,000
2,000,000	Ditto, 1825 . . .	1,500,000
3,500,000	Danish do. . .	2,625,000
2,000,000	Greek do. . .	1,130,000
1,428,571	Guatemala do. . .	357,143
400,000	Guadalajara . . .	240,000
3,200,000	Mexican . . .	2,872,000
2,500,000	Napolitan . . .	1,750,000
616,000	Peruvian . . .	480,000

The mania for JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES was incredible. In 1824 and the beginning of the present year, 276 companies had been projected, of which the aggregate capital, on paper, was 174,114,050*l.* Of these companies 33 were for canals and docks; 48 railroads; 42 gas; 6 milk; 8 supply of water; 4 coal-mines; 34 metal-mines; 20 insurances; 23 banking; 12 navigation and packets; 3 fisheries; 2 newspapers; 2 tunnels under the Thames; 3 for the embellishment of London; 2 sea-water baths; the rest miscellaneous. However absurd many of these projects, the shares of several rose to enormous premiums, especially the mining adventures in South America. The madness prevailing, and the sanguine anticipations of inordinate gain, will be manifest from the following statement of the market-prices of the shares in five of the principal mining companies, at two periods, December 10, 1824, and January 11, 1825:—

	Dec. 10.	Jan. 11.
Anglo-Mexican . . .	33 l. pr. . .	158 l.
Brazilian . . .	10 l. dis. . .	66 l.
Colombian . . .	19 l. pr. . .	82 l.
Real del Monte . . .	550 l. . . .	1350 l.
United Mexican . . .	35 l. . . .	1550 l.

On all the shares only 10% had been paid, except the Real del Monte, on which 20% had been paid. The adventurers obviously anticipated as rich a harvest as Pizarro and Cortes, and that without fighting, merely by the power of British capital, skill, and machinery.

Jan. 1. The following is the number of the French clergy:—Archbishops and bishops, 75; vicars-general, 287; titular prebendaries, 725; honorary prebendaries, 1253; curates, 2828; viceregents, 22,225; vicars, 5936; priests resident in parishes, or authorised to preach and confess, 1850; priests, being masters and professors in seminaries, 876; pupils, 4041; monks and others, 19,271.

6. Some memoirs, which had circulated as the autobiography of Fouché, the late French minister of police, ascertained in the Cour Royale, on the testimony of his sons, to be spurious.

7. On Saturday night, colonel Stanhope, brother of earl Stanhope, was found hanging from a beam in an outhouse, at Caen Wood, the seat of his father-in-law, the earl of Mansfield. The loss of his wife, two years previously, and a painful and incurable wound received at the storming of St. Sebastian, were the alleged causes of suicide. The colonel was in his 39th year, and remarkably pious.

9. The message of the American president arrived in town, containing a flattering picture of the prosperity of the United States. The Americans seem as eager to embark in joint-stock companies as the English. One New York paper contains a list of twenty-eight projected concerns, the capital to be set apart for which is ten millions of dollars.

17. Alderman Cox recovers 800*l.* damages for crim. con. against Edmund Kean, the popular tragedian.

Only eleven persons executed last year at the Old Bailey, supposed to be a smaller number than ever known.

24. In the Times and Morning Chronicle newspapers advertisements appeared of thirty-five new joint-stock companies.

26. Part of the floor of the long room of the Custom-house gave way with a terrible crash: the desks on each side were left standing. Government commenced proceedings against Peto, the contractor; damages laid at 200,000*l.*

Feb. 3. Parliament opened by commission. Contentment and the thriving condition of all classes formed the leading topics of the royal speech. Ireland shared in the general prosperity; but the prevalence of dangerous associations was lamented. Allusion was made to the war in India, which, it was alleged, had been provoked by the aggressions of the Burmese.

Addresses were unanimously voted in both houses.

10. Mr. Goulburn moved for leave to bring in a bill to suppress the Catholic Association of Ireland. After a debate of four days the motion was carried by 278 to 123; and the third reading of the bill, on the 25th, by a majority of 130. Directed by counsellor O'Connell, its proceedings had for some time been a source of annoyance to ministers, by levying large sums under the name of voluntary contributions, and assuming to be the representative and protector of the catholic population. The language used by Mr. O'Connell was such, that the attorney-general held him to bail; but the indictment preferred against him was thrown out by the grand-jury.

The number of petitions this session for private bills amounts to 371; 22 are for railways, and 36 for new companies. During the war and high prices the majority of private bills were for enclosing commons.

28. A fatal pugilistic encounter between two Eton scholars, the hon. F. A. Cooper, a son of the earl of Shaftesbury, and Mr. Wood, a son of colonel Wood, and nephew of the marquis of Londonderry. Cooper, the boy killed, was under fifteen, his opponent near seventeen years of age. Between the rounds their school-fellows plied them with brandy, which doubtless helped to produce the unhappy catastrophe. A coroner's jury brought in a verdict of manslaughter against Wood, and his second, Wellesley; but, no witnesses appearing on the trial, they were acquitted.

The last contract for STATE LOTTERIES was concluded this day with the chancellor of the exchequer. They have existed in this country, as a branch of the public revenue, for upwards of 150 years.

A convention signed at Petersburg between Russia and Britain, settling the limits of their respective possessions on the north-west coast of America.

Mar. 1. Kent East Indiaman destroyed by fire in the bay of Biscay. It arose from the accidental ignition of a cask of spirits. Out of 642 persons on board, 85 were lost.

Sir F. Burdett's resolutions for the relief of the Irish catholics carried by a majority of 247 to 234. Sir Francis presented a petition, 100 feet in length, praying for catholic emancipation.

2. First stone of a tunnel under the Thames laid at Rotherhithe.

14. Colonel Berkeley assaulted Mr. Judge, editor of the Cheltenham Journal, with a hunting-whip, owing to some reflections made by the editor on the conduct of the colonel in the affair of Foot v. Hayne. The editor recovered, at the Hertford assizes, 500*l.* damages for the outrage.

14. Proprietors of India stock, after a discussion of several days, resolved "That there was no ground to impute corrupt motives to the conduct of the late governor-general, the marquis of Hastings."

20. The lord chancellor declared, in the case of the Real del Monte company, that the holders of shares in any of the new companies were liable to the debts of the concern to the full extent of their property.

Apr. 4. Mr. Brougham elected lord-rector of the university of Glasgow: his opponent, sir Walter Scott, lost the election by the casting vote of sir J. Mackintosh. The new lord-rector, who had been a citizen of Edinburgh twenty years ago, was honoured with the largest public dinner ever provided in that city.

6. At the sale of a library at Hythe Voltaire's works were purchased by the methodists to be burnt, which was done next day.

9. William Probert, the accomplice of Thurtell, found guilty of horse-stealing: he was sentenced to be hung, and executed at Newgate. (See Jan. 5, 1824.)

25. The duke of York, in the house of lords, pointedly declared against the concession of the catholic claims, and expressed his determination always to oppose them. "Twenty-eight years," he said, "had elapsed since the subject was first agitated; that its agitation had been the source of the illness which clouded the last ten years of his father's life; and that, to the last moment of his existence, he would adhere to his protestant principles—So, help him God!"

May 9. Mr. Stewart Wortley's bill, for legalising the sale of game, lost in the lords.

13. A grant of 2000*l.* made to Mr. M'Adam for his improvements in road-making.

14. Pressure of business so great in the house of commons that eight committees sat in one room, the smoking-room.

17. Catholic relief bill, which had passed the commons, was rejected in the lords by a majority of 178 against 130. A bill introduced for the disfranchisement of the 40*l.* freeholders was in consequence withdrawn.

31. Mr. John Williams, in an able speech, brought under the notice of the house of commons the abuses of the court of chancery. Several petitions had been presented, complaining of the delay and expense of proceedings in that court.

IRELAND.—A committee of the lords sat this and in the preceding session to inquire into the general state of Ireland. They made only a meagre report, but collected a valuable mass of evidence, which threw great light on the condition of the rural population. It showed that they lived in the most wretched state, without property, or the means of acquiring property, barely sustaining animal existence by a very insufficient quantity of food of the most wretched kind. In this state of misery they were the absolute slaves of their landlords; and their indigence and degradation were increased still further by the mode of collecting tithes, their abject bondage to their own priests, and a defective administration of justice by the local tribunals.

LONDON UNIVERSITY.—Mr. Campbell, the poet, in a letter to Mr. Brougham, proposed to establish a new university in the neighbourhood of London. The idea of such an institution is not founded on any alleged deficiency in the educational courses of the existing universities, but on their distance from the metropolis, and consequent expense of the instruction afforded by them. An establishment in the vicinity of London would offer to a numerous class of students the convenience of residing with their parents, and the advantages of collegiate education. The cost of the undertaking is estimated at 150,000*l.*

SALARIES OF THE JUDGES.—A measure has been introduced by the chancellor of the exchequer for augmenting the salaries of the judges, and prohibiting the sale of offices in courts of justice. In lieu of fees and emoluments, the salaries of the judges have been fixed as follows:—chief-justice of the King's-bench, 10,000*l.*; chief-justice of the Common-pleas, 8000*l.*; master of the Rolls, 7000*l.*; chief-baron of the exchequer, 7000*l.*; vice-chancellor, 6000*l.*; twelve puisne judges, each 5500*l.*

June 15. First stone of the new London-bridge laid by lord-mayor Garratt; John Rennie, F.R.S., architect.

27. A petition to the commons, from a widow, complained that, of 1400*l.* left to her by her husband in 1809, 300*l.* had been claimed by his creditors, and the remaining 1100*l.* had been swallowed up in chancery; leaving petitioner a pauper in Greenwich workhouse.

July 6. PARLIAMENT prorogued by commission. The session had been laborious in discussion, but not remarkable for legislation; except by the repeal of the statutes against the combinations of workpeople, relaxation in our colonial policy, the improvement and consolidation of the laws relating to juries and bankrupts, principal and factor.

19. Thermometer, at one o'clock, stood at 86 degrees at the Royal Exchange, and afterwards reached 91 in the shade. Owing to the oppressive heat several horses died from exhaustion in the streets of the metropolis.

A curious conversation in the court of chancery, in which lord Eldon said, counsel "now take fees with both hands." Differences had arisen between the barristers and solicitors; the latter wishing the better to secure the attendance of counsel, to compel them to make their election either to confine themselves to the court of the vice-chancellor or the lord-chancellor.

26. LION-FIGHTS.—This exhibition took place in the suburbs of Warwick. It was a match between Wombwell's large lion, Nero, and six dogs of the bull-and-mastiff breed, three dogs to be slipped at once. Immense sums were paid to see the combat; but the lovers of brutal sports were disappointed of their banquet: the lion would not fight; he seemed more disposed for play than battle; and only used his paws, never his mouth, though much lacerated by his assailants. A match was next made with a smaller lion, Wallace, more ferocious. The inequality of power in this case deprived the combat of interest: the monarch of the forest caught up his puny antagonists in his huge jaws, as a cat would a mouse or cockchafer, and instantly destroyed, or disabled them. Those not so served escaped in a fright from the den; so that the second, like the first experiment, was a failure.

Aug. 3. Riot at Sunderland, occasioned by disputes between the seamen and ship-owners. Five persons killed by the firing of the military.

16. Monument erected, near Carmarthen, to the memory of sir Thomas Picton, who fell at Waterloo.

18. The rage for joint-stock companies has extended to France. At Paris a numerous association has been formed, under the name of Société commanditaire de l'Industrie; the object of which is to supply funds for every enterprise, commercial, agricultural, or manufacturing.

19. A meeting of shopkeepers in London determined to close their shops at eight o'clock in winter and nine in summer, in order to afford their clerks and shopmen better opportunity for intellectual improvement.

GYMNASTIC EXERCISES.—The general prosperity turned attention to various modes of improving individual and social life. During the summer professors Clias and Vogel arrived from Berlin, with a view of engrafting on English education the German practice of gymnastic exercises. Their aim was not only to promote health and strength, but to give locomotive power and exterior grace to the human form, by giving instructions in leaping, walking running, and skating. They met with great encouragement; and several establishments were opened in the metropolis and vicinity for morning and evening exercises.

22. Mr. Clark, chemist, who had detected an extensive adulteration of flour with plaster-of-Paris and ground bones, at Hull, produced sugar before the lord-mayor, containing one-half common salt.

31. Trial for the murder of M. Paul-Louis Courier, who was shot in a wood near his country-seat, came on at Tours. Courier was a man of talent, who had distinguished himself by his satirical writings against the noblesse, the ultras, and fanatics of France. He had been twice imprisoned; and his death was at first ascribed to political revenge. At the instigation of his widow (a woman twenty-two years of age) the forest-keeper was apprehended and tried, but acquitted. Disclosures were elicited during the trial, not very creditable to Madame Courier, who had suggested the apprehension of the forest-keeper in retaliation for a suspicion she entertained that he had been placed to watch over her intrigues. The deceased was in his 53rd year.

Sept. 14. At the launch of the princess Charlotte, at Portsmouth, a vast crowd assembled on one of the bridges erected near a floodgate, which giving way, they were precipitated into the water, and sixteen persons drowned.

Oct. 21. The steam-boat, Comet, with passengers from Inverness, was run down off Kempoch-point, in the Clyde, by the steam-boat Ayr. The vessels came in contact with such force that the Comet went down instantly, with eighty passengers on board, of whom only eleven were saved. The Ayr had a light on her bow; the Comet had not. The master of the Comet was subsequently tried for culpable negligence, and sentenced to three months' imprisonment.

27. The Baron de Rensfrew, from Quebec, driven on the coast of France, where she went to pieces. She was longer than the Columbus, having a cargo of timber amounting to 9515 tons, and measured 309 feet in length, 80 in width, and 57 feet deep externally, 37 feet internally.

Nov. 14. Mr. and Mrs. Graham ascended in a balloon from Plymouth, and fell into the sea, whence they were rescued, and landed at Stonehenge.

Dec. 1. In an action, Popple v. Stockdale, for printing the "Memoirs" of a noted courtesan, Harriette Wilson, Mr. justice Best directed the plaintiff to be non-suited, on the ground of the immoral tendency of the work; therefore refusing all claim to compensation for labour so employed.

DEATH OF THE CZAR OF RUSSIA.—The emperor Alexander, who was in the 48th year of his age, and the 25th of his reign, expired, of an attack of erysipelas, on the 1st instant, at Taganrog, on the sea of Azoff. His last moments were serene. Some hours before dying he caused the blinds of his windows to be opened; and exclaimed, while looking on the cloudless sky of the Crimea, "What a lovely day!" Alexander was a noble, an accomplished, and benevolent prince, who sincerely desired the good of his people, Zealous in his efforts to promote the commercial interests of Russia, to emancipate the serfs, and introduce popular education into his vast empire, the chief blot of his reign had been his meddling foreign policy, in which he had sought to prescribe despotic forms of government to the continental states. Napoleon, who had good reasons for his dislike of Alexander, said of him, more spitefully than truly, that he was "Faux, fin et fourbe comme un Grec du bas empire." He was succeeded by his brother Nicholas. The grand duke Constantine, who was next heir to the throne, publicly renounced his right to the succession in favour of his younger brother. This deviation from the strict hereditary line was not agreeable to the military, who were attached to Constantine. A sedition ensued at Petersburg when the oath was administered to the new emperor, and several lives were lost before it was suppressed.

8. A panic in the money-market, caused by the stoppage of the West of England banks, and of the great Yorkshire bank of Wentworth and company.

12. Banking-house of Sir Peter Pole and Co. stop payment. It was connected with forty-seven country banks, and increased the dismay in the city.

13. Banking firms of Williams and Co., and sir Claude Scott and Co., stop payment. Next day those of Sikes and Co, and Everett and Co.; and, on the 15th, Stirlings and Hodsoll closed. Every species of stock experienced depression; and such was the scarcity of money, that merchants with difficulty obtained the smallest supplies on unexceptionable security. In addition to the London houses, sixty-seven country banks failed or suspended their payments.

14. Meeting of merchants, to the number of 150, at the Mansion-house, resolved that "the unprecedented embarrassments were to be mainly attributed to an unfounded panic; that they had the fullest reliance on the banking establishments of the capital and country, and therefore determined to support them, and public credit, to the utmost of their power." Mr. Baring drew up the resolution.

16. Bank of England began to re-issue one and two-pound notes for the convenience of the country circulation. Orders were issued to the Mint to expedite an extraordinary coinage of sovereigns; and, for one week, about 150,000 sovereigns were coined per day. Post-chaises were hourly despatched into the country to support the credit, and prevent the failure, of the provincial firms, which still maintained their ground.

21. East India Company granted 1500*l.* to Mr. Arnot, successor of Mr. Buckingham, in the suppressed Calcutta Journal, to compensate him for the loss he had sustained by his forcible expulsion from India.

31. Intelligence continued to arrive of additional failures in the country; but the Bank, having been liberal in the assistance it afforded, lessened the alarm.

MISCELLANIES.—Among the popular sights of the metropolis this year was the living skeleton, who was much visited, owing to his extremely attenuated person. He was a native of France, 27 years of age, and 5 feet 7 inches high.

The taste for the beauties of architecture was intense: public subscriptions were raised to keep open the view of St. Bride's steeple, Fleet-street, and to re-build the tower of the church of St. Saviour, Southwark.

A volume, containing the scarce editions of eleven of Shakspeare's plays, among which was Hamlet, dated 1603, was brought to light. It was purchased by the duke of Devonshire for 200 guineas.

At the meeting of the Society of Arts, Roberts, a miner, received the large silver medal, and fifty guineas, for inventing a hood and mouth-piece, whereby respiration can be carried on with safety amidst the most dense smoke.

The following is the Russian official account of the devastation committed by the wolves in the government of Livonia only, in the year 1823:—They devoured horses, 1841; foals, 1243; horned cattle, 1907; calves, 703; sheep, 15,182; lambs, 726; goats, 2455; kids, 183; swine, 4890; sucking-pigs, 312; dogs, 703; geese, 673.

George Dance, F.A.S., 84, the last survivor of the original forty royal academicians. Alexander Tilloch, LL.D., 66, many years editor of the Philosophical Magazine. At Stoke Newington, Mrs. Barbauld, 82, sister of Dr. Aikin, and authoress of many excellent works for the improvement of early domestic education. Henry Fuseli, R.A., 87, an artist of high repute, who produced the "Milton Gallery," and was the author of Lectures on Painting. At Paris, Count D'Enon, 84, author of a splendid work on Egypt, and director of the French museum. Charles Earl Whitworth, 71, diplomatist, and late lord-lieutenant of Ireland. George Chalmers, F.R.S., 82, chief clerk of the office of the Board of Trade and Plantations, and copious writer on politics, finance, and statistics. At Florence, Paulina Borghese, favourite sister of Napoleon Buonaparte: her property, amounting to about two millions of francs, she bequeathed to her brothers, Louis and Jerome. Abraham Rees, D.D., 82, long an active and leading divine among the Dissenters, and editor of the well-known 'Cyclopædia.' At Paris, of an aneurism of the heart. General Foy, 50, a highly-popular and independent member of the chamber of deputies. At Brussels, David, the celebrated French painter: he had retired from Paris after the restoration of the Bourbons, being included in the decree against the regicides. Dr. Samuel Parr, 79, celebrated philologist, and erudite classical scholar. Maximilian Joseph, king of Bavaria, a popular prince, exempt from bigotry, and friendly to improvement: he was succeeded by his son, Charles Louis, who was 39 years of age.

A.D. 1826. THE COMMERCIAL CRISIS.—The mercantile reaction, which appeared at the close of the past year, continued with unabated force during the early part of the present. In November the number of bankrupts gazetted was 188; in December, 220; in January, 321; in February, 380; in March, 315. The number of bankrupts on March 4th was 93, which was the greatest number that had appeared; and from that time the plague may be said to have abated. As this was the most overwhelming revulsion in commerce that had ever happened, the causes in which it had originated were narrowly scrutinized; and the general inference seemed to be, that a wild spirit of speculation, springing, in the first instance, from the temptation of low prices, and fostered by the multiplication of paper-money and transactions on credit, was the primary source of the disorder. That over-trading was the origin, and the means indiscreetly afforded for over-trading accessories to the mischief, were facts clearly established from the returns obtained of the vast increase of imports, of the issues of the banks, and the number of bills of exchange in circulation. An excess of mercantile confidence, which opened the door to thoughtless enterprises, with fictitious capital, originated nine-tenths of the evil. The general prosperity encouraged the country banks, and the Bank of England, freely to make advances for almost every undertaking: they rapidly increased their issues of notes; but these, though powerful auxiliaries, were insufficient to account for the enormous redundancy of capital that marked the year 1824, and the summer of 1825. This could only be supplied by the vast extension of private credit by bills, promissory-notes, and open account. Such was the general confidence, that real money was hardly needed: credit was the universal currency; and hence was generated that redundancy of means which depressed the rate of interest, and induced individuals to seek profitable employment for their resources in foreign loans, foreign mines, and every imaginable domestic expedient. Alarmed at the speculative spirit abroad, the Bank of England were the first to adopt precautions, by contracting their circulation; and the example was followed by the country banks. This pulling up was soon felt by a pressure in the money-market. Some of the banks—that of Elford's, in the west of England, and of Wentworth's, in the north—that had been extremely incautious in their advances to individuals, were unable to meet their engagements; and the fact of these houses involved the London firms with which they corresponded. Commercial confidence was destroyed, and a panic ensued. The bank of England made strenuous efforts to mitigate pecuniary distress; and government pursued a steady and judicious course. With the consequences of the folly and cupidity of individuals it could not properly interfere, but it sought to remedy some of the evils of the banking-system. As a too great facility in the power of creating fictitious money had been a main ingredient in producing the mischief, ministers sought to abridge the power of banks in issuing paper-money. For this purpose the circulation of one-pound notes was prohibited; and corporate bodies, or partnerships of more than six persons, were allowed to carry on the business of banking. Both these measures were improvements on the existing system, but not preventives of mercantile reaction: they afforded no effective guarantee against future panics, nor the over-issue and insolvency of bankers, nor against over-trading on baseless credit. The last are desiderata that can only emanate from individual prudence, and more general knowledge of the principles that govern the periodical vicissitudes of the commercial cycle.

Jan. 1. The Astorga library, recently purchased for the faculty of advocates at Edinburgh, is supposed to be the most curious collection of Spanish books existing anywhere out of Spain. It consists of 3000 volumes, and was sold for 3000*l*. The same body purchased, last year, a very fine Danish library, entire, at Copenhagen.

18. Bhurtpore, in the East Indies, captured by the English, under lord Combermere. It was a town of considerable extent, strongly fortified on every side, being surrounded by a mud-wall of great height and thickness, with a wide and deep ditch. Lord Lake failed in an attempt upon it in 1805, after losing 3000 men. It has been dismantled by the British.

31. French chamber of deputies opened by the king, who announced the final separation of Hayti from France, after a struggle of thirty years. Except the excitement kept up by the efforts of the ecclesiastical party to extend their influence, and the clamours of interested men, who declaimed against the financial measures of ministers, because they had been losers by fluctuation in the funds, everything was prosperous and tranquil in France.

Feb. 2. PARLIAMENT opened by commission. The royal speech chiefly referred to the continuance of the Burmese war, to measures in contemplation for the improvement of Ireland, and to the existing pecuniary crisis, which was declared to be unconnected with political causes, and to originate, in great part, in the conduct of individuals, whose sufferings might afford the best security against its recurrence. Addresses passed without serious opposition in both houses, though not without much discussion.

13. Riot at Norwich, owing to one of the manufacturers being detected in sending work out of the city to be executed in the country. Nearly 12,000 persons are unemployed.

23. A two-nights' debate in the house of commons on the silk-trade, on a motion of Mr. Ellice to refer the petition on the subject to a committee. Motion negatived by 222 to 40; the house being resolved to support ministers in their free-trade policy, both as respected manufactures and the shipping interest.

26. PEACE WITH AVA.—The war with this power, which had lasted two years, terminated with the treaty of Yandaboo, by which the East India Company obtained an accession of territory, and a crore of rupees. The cautious mode of fighting adopted by the Burmese, and their use of stockades and redoubts, it was at first thought would create hazardous employment for the British arms. These, however, proved unavailing against European engineering and artillery; and the Burmese were found not more advanced in the art of war than other Indian nations. After carrying all their entrenchments, and beating, in successive engagements, their unconnected columns, sir A. Campbell penetrated to within forty-five miles of the capital of Ava. This brought the monarch of the Golden Foot to terms; not, however, till his majesty had experimented on the diplomacy of the invaders, by attempting some evasive negotiations, and to substitute, in lieu of a payment in money, which he said the country did not produce, a certain quantity of rice, which was abundant.

Mar. 1. Real del Monte mining-shares, which had sold for a premium of 1200*l.*, fell to a discount of 20*l.* per share.

The large elephant at Exeter Change having exhibited dangerous symptoms of restlessness, which were usual with it at certain seasons of the year, Mr. Cross sent for a party of guards to shoot it. One hundred and eighty musket-balls were discharged before the animal fell. It stood thirteen feet high; the body, as it lay on the floor, was of the height of six feet.

2. Lord John Russell made a motion for the prevention of bribery at elections. It was coldly received; neither Mr. Brougham nor Mr. Canning took part in the debate. Mr. William Lamb said there was corruption both on the ministerial and popular side. Motion negatived by 249 to 123.

AFFAIRS OF PORTUGAL.—Died at Lisbon, on the 10th instant, aged 59, after a reign of thirty-four years, John VI., king of Portugal and titular emperor of Brazil. During twenty-five years of his reign the king had acted as regent for his mother, who was insane. Upon the queen's death, in 1817, he succeeded her, and was crowned at Rio Janeiro, to which he had retired with his court on the invasion of Portugal by Buonaparte. His character was ordinary, neither marked by eminent virtues nor debasing vices. After his death Portugal became a scene of intrigue and civil war: Don Pedro had to choose between the throne of Portugal and that of Brazil; for the constitution of Brazil, to guard against the misgovernment which had afflicted her when a colony, had provided, in securing her independence, that the two crowns should never be united under one head. Pedro promptly made his election. On the 2nd May he abdicated the Portuguese crown in favour of his eldest daughter, Donna Maria, then seven years of age. Until she arrived of age the government to be vested in the present regent, her aunt, Isabella Maria. At the same time, to guard against any opposition that might proceed from the faction of the queen-dowager and Don Miguel, it was made a condition of the cession of the crown to the infant princess that, on coming of age, she should marry her uncle, Don Miguel. A representative constitution was sent over from Brazil by Don Pedro, accepted by the Portuguese, and acknowledged by Britain, France, Russia, and Austria. This settlement was, however, displeasing to the absolutists, headed by the queen-dowager and the marquis of Chaves, and supported by Ferdinand of Spain. Insurrections were excited, which were only suppressed by the arrival in the Tagus, at the end of the year, of a British force of 5000 men.

13. Budget brought forward by the chancellor of the exchequer, in which he took a view of the financial system, particularly of the reductions made, during successive years, in taxation, and the effect of those reductions on the productiveness of the revenue. The increase of consumption since 1816 had made up the diminution in taxation. In beer, the increase of consumption was 16 per cent.; candles, 36; paper, 55; tea, 20; malt, 50; British spirits, 53; sugar, 19; coffee, 43; wine, 88; tobacco, 13; leather, 29 per cent.

Apr. 11. Royalty theatre burnt.

14. The number of lunatics returned to the commissioners for licensing mad-houses, from 1815 to 1825, both inclusive, and entered into the registers, was—males, 4461; females, 3443.

22. Missolonghi taken by storm by a combined Egyptian and Turkish force, commanded by Ibrahim. It had held out nearly eleven months. The obstinate defence made the assailants furious: the entire of the male population above twelve years of age were destroyed, and between three and four thousand women and children were carried into slavery. It extinguished the hopes of the patriots of western Greece.

23. The sum received for admissions to see the monuments in Westminster Abbey in 1825 was 1585*l.*; the price of admission, each person, *1*s.* 3*d.

24. Riots in Lancashire, occasioned by the hostility of the weavers to the power-looms.

STEAM TO INDIA.—It is ascertained that the Enterprise steam-vessel had reached Bengal. She sailed from Falmouth August 16th, reached the Cape October 13th, and arrived at the mouth of the Hoogley December 9th, after a passage of forty-seven days from the Cape, having consumed all her coals. The whole time spent in the voyage was sixteen weeks and three days, which is nearly the average length of the voyage in sailing-vessels. By having supplies of coals at St. Helena and other intermediate points, it is thought the time might be abridged a month. Captain Johnson, by navigating the Enterprise, has earned the prize of 10,000*l.*

subscribed at Calcutta, as a reward to the first person who made a steam-voyage from England to India.

May 2. Public meeting at the Mansion-house for the relief of distressed manufacturers; the king subscribed 2000*l.*

3. Riot near Bradford, Yorkshire; two persons killed and several wounded in an attack on a power-loom mill.

4. Mr. Hume made a formal motion on the state of the nation, accompanied by forty-five resolutions, illustrative of the chief points of financial discussion. He combated the idea of the chancellor of the exchequer (Mar. 13) that consumption had increased. By taking a longer period for comparison, it would be found that the consumption of beer, wine, tobacco, and other articles, had not kept pace with the increase of population. Motion negatived by 153 to 52.

A package of relics imported at Dublin, consigned to the rev. T. Murphy, of Kilkenny. The declared value is *1*l., which subjects it only to a duty of *2*d., and it is entered on the custom-house books. "One box of bones of martyrs."

5. A resolution carried in the house of commons to vest a discretionary power in ministers, to allow corn, in bond, to be taken out on certain conditions, for home consumption. It was strenuously opposed by the landed interest, as a departure from the corn laws.

6. Mr. Lemon has made some interesting discoveries at the state-paper office. One is an entire translation of "Boethius," by queen Elizabeth: the prose in the handwriting of her secretary, and the poetry in the queen's own autograph. There are also several documents, elucidatory of the reign of Henry 8th, especially of the king's divorces.

12. Mr. Huskisson, in an able speech, laid open the state of the shipping trade, and defended the policy of the relaxation in the navigation laws.

The number of Jews at present is estimated at 3,166,603; of whom there are in the Austrian states, 453,545; Prussia, 134,980; Russia, 426,908; Poland, 232,000; Netherlands, 80,000; France, 60,000; Britain, 12,000; Italy, 36,000; Turkey in Europe, 321,000; Asia, 138,000; Africa (of which 300,000 are in Morocco), 504,000; America, 5,700. (Ann. Reg. lxxviii. 82.)

31. Parliament prorogued, and two days after dissolved. It was the sixth session, which had been abridged with a view of getting through the general election at a convenient season. Though the session had been short, it had been full of business, and the parliamentary papers printed occupied 29 folio volumes, exclusive of the journals and votes.

June 15. DESTRUCTION OF THE JANISSARIES.—This once formidable force of the Turkish empire had degenerated into a mutinous and effeminate militia. Sultan Mahmoud, undeterred by the fate of Selim, his predecessor, who was murdered by this haughty corps, in 1807, sought to alter its organization by introducing the European arm, discipline, and mode of warfare. The Janissaries were opposed to innovations; they seditiously assembled in the square of Almeida, and declared they would not submit till the new regulations had been rescinded. The sultan had foreseen and prepared for this revolt by securing the services of the artillery, and even some of the Janissaries themselves. Mahmoud acted with vigour; the sacred standard of Mahomet was unfurled, and all true believers were summoned to the defence of the religion of the Prophet. At the head of several thousand men Hussein Pacha attacked the rebels with impetuosity. They retired towards the Hippodrome of Almeida, and flung themselves into the barracks. Cannon-balls and shells burst upon their strong-holds; the barracks were set on fire, and a terrible slaughter ensued of the Janissaries. Between two and three thousand were killed or perished in the flames: those who escaped were executed or banished from Constantinople, and the very name of Janissary became extinct. The destruction of this corps was followed by an entire new-modelling of the Turkish military, and its discipline assimilated to that of European nations. In every quarter of the city soldiers were to be seen at drill; Egyptian officers were brought as instructors from the army of Ibrahim; the proud Turks, who were wont to treat Egyptians with contempt, now submitted to be their pupils.

23. This was the hottest day in the year. At London the thermometer in the shade stood at 89½. Several sudden deaths were occasioned by the heat, and the excitement of the general election. Among them a son of ~~earl~~ Grey, and Mr. Butterworth, the eminent law-bookseller, a candidate for Dover.

In England, within the last twelve months, 1738 coroners' inquests have been held.

GENERAL ELECTION.—The elections were carried on in many places with great spirit and bitterness. The struggles, however, were not for the predominance of political parties but public questions. The prevailing tests offered to candidates on the hustings were the corn-laws, catholic emancipation, and the slave-trade. In Westminster the sitting members, sir F. Burdett and Mr. Hobhouse, were returned. In Southwark, a strenuous but unsuccessful effort was made, to eject sir R. Wilson; and in the city a cry of "No Popery" was raised against alderman Wood. Mr. Brougham once more entered the lists against the Lowthers, in Westmoreland, but was more signally defeated than in his former attempts. The radicals of Preston tried to return Mr. Cobbett; though defeated he polled 1000 votes. In Somersetshire, Mr. Hunt retired from the contest, with the declaration that he "would repeat the experiment till he succeeded." In England and Wales, 133 members were returned, who had never before sat in parliament. In Scotland there were no contests, except for Kirkcudbright, in which Mr. Ferguson ousted his ministerial opponent. In Ireland, there was an unprecedented display of feeling on the catholic question. The catholic priests, for the first time, openly began to take a part in elections, inculcating the doctrine that opposition to an 'anti-catholic candidate was a christian duty. Influenced by them, and roused by the oratorical energies of Mr. O'Connell, the Beresfords were driven out of Waterford. The forty-shilling freeholders, many of whom had been created for election purposes, now openly voted against their landlords.

July 4. DEATHS OF ADAMS AND JEFFERSON.—It was a remarkable coincidence that the two ex-presidents of the United States both expired on the same day, and that day the fiftieth anniversary of the issuing of the declaration. They heard the sound of the bells and the salutes which ushered in the political festival: both had been compelled, by ill-health, to decline the invitation to attend the celebration at Washington, and before sun-set they had both breathed their last, having witnessed their country rising, during half a century, to power and wealth, under the government in laying whose foundation they had borne so large a share. Their whole lives had been spent in the public service; they had filled the highest offices in the state at home, and conducted its diplomacy abroad. They were both writers of eminence; in their political views there was a difference, Mr. Adams inclining more than Mr. Jefferson to the aristocratical parts of the American constitution. They formed two of the only three surviving members of the congress who signed the declaration of independence, in 1776.

10. The moors of Yorkshire, about Ilkly, Bingley, and Hurley, the scene of extensive fires, which are ascribed to the heat of the weather and long drought.

18. Mr. Green made a nocturnal ascent with his balloon from Vauxhall-gardens and descended near Richmond. During his aerial voyage the aeronaut could dis tinguish the white wheat, which was ready for cutting, from the uncultivated land; the former appearing like sheets spread on the ground; the trees and buildings appeared quite black. The gas-lights on the bridges appeared like rows of lamps resting on the water. Battersea and Putney bridges, which were not lighted, appeared like planks across the river.

GREEK LOANS.—One of these had been contracted for in 1824, with Loughnan, Son, and O'Brien, the other early in 1825, with the Ricardos. The last was for 2,000,000*l.*, and realized 1,200,000*l.* for the aid of the Greeks. Certain gentlemen, calling themselves the "Greek committee," watched over the disbursement of the money, with the consent of the Greek deputies, Orlando and Luriotis. The great object was to raise a fleet, to be placed under the command of lord Cochrane, which was to consist of ships of war and steam-boats; the last had not yet been used in the Levant. Owing to some mismanagement, that has never been explained, no fleet was provided; all the naval aid sent to the Greeks was a sixty-gun frigate and a miserable steam-boat, both of which arrived too late to be useful. Yet the money was all spent. There was much mutual recrimination in the newspapers on the causes of the failure, in which the names of Messrs. Hume, Bowring, Ellice, Ricardo, Easthope, and Gallo-way, were conspicuous.

Aug. 4. The "stocks" belonging to St. Clement's Danes, in Portugal-street, were removed from their situation and destroyed, for the purpose of local improvements. They were the last remaining stocks in the streets of London.

7. Colonel Purdon defeated the Ashantees. A discharge of Congreve rockets, canister, and grape, was very destructive among the barbarians. Besides ivory and gold-dust the victors made prize of the head of the late sir Charles M'Carthy, which was considered by the Ashantees as their greatest charm, or fetish. It was enveloped in two folds of paper, covered with Arabic characters, tied up a third time in a silk handkerchief, and lastly sewed up in a leopard's skin.

It appears that 1089 power-looms have been destroyed by the rioters in Lancashire, for which damages, to the amount of 16,383*l.*, have been recovered by actions against the hundred.

Sept. 3. Nicholas I., emperor of Russia, crowned at Moscow. The duke of Devonshire, who attended as the representative of George IV., astonished the Russians by his splendid retinue and sumptuous entertainments.

Oct. 3. The exact position of the Cowie stakes, where Cæsar crossed the Thames, has been ascertained. In deepening the river, about 200 yards above Walton-bridge, a line of old broken piles was discovered, some five feet below the previous bed of the river. They were about as thick as a man's thigh. Many were drawn, and are in possession of the gentlemen in the neighbourhood.

16. Mr. Canning dined with the king of France, and sir Walter Scott with the king of England.

19. Mr. Buckingham recovered 400*l.* damages from W. J. Banks, M. P., for a libel, charging the plaintiff with having pirated notes and drawings made by Mr. Banks, during his journey in Syria, to publish in Mr. Buckingham's Book of Travels.

Nov. 14. Meeting of the new parliament. Mr. Manners Sutton re-elected speaker. On the 21st it was opened by the king in person. In the royal speech allusion was made to throwing open the ports for the admission of foreign grain, the termination of hostilities with the Burmese, and the distresses that had visited the manufacturing districts. The address was carried in the upper house without a division; in the lower an amendment, moved by Mr. Hume, seconded by Mr. Marshall, the new member for Yorkshire, was negatived by 170 votes against 24.

Dec. 1. The king visited Drury-lane theatre.

5. Alderman Waithman brought forward, in the house of commons, the subject of the numerous joint-stock companies that had been established. Within the last three years, he said, 600 joint-stock companies had been formed, most of them for dishonest purposes. The directors of these fraudulent schemes worked with the market as they pleased, forcing up the prices of shares to sell, and depressing them to buy, pocketing the difference. He dwelt particularly on the Arigna mining company, of which the late chairman of the committee of ways and means, Mr. Brogden, had been a director. The directors of this company, besides an allowance of three guineas per day for the use of their names, had divided a large surplus arising from trafficking in shares. Other members of the house had pocketed by the bubble companies, among them sir William Congreve. He moved for a committee of inquiry with reference to the part taken by members of parliament in the joint-stock mania of 1824-5-6. The inquiry, on the suggestion of Mr. Canning, was restricted to the Arigna company.

8. At a meeting of the Society of Antiquarians, the earl of Aberdeen exhibited the household book of James V. of Scotland, containing an account of his expenditure from Sept. 14, 1538, to Sept. 13, 1539. It is a folio volume, of considerable size, legibly written, and contains the names and prices of most articles in use among our ancestors.

18. Letter addressed by the king to the archbishop of Canterbury, authorising subscriptions to be raised in churches for the relief of the manufacturing classes.

26. Mr. Bric, member of the Catholic Association, killed in a duel at Dublin, by Mr. Hayes, a solicitor.

27. The duke of York visited by the king, who remained with him two hours. The royal duke had been some time unwell, and was now in imminent danger.

31. Died, in his 71st year, WILLIAM GIFFORD, a well-known critic and satirist, and long connected with the government literature. He was the editor of the Anti-jacobin, in 1799, and in 1809, in conjunction with Messrs. Canning and Frere, established the Quarterly Review, of which he was conductor till 1824, when the infirmities of old age obliged him to resign his situation. Mr. Gifford was originally apprenticed to a shoemaker, at Ashburton, his native town. Not liking his occupation, and having a strong taste for letters, which attracted the notice of Mr. Cookesley, a surgeon, he was, through the munificent kindness of that gentleman, removed to Oxford University. He subsequently obtained the patronage of earl Grosvenor, and became paymaster of the band of gentlemen pensioners, and comptroller of the lottery.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—Count Rostopchin, the governor who directed the burning of Moscow, in 1812; the governor also set fire to his country-seat, rather than it should be occupied by the French. At Marseilles, marshal Suchet, 54, a distinguished French general in the Peninsular war. Lindley Murray, 80, the popular elementary writer: he was originally an eminent merchant of New York, but losing the use of his limbs, he turned his attention to composing literary works for the benefit of young people, and the profits of which were devoted to charitable uses. At Worcester, the celebrated English vocalist, Charles Inceledon. John Pinkerton, F.S.A., 67, author of an "Essay on Medals." Viscount Barrington, 92; he succeeded Dr. Thomas Thurlow, in the see of Durham, in 1791. Rev. John Milner, 74, Roman Catholic bishop of Castabala, and vicar apostolic of the midland district of England. At the house of sir George Smart, M. Carl Von Weber, 40, the celebrated musical composer. William Davies Shipley, dean of St. Asaph, 81; the dean is chiefly remembered from the prosecution instituted against him by William Jones, a Welsh attorney (afterwards marshal of the king's-bench prison), for a government libel, and which originated Mr. Fox's libel law, settling the powers of juries in libel cases. Samuel March Phillipps, 45, recorder of Grantham, and author of a "Treatise on the Law of Evidence." Sir Thomas Stamford Raffles, 45, late governor of Java. Of apoplexy, John Farquhar, 75, owner of Fonthill-abbey, and a person who had amassed immense wealth in India by penurious and industrious habits: dying intestate, it was inherited by seven nephews and nieces. At Paris, Joseph Sanson, 60, the man who decapitated Louis XVI., and the public executioner during the French revolution. At Margate, Michael Kelly, the dramatist, 63. In his convent, the famous monk La Trappe, a guerilla chief, who distinguished himself in the Spanish war of 1823. Charles Mills, 38, author of the "History of Chivalry," &c. At Paris, Talma, 60, the celebrated tragedian. F. Boissy d'Anglas, 70, a peer of France, and one who distinguished himself by firmness and patriotism during some trying scenes of the revolution. John Nichols, F.S.A., for nearly fifty years editor of The Gentleman's Magazine. John Flaxman, R.A., 72, the eminent sculptor. At Paris, Conrad Malte Brun, 52, celebrated geographer. At Tritchynopoli, in the East Indies, Reginald Heber, D.D., bishop of Calcutta, 44, an exemplary divine and popular writer.

A.D. 1827. REVIVAL OF INDUSTRY.—The present year was pregnant with events, and opened with a more cheering aspect than the preceding. Employment was generally to be had by the working classes, and though wages were still low, they enabled them to gain a livelihood. The different mined and manufacturing interests were recovering from the confusion of the last eighteen months by a progress which, though slow, was sure, and which by its slowness, perhaps, justified the belief that it did not proceed from factitious scheming, but was the natural return of mercantile health. The atmosphere had been cleared by the monetary crisis of 1825-6, and an entire decomposition of commercial elements effected. Masses of factitious property were dispersed, and much of the real capital of the country distributed into new channels. Had this been the only result, the useful lesson over-speculation had taught might have been more instructive than injurious. Unfortunately an immense loss was sustained from the destruction of property, occasioned by the fluctuation in prices, and the sudden change in the employment of capital and industry. A check was thus given to internal improvement; and in consequence of the blight on mercantile confidence the legitimate movements of commerce long continued to be impeded. It is in the nature of great changes to involve the innocent with the guilty; and this was the worst result of the late revulsion; it not only swept away the delusive projects of the adventurer, but paralysed for a season the operations of real business and commendable enterprise. In domestic politics the prominent topic of interest, in the history of the year, was the termination of the Liverpool ministry, and the efforts to supply the vacancy occasioned by the sudden illness of that nobleman. Abroad the political horizon was auspicious. The arms of Russia and Persia were encountering each other on the banks of the Araxes, but the sound was too distant to disturb the repose of Europe. Our armament in the Tagus had guaranteed the Portuguese constitution against the machinations of the absolutists of Paris and Madrid. Even the interference of the great powers in behalf of the Greeks, which led to the battle of Navarino, failed to disturb the tranquillity of Europe.

Jan. 4. The habit of walking with the hands in the breeches or coat-pockets was now very prevalent in the metropolis. It was ascertained that of the first thirty men who passed on the narrow foot-path in New-street, Covent-garden, eighteen had both hands in their pockets, and five others had one hand so placed. (Ann. Reg., lxi. 6.) The practice may have risen out of the late pecuniary mania, but has been superseded by the general use of gloves.

5. DEATH OF THE DUKE OF YORK.—The demise of his royal highness, who had long laboured under an incurable dropsy, had been for some time expected. He was in the 64th year of his age, and for upwards of thirty-two years had been at the head of the army. His sincerity, affability, attention to the comforts of the soldier, and to the discharge of his official duties, combined with equity in the disposition of the patronage of his office, had made him highly popular among the military. During his administration at the Horse-guards, seconded by the lessons of practical experience which the war in the Peninsula afforded, the British army had not merely been improved, but almost created. The duke was large in person, of a manly appearance. He bore a strong resemblance to George III., and inherited, in some degree, his hasty and rapid mode of speech. He was like his father, too, in thoughts and in effusions; but differed from him in his love of pleasure and addiction to gaming. He was a tory in politics, but seldom interfered in them. His anti-catholic declaration, in 1825, was deemed a rash enunciation of an unchangeable opinion in the presumptive heir to the crown. The duke of Wellington, already master-general of the ordnance, became the new commander-in-chief. The fitness of his appointment was universally acquiesced in, only a constitutional objection was raised against the propriety of his grace continuing to hold, with his new office, his seat in the cabinet.

13. The testimony of Richard Carlile against a servant who had robbed him, the recorder at the Old Bailey refused to receive, on the ground that the prosecutor did not believe in the Scriptures.

Feb. 1. The lord-chancellor gave judgment in Wellesley v. Duke of Beaufort. It excited interest from the notoriety of the parties, and the peculiarities of the case. Mr. Wellesley, a nephew of the duke of Wellington, married, in 1812, Miss Tilney Long, with a fortune of 40,000*l.* a-year. Subsequently to the marriage he lived openly in adultery with Mrs. Bligh, and Mrs. Wellesley separated from him, taking along with her their children, that they might not be corrupted by the profligate example of the parent. Mrs. Wellesley dying, Mr. Wellesley claimed possession of his children, but the court interfered to prevent him, on the ground that his openly immoral conduct had disqualified him for the custody of his offspring. The jurisdiction of the court, lord Eldon said, was undoubted, and he had no hesitation in exercising it, where there was property for the maintenance of children, but not otherwise. The prayer of the plaintiff, therefore, was refused, and the children, as wards of chancery, consigned to the care of guardians. The chancellor's decision was subsequently confirmed by the house of lords.

8. Parliament met after the holidays. An additional grant of 9000*l.* to the duke of Clarence, on account of his nearer proximity to the throne, was carried, after sharp opposition.

17. ILLNESS OF THE EARL OF LIVERPOOL.—A stroke of apoplexy terminated the public life of the earl of Liverpool, though his lordship survived till December 4, 1828. He was born in 1770, and, as Mr. Jenkinson and lord Hawkesbury, had been a strenuous supporter of Mr. Pitt. His own premiership commenced June 9, 1812, and owed such lustre as it possessed to fortuitous occurrences rather than energetic statesmanship. The earl's private character was respectable; he was disinterested, and not addicted to political intrigue or partisanship. Inheriting from his father an extensive knowledge of monetary and commercial affairs, combined with the experience of a protracted official career, his lordship was master of the chief facts and principles bearing on the physical interests of the empire. He was a sound, safe, commonplace leader, but not eminent for eloquence, nor for force and originality of mind. Except by the adoption of a more liberal commercial system, little had been done during the peace towards the reform of domestic abuses, or the reduction of the incumbrances entailed by the war. His ministry had become weak, chiefly from a division on the catholic claims, and was only kept together on the understanding that catholic emancipation should be an open question, each member of the cabinet following his own convictions, without lending to the support of his opinion the patronage of his office. Mr. Canning and his friends were in favour of concession; lords Liverpool, Eldon, and Wellington, and Mr. Peel, against it.

21. Will of Mr. Rundell, the silver-smith, proved; personal property amounted to 1,200,000*l*.

The sale of the duke of York's furniture produced 6000*l*.

Mar. 1. Mr. Canning introduced his resolutions on the corn-laws. A bill founded upon them passed the commons, but was thrown out of the lords, chiefly through the opposition of Mr. Canning's late colleagues, headed by the duke of Wellington.

The following extract from a letter, addressed to sir Wm. Knighton, the king's privy purse, exhibits some of the effects of the difficulties which now beset Mr. Canning. It is dated on the 3d instant:—"My dear Sir,—The only ill effect of my attendance in the house of commons, on Thursday, was a sleepless night; a grievance which I do not remember ever to have experienced to the same degree before. I was not feverish; I was not exhausted; I was not even tired;—and I can generally get to sleep, putting aside whatever is upon my mind, but Thursday night I could not. I felt as if every limb, from top to toe, was alive, like an eel, and I lay all night, not tossing or tumbling, but as broad awake as if it were mid-day. The consequence was that I kept quiet at home (by Holland's advice) all yesterday, and did not go to the house of commons, for which reason I have not written to his majesty; perhaps you will have the kindness to explain why. I am quite well this morning, having (by order) dined more liberally yesterday, and drunk a little more wine, and afterwards slept like a top from eleven to seven.—Ever most sincerely yours, George Canning."—(Memoirs of Sir W. Knighton, i. 376.)

6. At the Winchester assizes, on the trial of a woman for the murder of her child, the counsel of the prisoner objected that, inasmuch as the inquisition of the coroner, on which she was tried, appeared to be on the finding of thirteen jurors, the words "upon their oath" were clearly wrong, as thirteen men could not have been sworn by one oath, but by thirteen oaths. Mr. justice Buller immediately pronounced the objection fatal, and the inquisition was quashed.

23. Edward Gibbon Wakefield, William Wakefield, Edward Thevenot, and Frances Wakefield, were tried at Lancaster assizes for the abduction of Miss Ellen Turner, a lady 15 years of age, and the only child and heiress of William Turner, esq., a gentleman, with real estates at Manchester producing 5000*l*. a-year. The jury brought in a verdict of guilty against the two Wakefields and Mrs. Wakefield. Judgment against the two Wakefields was delivered in the court of king's-bench, May 14th, when Edward Gibbon Wakefield was sentenced to be confined in Newgate for three years, and William Wakefield in Lancaster castle, for the same period. Judgment was not prayed against Mrs. Wakefield. An act of parliament was passed to annul the alleged marriage with Miss Turner.

30. Mr. Tierney moved a postponement of the supplies, till a strong, efficient, and united administration had been formed. What was meant by a "united administration" he would not define. Motion negatived by 158 to 80.

April 10. Mr. Hume obtained leave to bring in a bill for the abolition of imprisonment for debt on mesne process.

16. Talicution operation, so called from its inventor, for the restoration of a lost nose, performed for the first time, in Scotland, by Mr. Liston, surgeon, in Edinburgh.

30. First stone of the London university laid by the duke of Sussex. It was commemorated by a dinner, at which were present the duke of Norfolk, marquis of Lansdowne, earl of Carnarvon, lord Auckland, sir R. Wilson, Dr. Lushington, Mr. J. Smith, Dr. Maltby, colonel Jones, alderman Venables, &c. &c.

CANNING MINISTRY.—There was an interregnum of near two months before measures were taken to supply the deficiency in the ministry occasioned by the illness of the earl of Liverpool. No hope remaining of his lordship's recovery, the king determined upon the course he should adopt. From the first he had selected Mr. Canning for his confidential adviser; and the favourable disposition of his majesty towards the foreign secretary was in accordance with the general sentiment among the people. Mr. Canning was not implicitly confided in for political consistency, neither was his public conduct universally approved, but his superiority to his colleagues in experience, eloquence, official ability, and general intelligence, was recognised. He had become popular by the recognition of the independence of the American colonies; by disconnecting the country, in its foreign policy, from the continental despotisms, and by his liberal sentiments on the catholic question. The public press and the talented and liberal-minded were in his favour. The king, therefore, evinced judgment in his choice, and empowered Mr. Canning to form a new ministry, on a prescribed basis. It was to be like its predecessor, divided in opinion on the catholic question; but Mr. Canning, the leader of the pro-catholic party, who refused longer to serve under an anti-catholic premier, should be its head. On this point Mr. Canning was decided, and expressly stipulated with his majesty that he was not "only to have the substantial power of first minister, but be known to have."—(Stapleton's Life, iii. 315.) The king's instructions were received on the 10th inst. Mr. Canning forthwith began to make his arrangements, under the impression that his former colleagues would bow to his supremacy; in lieu of which, within forty-eight hours after, seven leading members of the cabinet sent in their resignations. These Mr. Canning, on the 12th, took to St. James's, and, laying them en masse before the king, said, "See here, sire, what disables me from executing your majesty's will." The king gave him his hand to kiss, and Mr. Canning was prime-minister. The strike at once of seven ministers looked like a conspiracy against the king's choice, and a determination to coerce the royal will. Mr. Peel's intention to resign, however, had been frankly avowed beforehand, but the simultaneous resignation of the rest was unforeseen. The general excuse they offered was difference with the premier on the catholic question; but this plea would not serve all, for lords Melville, Londonderry, and others of the retiring statesmen, agreed on that subject with Mr. Canning. This gave it the semblance of a confederacy either against Mr. Canning personally, or the king's choice. But George IV., in the exercise of his prerogatives, was not to be controlled any more than his predecessor. He differed from Mr. Canning respecting the catholics, but having selected his minister he steadily supported him. Before separating from his late colleagues, Mr. Canning had opened communications with the leading whigs—with Mr. Brougham personally, and with the marquis of Lansdowne through the medium of a common friend, the earl of Carlisle. The mastership of the rolls was mentioned for Mr.

Brougham; he declined the appointment, observing that, if he left the house of commons for the sake of the rolls, he should be without "post-horses to carry him the rest of his journey." Ultimately the bulk of the opposition undertook to support Mr. Canning, without stipulating for the immediate possession of places, merely on the ground of approval of his late policy. Under these circumstances the new ministry was constituted as follows:—

Mr. Canning, Premier.

Earl of Harrowby, Lord President.

Duke of Portland, Lord Privy Seal.

Viscount Dudley, Foreign Secretary.

W. S. Bourne, Home Secretary.

Viscount Goderich, Colonial Secretary.

W. Huskisson, Board of Trade.

C. W. Wynn, Board of Control.

Viscount Palmerston, Secretary at War.

Lord Bexley, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Chancellor.

Sir John Leach, Master of the Rolls.

Sir Anthony Hart, Vice-Chancellor.

Sir James Scarlett, Attorney-General.

Sir N. Tindall, Solicitor-General.

Duke of Clarence, Lord High Admiral.

Marquis of Anglesey, Master-General of the Ordnance.

Duke of Devonshire, Lord Chamberlain.

Duke of Leeds, Master of the Horse.

Hon. W. Lamb, Secretary for Ireland.

The first eleven formed the cabinet. Lord Bexley was among the resigned, but recalled his resignation, on the ground of a mistake, and retained the duchy sinecure. (Changes were subsequently made, and members of the opposition were introduced into offices. The marquis of Lansdowne accepted the seals of the home department; Mr. Tierney the mastership of the mint; and Mr. Abercrombie became judge-advocate, vice sir John Beckett.)

THE KING'S HEALTH.—During the suspension of the ministry, and while a new one was being formed, the king's health was very indifferent. In a note to sir W. Knighton, dated April 6th, his majesty says,—“It is true I am jaded and quite worn out, and writing from my bed, where I have laid down for a little rest; but tomorrow will be quite time enough [for sir William's coming to the palace, who was absent from indisposition]. Little or no advance, I regret to say, has as yet been made, amidst, perhaps, almost unravelable perplexities.” The following is a melancholy picture, by the king himself, of his infirmities during the summer. It is dated “Royal Lodge, June 18th, 1827.”—“As to myself I am pretty well bodily, but I have little or no use of my poor limbs, for I can neither walk up nor down stairs, and am obliged to be carried, and in general to be wheeled about everywhere; for my powers of walking, and even of crawling about with crutches, or with the aid of a strong stick, are not in the smallest respect improved since you last saw me; at the same time that my knees, legs, ankles, and feet, swell more formidably and terribly than ever."—(Memoirs of Sir Wm. Knighton, i. 376.) This sufficiently accounts for the king's reluctance to see strangers, which puzzled the prince Puckler Muskau, on his visit to Windsor-park, in the August following. "Lord H," says he, "was afraid the king might meet us, and feel 'mal à son aise' at the sight of unexpected strangers—for the monarch's tastes are singular enough. It is unpleasant to him to see a strange face, or indeed a human being of any kind whatsoever, within his domain; and the park is consequently (with the exception of the high-road, which crosses it) a perfect solitude."—(Tour of a German Prince, iv. 143.)

May 1. Parliament met, after the Easter recess, and presented a novel aspect, after the coalition of parties. Mr. Tierney, Mr. Brougham, sir F. Burdett, and sir R. Wilson, were ranged on the ministerial side; neither Mr. Hume in the lower, nor earl Grey in the upper house, had changed their seats. The two first days were occupied in explanations, given by the different parties, of the motives that had influenced their conduct, and of which we have availed ourselves in the preceding statement.

6. Lord Cochrane and general Church repulsed in an attempt to raise the siege of the Acropolis. Athens held out for about a month longer, when colonel Labrier and his brother Philhellenes capitulated on honourable terms to the Turks. The loss of Missolonghi last year, and of Athens this, combined with the dissensions of the Greek chiefs, left slight hopes of Grecian independence. They appointed their countryman, count Capo d'Istria, who had been in the service of Russia, president of congress for seven years, with the same power as the president of the United States.

8. In digging in the Vauxhall-road, to form a common sewer from Westminster to the Thames, a number of human bones, with fragments of timber, old shoes, buckles, and remains of wearing apparel, were exhumed. It appears to have been near the site of "the Pest-house" (since denominated the Five Chimneys) to which victims of the plague fled in 1665, and such as did not recover were buried in the vicinity.

18. Thames tunnel fell in and filled with water. Mr. Brunel, the engineer, immediately adopted measures for stopping up the breach with bags of clay, and sinking a lighter, loaded with old iron, over them.

June 1. Mr. Canning brought forward the budget. It was without novelty, and the minister referred to a future session for a more minute inquiry into the state of the finances. Ministerial changes, the corn-laws, and the conduct of political parties, formed the engrossing topics of parliamentary discussion.

July 2. Parliament prorogued by commission. The session had been enlivened by the explanations of political leaders, but had been one of little business. The game-laws, debtor-laws, and the state of the court of chancery, were discussed; and Mr. Peel continued the task he had entered upon of bringing forward bills for the consolidation of the criminal statutes. The corruption of the boroughs of Penryn and East Retford was brought forward. Ministers proposed to extend the elective franchise to the adjoining hundreds, the opposition their total disfranchisement; but neither course was adopted during the session.

6. Treaty signed at London, by the ministers of Britain, France, and Russia, for the pacification of Greece. In this treaty they declared the motives of their interference to be the necessity of putting an end to the sanguinary contest between the Porte and its Grecian subjects, and to the piracies to which European commerce was exposed by the continuance of hostilities. England and France justified their interference on the ground that their interposition had been requested by the Greeks. This was the first notice the European powers had vouchsafed of the struggling Greeks; all the aid they had hitherto received proceeded from the voluntary contributions or personal services of enthusiastic individuals.

14. William Sheen, alias Beadle, tried at the Old Bailey for the murder of his child, by cutting off its head, and acquitted. He escaped by pleading a former acquittal, which arose from a technical error in the indictment. The name in the indictment was "William Beadle," but in the baptismal register that was produced it was "Charles William Beadle;" consequently, as no identity was proved, Mr. justice Holroyd held the discrepancy to be fatal to the indictment.

16. A ludicrous scene in the king's-bench prison. It was a mock-election for the newly-created borough of Tenterden, as the debtors styled their gaol. The riotous sport was kept up for three days, and was only terminated by the interference of marshal Jones.

In digging the foundations of the new London-bridge, many ancient pieces of coin, gold, silver, and brass, were discovered. They were mostly Roman, or Saxon. Among them was a leaden figure of a horse, the head of which was so admirably executed as hardly to be inferior to some of the heads on the Elgin marbles. Caution, however, was necessary in the adoption of these antiquities, as attempts were made to circulate spurious fabrications.

Aug. 8. DEATH OF MR. CANNING.—This highly-gifted orator and statesman expired in the 57th year of his age, at Chiswick, a villa of the duke of Devonshire, and the same in which Charles James Fox died. Mr. Canning's death was occasioned by an inflammation of the kidneys; a painful disease, aggravated, probably, by uneasiness of mind and the over-excitement consequent on his elevation to the premiership. He was born in the parish of Marylebone, of a respectable and talented, but straitened family. He enjoyed, however, the advantages of a superior education, and at Eton was not less remarkable for assiduous scholastic application than the display of those shining abilities in rhetoric and literary composition for which he was afterwards distinguished. At this foundation he formed an intimacy with the Jenkinses, while, through his mother's acquaintance with Mr. Sheridan, he kept up a social intercourse with the whigs. Without fortune or high station, it was necessary, with a view to his future support and distinction, that he should enter himself a cadet of one of the two great political parties. Contrary to anticipation, Mr. Canning's choice fell upon the Tories, and in 1793 he became representative, in the house of commons, of the treasury borough of Newport. His maiden speech, in the following year (Jan. 31st) was not relished—it was too ambitious; the speaker had, however, the good sense to profit by the faults of his first attempt, but never entirely mastered them. In 1799 he married Miss Joan Scott, with a fortune of 100,000*l.*, and one of the three daughters of general Scott, whose immense riches had been made by play. By his oratory in the senate, and his pen in the Anti-jacobin, he rendered effective support, during the war, to the measures of the Pitt ministry. Mr. Canning had much wit, and a taste for invective and ridicule, which he not unfrequently disfigured by virulence. With these weapons he battered the Addingtons after the peace of Amiens, and "All the Talents," as they were termed, in 1806. He was a clever partisan, but occasionally failed in candour, dignity, and generosity, in his political hostilities. He agreed with the Grenvilles on several of their measures (as the abolition of the slave-trade), though he bitterly reviled their administration; and he accepted office in the Portland ministry, though he despised the prejudiced alarm upon which it had been established. He thought lightly of the abilities of lord Castlereagh; and that minister, resenting the success of a cabinet intrigue, by which he was sought to be displaced, they fought a duel, then became reconciled, and Mr. Canning accepted a subordinate situation under his lordship. On catholic emancipation the extent of his offending was limited to holding office with those by whom it was opposed, and suffering the question to remain in abeyance; but in truth it could not have been carried, either with the concurrence of the people or the king. In these movements there was a giving way to expediency, but not absolute dereliction of principle. Indeed, the character of Mr. Canning for private honour and public consistency cannot be seriously impugned. That he was arrogant, vain, and assuming, may be allowed, but he had the manliness to avow his sentiments, and did not meanly desert them. Rather than participate in the proceedings against queen Caroline, although allowed by his colleagues to take no part against that unhappy princess, he retired from office. This redeemed, in the estimate of many, his political reputation, which had suffered from apparent truckling for office, his strenuous support of the Six Acts, and his contemptuous revilings of constitutional reform. He was long the efficient representative of Liverpool, and of this distinction no rival candidate, though four times tried, could deprive him. The death of the marquis of Londonderry removed a checkmate in his official career, and, in lieu of an honourable exile as governor-general in India, he became secretary for foreign affairs. It was the era of a new course of statesmanship, signalised by a more marked dissent from the Holy Alliance, and an amelioration, which the changes of the times had rendered politic, in our navigation and commercial laws. Upon these points, and also in the conduct adopted towards Portugal, Greece, and the American republics, Mr. Canning coincided more in sentiment with the Opposition than with many of his colleagues. It was this conformity, which the current of circumstances, more than inclination, forced upon him, that won for him the support of a large section of the whigs on his elevation to the premiership. This last prize of political ambition he did not long possess, and never, perhaps, for a moment enjoyed, through failing health and the bitterness of opponents. Had he lived it may be doubted whether he would have long been able to maintain himself at the head of affairs, opposed as he was by his own party, and dependent mainly on the volunteer aid of the whigs. His declaration against the dissenters was indiscreet: he was too personally susceptible of, as well as obnoxious to, attack, and lacked that gravity of character and intellect essential to the steady government of an empire. Still he was a man of brilliant accomplishments, uniting in an eminent degree the graces of scholarship, of gentlemanly bearing, and high political ability; which, with great personal advantages, elegant manners, forgiving temper, affectionateness, and conciliatory address, rendered him, particularly in the latter years of his life, an object of very general admiration and attachment. His eloquence was singularly felicitous, correct, copious, and classically ornate: it was not, however, of the first order, and won more by beauties of style, and amusing display of ridicule and humour than depth of reasoning, or energetic appeals to lofty principles. To the philanthropic class of legislators, indeed, Mr. Canning never seemed to aspire. It was with the grandeur of the nation, rather than its happiness, that he sympathised; the renown of its naval and military achievements, its commercial opulence, and the splendour and luxury of its aristocratic orders. Minor domestic innovations, that were harmless or useful, or opposed only by prejudice, he did not oppose, but organic changes he resolutely set his face against, and that often by reasoning of a superficial or selfish import. Under a monarchy he was born, had thriven, and hoped to die, formed the staple of his arguments on parliamentary reform, against which he annually raised his beaver, dealt his gibes, and rounded his periods; and which savoured more of the adventuring politician of the school of Wilkes or Walpole than of the patriot. A trait of Mr. Canning is mentioned by sir Wm. Knighton, that seems hardly reconcilable with the general constitution of his mind. He had no taste for, nor derived any gratification from, contemplating the most finished productions of the pencil. It was only the realities of life, not the creations of sentiment or of the imagination, with which he sympathised. He was a laborious corrector of his speeches, and very fastidious about the phraseology of his orations.

17. GODERICH MINISTRY. — Fewer changes than were expected followed the death of Mr. Canning. Lord Goderich became the new premier, as first lord of the treasury, and Mr. Huskisson succeeded his lordship as colonial secretary. A difficulty arose about the new chancellor of the exchequer. Tierney, Huskisson, and

Sturges Bourne declined the office, and it was at last given to Mr. Herries, who had been secretary to the treasury under lord Liverpool, and who had resigned, with his colleagues, on the promotion of Mr. Canning. The whigs of the cabinet were displeased with this appointment, and lord Lansdowne tendered his resignation. They objected to the chancellor of the exchequer, both on political grounds and as a nominee of the king, till it was explained that Mr. Herries was not the choice of the king, but of lord Goderich. Lord Harrowby retired, and was succeeded by the duke of Portland, and the earl of Carlisle became the new privy seal. The duke of Wellington resumed the command of the army, but without a seat in the cabinet. In Ireland, the vacant chancellorship was filled up by sir Anthony Hart, who was succeeded in the vice-chancellorship by Mr. Shadwell. The following is the list of the Goderich ministry,—the third in the space of seven months:—

Lord Goderich, First Lord of the Treasury.

Mr. Herries, Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Lord Dudley and Ward, Foreign Secretary.

Marquis of Lansdowne, Home Secretary.

Mr. Huskisson, Colonial Secretary.

Lord Lynnhurst, Lord Chancellor.

Duke of Portland, President of the Council.

Earl of Carlisle, Privy Seal.

Lord Palmerston, Secretary at War.

Marquis of Anglesey, Master General of the Ordnance.

C. Grant, President of the Board of Trade, and Treasurer of the Navy.

C. W. Wynne, President of the Board of Control.

Lord Bexley, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Mr. Tierney, Master of the Mint.

Sturges Bourne, Surveyor of Woods and Forests.

Lord Goderich, who was suffering from some domestic bereavement, offered to resign before the end of the year, and it was with difficulty his administration held together till Christmas.

Sept. 8. A steam-carriage, to travel on common roads, made an excursion to Highgate; it proceeded at the rate of thirteen miles per hour, and its motions were easily directed by the conductor.

20. Sale of the great whig club-chair took place at the Crown and Anchor tavern.

29. NORTHERN EXPEDITIONS.—Captain Parry returned from an unsuccessful attempt to reach the north-pole over the ice.

Reaching in the Hecle the appointed place off the Spitzbergen coast, he took to the sledge-boats; and was out for sixty-one days; one of the boats being under his own care, the other under that of lieutenant Ross. The boats were hauled over the ice by the ship's crew—twelve men to each; and, after undergoing incredible fatigue, they found that for a great part of the time they were on floating icebergs, which carried them southward, while they were straining every nerve to proceed northward. Of course the enterprise was abandoned. They reached lat. $82^{\circ} 45'$; during the last three days of their unavailing efforts the boats had gained only three miles. About the same time captain Franklin and doctor Richardson arrived from their exploratory expedition to the north-west coast of America. After descending Mackenzie river, captains Franklin and Back had coasted westward to the 150th deg. W. long. They met with no considerable indentation on the coast, but it gradually tended northward, almost as far as they penetrated, to lat. $72^{\circ} 30'$, when it seemed to run nearly west.

Oct. 20. BATTLE OF NAVARINO.—Sultan Mahmoud declining the mediation of the combined powers (see July 6th), an action ensued with the Turkish and Egyptian fleet, anchored in the bay of Navarino. Ibrahim Pacha having received a large reinforcement of troops from Egypt, and orders from Constantinople to put down the insurrection on land, he recommenced the war furiously against the Greeks. All found in arms were put to the sword, and the Morea laid waste. It was to arrest his desolating course, and compel him to accede to an armistice, that the combined fleets of England, France, and Russia, entered the harbour. If Ibrahim refused to listen to a pacific overture, his fleet was to be destroyed or captured. With this understanding admiral Codrington entered the bay, followed by the French ships, under De Rigny, and the Russian squadron. They found the Ottoman fleet ranged at the bottom of the bay, in the form of a crescent. The battle began, apparently without plan on either side, by a discharge of musquetry from the Turks. It soon became general. Codrington, in the Asia, opened upon the Egyptian admiral, and reduced him to a wreck, as he had previously done the ship of the capitana Bey, on the starboard. All the other ships of the line, and the frigates, were equally well employed in silencing their opponents. The conflict lasted with great fury four hours. At the end the enemy had disappeared, and the bay was strewed with the fragments of his ships. Among the allies the loss of the English was greatest. They had 75 men killed and 197 wounded. News of the disaster produced a strong feeling of resentment at Constantinople, but no actual outbreak of hostility. The sultan, by the destruction of the Janissaries, had extinguished the elements of popular violence. Under the old system, no christian could have appeared in the streets with safety. Such satisfaction being demanded by the Porte as the allied ambassadors could not grant, they withdrew from the Turkish capital in December.

Nov. 6. In the admiralty court lord Stowell gave sentence in the matter of the slave Grace, who had been to England, and on her return to Antigua had been reclaimed as a slave by her master. The slavery of Grace was confirmed by his lordship, in a very elaborate judgment. Lord Mansfield had, in 1771, overruled the dictum of lord Hardwicke, by declaring that the owners of slaves had no power over them in England, nor could they compel them to return to the colonies. Prior to this judgment the personal traffic in slaves resident in England had been as public in London as in the West India islands. They were openly sold on the royal exchange.

9. Annual banquet at Guildhall interrupted by the falling of an anchor in variegated lamps, which had been carelessly affixed to a board, over the heads of the lord-mayor and lady-mayor. The crash spread indescribable alarm: dukes, judges, servants, and trumpeters, were intermixed, and looking with astonishment in each other's faces. After a time the anxiety at the lower part of the hall was relieved, by the toast-master's announcing that "all was safe;" the lady-mayor only having her dress damaged by the oil, and the lord-mayor his head lacerated by the glass.

10. It is ascertained that there are not assets to pay one shilling in the pound of the duke of York's debts.

27. Shop of Grimaldi and Johnson, watchmakers, in the Strand, robbed of property to the amount of 6000*l.*; the thieves are supposed to have entered through an adjoining coffee-house. The property was recovered by negotiation with the burglars.

28. Warwick mail robbed of bank-notes to the amount of 20,000*l.*

Dec. 1. The gothic palace, which had stood unfinished in Kew-gardens for twenty years, having been sold in lots, is in course of being pulled down.

10. Mr. Eneas Macdonnell found guilty of a libel at Dublin, in charging arch-deacon Trench with bigamy, and the guilt of procuring livings for young men in the church, with a view to induce them to marry his illegitimate daughters.

* 20. The marquis of Lansdowne directs a daily report of the proceedings at each metropolitan police-office to be drawn up, so that there may be a mutual exchange of information between the several offices, whereby the detection of offenders may be facilitated.

The copyrights of the works of sir Walter Scott, which belonged to the sequestered estate of Constable and Co., were sold by auction. They consisted of the novels and tales, from "Waverley" to "Quentin Durward," together with various shares of his poetical works. They were put up in one lot, and after a keen contest knocked down to Mr. Cadell for 8500*l*.

30. Don Miguel arrived in London.

POPULAR EDUCATION.—A society was established this year for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, consisting chiefly of public characters of eminence, and individuals distinguished by their literary and scientific attainments. The proceedings of the society commenced with A Discourse of the Objects, Advantages, and Pleasures of Science, ascribed to Mr. Brougham. In the announcement of the society it is stated, that the object of the association is strictly limited to "the imparting useful information to all classes of the community, particularly to such as are unable to avail themselves of experienced teachers, or may prefer learning by themselves." The plan proposed for the attainment of this end is, the periodical publication, under the superintendence of a committee, of treatises on science, metaphysics, ethics, and political philosophy; to which histories of science, of nations, and of individuals, are to be added.

CONDITION OF THE LABOURING CLASSES.

—The inquiries of the Emigration Committee of the house of commons indicated a great deterioration in the circumstances of the people of the United Kingdom, more particularly in agricultural districts, where wages have been so depressed by competition for employment, that the labourer is compelled to live chiefly on bread and potatoes, seldom tasting meat and beer. From the evidence laid before the committee, it felt justified in reporting,—"That there are extensive districts in England and Scotland where the population is at the present moment redundant: in other words, where there exists a considerable proportion of able-bodied and active labourers beyond the number to which any existing demand for labour can afford employment." As a remedy, the committee proposed a national system of colonization in the British settlements of North America, the Cape of Good Hope, Australia, and Van Diemen's Land—countries abounding in extensive tracts of fertile land, capable of supporting any portion of the surplus population of the empire. In the opinion of sir Wilmot Horton, the annual expenditure of about a quarter of a million would be sufficient to carry off the yearly accumulating excess of labour that had been mainly instrumental in the depression of the working classes.

STATE OF FRANCE.—The agriculturists of France, like those of England, complained of low prices; there were likewise complaints of commercial difficulties, and want of employment for the labouring classes. M. St. Cricq, president of the French board of trade, admitted a large portion of the population was badly fed, clothed, and lodged. The contests between the royalists and liberals continued with undiminished bitterness. The court sought to extend the influence of the jésuits, though the existence of the order in the kingdom was illegal; and attempts were made to circumscribe the influence of the press, by oppressive duties and restrictions before publication. During a review of the national guards, April 29th, the king was greeted with vehement cries from the ranks of à bas les ministres. Next morning a decree appeared, by which the whole national guard of Paris was disbanded. This was a bold measure. The national guard consisted of 40,000 men, armed and equipped at their own expense; they belonged mostly to the middling classes, whose feelings they represented. It was followed by the re-establishment of the censorship, which the minister had power to do during the adjournment or prorogation of the chambers. The chamber of peers had shown more dignity and independence than the deputies, and had often thwarted or altered the measures of government. To subdue this refractoriness, seventy-six new peers, all slavishly devoted to the cabinet, were created. At the end of the year the chamber of deputies was dissolved, and every device resorted to by the court to influence the elections. Such, however, was the general unpopularity of the administration, that both royalists and liberals combined to defeat the ministerial candidates. In December, M. VILLELE resigned the premiership. The great defect of his government had been the common one, of being carried on with a view to the retention of power.

ANNUAL OBITUARY.—John Mason Good, M.D., 62, author of several works on science and literature. John Jones, LL.D., author of the "Greek Lexicon," &c. William Mitford, F.S.A., 83, author of a "History of Greece." Philip Rundell, 81, the eminent silversmith of Ludgate-hill, who is supposed to have died worth two millions, though he distributed among his relations, during his life-time, 145,000*l.*, exclusive of 10,000*l.* in donations to strangers in blood. In Switzerland, M. Pestalozzi, 82, author of a system of education that bears his name. At Paris, Caulaincourt duke of Vicenza, 54, a confidential officer of Buonaparte, under the empire. William Kitchener, M.D., 50, an ingenious writer on cookery, optics, and music. Marquis de la Place, 78, a mathematician of the first class, and peer of France: La Place was the son of a husbandman, and minister of the interior during the consulate. Volta, 85, a celebrated Italian philosopher, who died on the same day with La Place. At Chiswick, Ugo Foscolo, 50, a distinguished Italian writer, resident in England, and contributor to the Quarterly, Edinburgh, and Westminster Reviews. George Dodd, 44, the original designer of Waterloo-bridge, and a premature victim of perversity of mind and inveterate habits of intemperance. At Naples, cardinal Ruffò, 83: he distinguished himself in the re-conquest of Naples from the French, in 1799, and was almost the last churchman who took a personal share in military affairs. At Paris, Helen Maria Williams, 69, a lady of literary celebrity. At Sockatoo, captain Hugh Caperton, 40, the celebrated African traveller. Sir Thomas Munro, governor of Madras. Henry Salt, British consul general in Egypt, and author of "A Voyage to Abyssinia."

A.D. 1828. Jan. 5. The sultan issued an order for the banishment of 120 English, 132 French, and 85 Russians, settled in the Turkish empire.

12. Second irruption of water into the Thames-tunnel. Six workmen drowned.

25. WELLINGTON MINISTRY.—The Goderich ministry had been constructed, but never was cemented. Lord Goderich had neither taste nor talent for his situation, and offered to resign almost immediately after his appointment. Differences on the great questions affecting Ireland, the corn-laws, and finance, formed sources of weakness and disunion. The appointment of Mr. Herries to be chancellor of the exchequer appears from the first to have been viewed by the whigs as an unbearable grievance; and during the winter recess there was a manifest design, on the part of this section of the cabinet, either to withhold from Mr. Herries his proper consideration in the government, or eject him from office. This is shown by the arrangement made by Mr. Tierney and Mr. Huskisson, and assented to by lord Goderich, for the nomination, on the meeting of parliament, of a finance committee, of which lord Althorp was to be chairman. Of this arrangement no communication was made to Mr. Herries; and it was only in consequence of Mr. Tierney dropping into the colonial office, with a list of the committee in his pocket, while Mr. Herries happened to be present, that he became acquainted with a proceeding so intimately connected with the business of his own department. There may have been solid objections to Mr. Herries filling his situation; they may have been such as the inquiries of a finance committee, directed by an unflinching chairman, might have brought to light; but, whatever they were, they have not been publicly stated. One thing only is certain—the chancellor of the exchequer did not possess the confidence of the Lansdowne section of his colleagues. Either piqued by the slight he had received, or objecting on public grounds to the proposed constitution of the finance committee, Mr. Herries signified to lord Goderich that, if the nomination of lord Althorp to the chair was persisted in, he should resign. On the other hand, Mr. Huskisson informed the premier that, if the arrangement about the committee was not carried out, he should resign. Perplexed by the cross fire of his friends, lord Goderich escaped by resigning himself, and terminated an administration which, from its origin, contained the seeds of dissolution. The king, thus abandoned by his ministers, to whom he said, he would have been true, if they had been true to themselves (Ann. Reg., lxx. 12), sent for the duke of Wellington, and commissioned him to form a new cabinet, with himself at the head. His grace immediately entered into communication with Mr. Peel, and other members of lord Liverpool's ministry, who had seceded on the elevation of Mr. Canning. With the exception of lord Lyndhurst as chancellor, in lieu of lord Eldon, and lord Dudley as foreign secretary, in place of Mr. Canning, the personale of the Liverpool ministry remained nearly unchanged. The whig cohort, that had joined Mr. Canning on account of his liberal principles, was alone excluded. Even Mr. Huskisson and Mr. Herries, whose collision had been so fatal, remained portions of the new ministry. Mr. Huskisson continuing to be colonial secretary, and Mr. Herries becoming master of the mint, in place of Mr. Tierney. The junction of Mr. Huskisson and his friends with the politicians from whom they had recently received such spiteful treatment was far from agreeable to the public. It savoured more of a love of place than of the liberal principles they professed to admire. A consciousness of loss of character, which he was wishful to redeem, seems to have influenced Mr. Huskisson's subsequent conduct, and speedily led to further changes. At Liverpool Mr. Huskisson informed his constituents, in magisterial style, that he had obtained "guarantees" for the future liberal course of the government. The duke fired at the word, and (house of lords, Feb. 11) repelled, with contemptuous contradiction, the imputation that he had bound himself by any security. "Pledges," said his grace, "had neither been asked nor given, and if they had been asked they would have been indignantly refused." Mr. Huskisson explained, in the commons, by "guarantees" to mean only that the fact of he and his friends continuing to hold the offices they did formed a security of the future course of the ministry. This passed till the East Retford affair (May 19th), when Mr. Huskisson, in the redemption of a pledge he had given, dividing against the ministerial leader, Mr. Peel (and he was the only member of the government that did so) voted in favour of the transfer of the franchise of that corrupt borough to Birmingham. This he followed up by a note, the same night, to the premier, informing him that, in consequence of what had happened in the house, he lost no time in "affording him an opportunity of placing his office in other hands." The duke took him at his word. According to the plain import of the note, Mr. Huskisson had resigned, and his grace inferred that he would not continue in office, unless requested by him so to do. This was a condescension to which his grace thought the government of which he was the head, ought not to submit. Mr. Huskisson and his friends in vain tried to give a different meaning to his hasty communication, to the effect that he had, indeed, by his note, placed his office at the disposal of the duke, but that he had not resigned, nor intended to resign. The duke was inexorable. Upon lord Dudley writing to him with this saving glossary, and to prove that the duke was mistaken, his grace finally replied, "It is no mistake, it can be no mistake, and it shall be no mistake." Thus terminated all hope. Mr. Huskisson had always been in office, and his persevering efforts to propitiate his obdurate master showed that he was unconquerably fond of official life. He was accompanied in his retirement by lord Palmerston, lord Dudley, and Mr. C. Grant. The duke of Wellington's ministry then stood as follows:—

Duke of Wellington, First Lord of the Treasury.

Robert Peel, Home Secretary.

Earl of Aberdeen, Foreign Secretary.

Sir George Murray, Colonial Secretary.

John Charles Herries, Master of the Mint.

Viscount Melville, President of the India Board.

W. V. Fitzgerald, Treasurer of the Navy, and President of the Board of Trade.

Duke of Clarence, Lord High Admiral.

Sir Henry Hardinge, Secretary at War.

Viscount Beresford, Master-General of the Ordnance.

Duke of Montrose, Lord Chamberlain.

Marquis of Conyngham, Lord Steward.

Duke of Leeds, Master of the Horse.

Thomas P. Courtenay, Vice-President of the Board of Trade.

Duke of Manchester, Postmaster-General.

Sir Wm. H. Clinton, Lieutenant-General of the Ordnance.

Sir C. Wetherell, Attorney-General.

Sir Nicholas C. Tindal, Solicitor-General.

Marquis of Anglesey, Lord Lieutenant.

Sir Anthony Hart, Lord Chancellor.

Sir John Byng, Commander of the Forces.

Lord Francis Leveson Gower, Chief Secretary.

Sir G. Fitzgerald Hill, Vice Treasurer.

Henry Joy, Attorney-General.

John O'Doherty, Solicitor-General.

The first eleven formed the CABINET. The duke of Wellington, on becoming first lord of the treasury, immediately resigned his office of commander-in-chief of the army, and was succeeded by lord Hill. In the autumn the duke of Clarence resigned the office of lord high admiral, in consequence, it was said, of the minister objecting to the money his royal highness expended in costly and unprofitable tours of naval inspection. Lord Melville again became first lord of the admiralty, and lord Ellenborough succeeded him as president of the India board. Circumstances had thus brought the duke to the head of the government, as unexpectedly to himself as the country. He had in the preceding year (May 2d) declared that he would have been "mad" to give up his office of commander-in-chief, for which he was suited, for that of prime-minister, for which he was neither suited nor qualified. (Parl. Deb. N. S. xvii. 461.)

29. PARLIAMENT opened by commission. The royal speech chiefly referred to the affairs of the East; the rights of neutral nations were violated by the revolting excesses of the Greeks and Turks; the battle of Navarino, with an "ancient ally," was lamented as an "untoward event," but hopes expressed that it might not lead to further hostilities: increase of exports, and of employment for the people, were dwelt upon as indications of returning prosperity. Addresses passed both houses without a division. The phrase "untoward" was objected to by lords Lansdowne and Goderich, and lord Holland said, our relations with Turkey were only those of amity, not of alliance. The duke of Wellington maintained that the Ottoman empire was an ancient ally of Britain; that it formed an essential part of the balance of power; and that the maintenance of its independent existence was more than ever an object of European policy. Mr. Brougham said, he would judge the new ministry according to their acts: the "soldier" was abroad, so was the "schoolmaster," and he had no fear of the result.

Feb. 1. The grand-master of the university of Paris charged with the superintendence of popular education, formerly under the direction of the minister for ecclesiastical affairs.

7. Rev. Robert Taylor, who had been convicted of a blasphemous libel, was sentenced to one year's imprisonment.

STATE OF THE LAW.—Mr. Brougham, in a speech, on the 7th, that occupied upwards of six hours in the delivery, directed the attention of the house of commons to the state of the law and courts of law. He dwelt especially on imperfections in the rules of court; on the want of classification of suits, and their appropriation to different courts; the evils of the Welsh judicature; the incompetency of the privy-council, as a court of last resort in colonial matters; evils of the magistracy, and their irresponsible powers; different laws and customs in different parts of England; imperfections in the rules of evidence, by excluding testimony of interested persons; absurdities of the pleadings; debtor laws—oppressive in arrest on mesne process—unequal in exemption of land from seizure, in some cases chattels, in others money and stock; costs exorbitant, often refused between party and party, but allowed between attorney and client; bankrupt laws admit of much improvement. On the suggestion of the solicitor-general, the discussion was adjourned, and resumed on the 28th: the result was the appointment of two commissions one to inquire into the state of the common law, the other into the laws of real property.

15. Finance committee appointed, on the motion of Mr. Secretary Peel, with a view to a better management of the public revenue.

18. Princess Feodore, daughter of the duchess of Kent by her first marriage, married to the prince Hohenlohe-Laugenberg.

22. Peace between Persia and Russia.

26. Lord John Russell's motion for a repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts carried by a majority of 237 to 193. Opposed by Peel, Huskisson, and Palmerston. A declaration in lieu of the oaths, having been framed by ministers, the repeal bill was adopted by them, and it passed the upper house, and became law, with little opposition.

28. On a launch at Manchester, the vessel, in descending the stocks, heeled and upset. Upwards of 200 persons, who were on board, were thrown into the river, and 51 lost their lives.

29. Fall of the New Brunswick theatre, Wellclose-square, during a rehearsal, by which, one of the proprietors, four of the actors, and seven others, lost their lives. It had only been opened on the 25th. The accident was owing to the roof having been loaded with a weight which the walls were unable to bear. The walls were only 22 inches thick; the roof was of cast-iron. The roof itself had not been considered too heavy for the walls; but the proprietors, contrary to the opinion of the architect, had suspended from it the carpenter's shop, and various cumbersome pieces of stage furniture.

Mar. 1. Disturbances in Lisbon: the mob loud in their acclamations of "Long live Miguel, the absolute king!"

4. Court of Aldermen, London, rescinded the standing order, made in 1785, that baptized Jews should not be admitted to the freedom of the city. The decision was now come to in the case of Messrs. Saul, who for thirteen years had been petitioning for leave to carry on business in the city.

19. Wreck of the Venus steam-packet, from Waterford to Dublin, occasioned first by the breaking of the engine, and next by the cowardly desertion of the vessel by the captain and part of the crew. Nine persons left behind were drowned.

20. Gazette announced the scale of distribution of the Deccan prize-money, among the forces concerned in the Indian campaign of 1817 and 1818. According to this scale the share of the booty, to the commander-in-chief, was 44,201*l.*; of a captain, 119*l.*; of a private, 19*s.* 10*d.*

29. British armament quitted Portugal, with the exception of two regiments, that remained till the end of the ensuing month. Don Miguel, by dissolving the chambers and restoring the ancient mode of election, was fast re-establishing the old despotism.

Apr. 7. Captain Dillon, of the Research, arrived at Calcutta, having ascertained the fate of the unfortunate French navigator, La Perouse. The Research brought to Calcutta various articles of the wrecks of the lost vessels.

10. In the court of arches, the marriage of the earl of Portsmouth with Miss Hanson, the daughter of his principal trustee, declared null and void, on the ground of the earl's insanity, and that the marriage had been effected by fraud and circumvention.

14. A shower of herring-fry found on the farm of major Mackenzie, of Fodderty, in Ross-shire. They are supposed to have been conveyed thither in a water-spout; the Frith of Dingwall lying only three miles distant, and nothing between the field and sea to obstruct their transit.

17. Committee of Edinburgh professors report favourably on Mr. Gall's books, for the blind, and his apparatus for writing letters, &c., which blind persons are capable of reading after they have written them. Mr. Gall proposed to print, by subscription, the gospel of St. John, in relief, as a specimen of the practicability of his art.

18. The French commence the evacuation of Spain, which they had occupied since 1823. A vote passed the chamber of deputies, but was rejected by the peers, for subjecting the deputies to re-election on accepting certain offices under government.

26. Russia declared war against Turkey. The grievances alleged in the declaration are the infraction of treaties, the violation of the Russian flag, and the intrigues of the Porte at the court of Persia. The objects of the war are declared to be the future inviolable liberty of commerce on the Black Sea, and the navigation of the Bosphorus. In reply, the sultan considered the grievances of Russia imaginary, and expressed his indignation at the treaty of July 6th, and at the affair of Navarino.

May 8. CATHOLIC CLAIMS.—Sir F. Burdett moved for a committee of the whole house on this subject, with a view to a conciliatory adjustment. The debate was continued on the 9th and 10th. On a division, the motion for a committee was carried by 272 against 266; in the preceding session it had been lost by a majority of four. On the 16th, sir Francis moved that the resolution be communicated to the lords in a free conference, and their lordships' concurrence requested. This being agreed to, and the conference held, the resolution was reported to the lords, who took it into consideration June 9th. The debate was opened by the marquis of Lansdowne, and lasted two days. The duke of Wellington opposed the resolution, not on any doctrinal points, but on the ground of expediency, and the church government of the catholics being unconnected with the civil government of the empire. Resolution lost by 181 to 137; but the moderate tone of the prime-minister was supposed to augur favourably.

13. American tariff-bill, imposing duties on the principal articles of English manufacture, amounting almost to prohibition, passed the American senate.

22. First half-quarterly sessions of the Westminster magistrates; the sessions in future to be held eight times a year, instead of quarterly.

June 15. Accident in the church of Kirkaldy, in Scotland, by the falling of a gallery, during the assembly of about 2000 persons, to hear the rev. Edward Irving. Twenty-eight persons were killed, and 150 injured, chiefly through the rush down the stair-cases and in the door-way, the strong, in their convulsive efforts to escape, trampling to death the weak.

21. Meeting at the Freemasons' tavern, preliminary to the establishment of king's-college, for the education of the youth of the metropolis in the principles of the established church: duke of Wellington in the chair.

23. It having been ascertained by the finance committee that 250,000*l.* had been, by order of the treasury, paid over, without consent of parliament, to the commissioners of woods and forests, by the commissioners for liquidating the claims of British subjects on the French government, and subsequently expended in the repairs of Buckingham-house, Mr. Taylor moved that the application of any sum of unappropriated money to uses not voted by the house, was a misapplication and violation of the privileges of the house. Messrs. Herries, Arbuthnot, Peel, and Huskisson, spoke against the resolution, which was negatived by 181 to 102.

24. New London corn-exchange opened.

ENDURANCE OF HEAT.—An experiment made at Paris, in the presence of Dr. Robertson and others, to ascertain the power of a man to endure heat. He was a Spaniard, and clothed in dannel, was shut in an oven, constructed in the form of a dome. At the first experiment he sang a Spanish song, while a fowl was roasting by his side. His pulse was 72 at entering, and rose to 130. At the second experiment his pulse rose to 176, and the thermometer indicated a heat of 100 degrees of Reaumur. At the third experiment he was stretched on a plank surrounded with lighted candles, and then put into the oven, the mouth of which was this time closed. He was there five minutes, when all the spectators cried "enough." The Spaniard, whose pulse was 200 at coming out of this gulf of heat, immediately threw himself into a cold bath, and, two or three minutes after, was on his feet quite well.

27. Grimaldi, who had long been the favourite clown at the theatres, took his leave of the stage. He was only in his forty-eighth year, but his professional exertions had left premature signs of old age.

July 3. The Miguelites took possession of Oporto, and the marquis Palmella and other constitutionalists embarked for England.

4. Mr. Montgomery, who had been convicted of forgery, and for whose pardon great interest had been used, committed suicide on the morning appointed for his execution, by swallowing prussic acid.

Lord William Bentinck arrived at Calcutta and assumed the office of governor general.

5. Daniel O'Connell elected M.P. for the county of Clare, in opposition to Vesey Fitzgerald, a cabinet minister. The contest had excited great interest, because Mr. O'Connell was a catholic, who, though eligible to be elected, could not sit without taking the oaths against popery. He, however, told the electors he could sit and vote in the house of commons without taking the oaths, and Mr. Butler, a catholic barrister of eminence, published an elaborate opinion to the same effect. Mr. Fitzgerald, as an emancipationist, but objected to on the ground of belonging to an anti-catholic administration, and the election was carried triumphantly against him by the forty-shilling freeholders.

10. Budget opened by the chancellor of the exchequer; it announced the intention of government to adopt the recommendation of the financial committee, and, for the future, to reduce the nominal amount of the sinking fund to that of the actual surplus of the revenue over the expenditure.

21. Died, aged 73, CHARLES MANNERS SUTTON, archbishop of Canterbury. His grace was a grandson of John, third duke of Rutland, and succeeded archbishop Moore in 1805. As a legislator he rarely interfered in secular questions. He was constant in his opposition to the Romanists, but favourable to the Dissenters, and voted against lord Sidmouth's restrictive bill in 1811. Dr. Howley succeeded to the primacy, and Dr. Blomfield was translated from Chester to the see of London.

JOHN HAMPDEN.—On the 21st the remains of this celebrated parliamentarian were disinterred in Hampden church, Bucks, by lord Nugent and Mr. common sergeant Denman. Different representations by historians had left a doubt by what sort of wound Hampden was killed. The register stated he was interred June 25, 1643. Upon raising the coffin supposed to be his, and unfolding the cloths in which the body had been carefully wrapped, a singular scene presented itself. No regular features were visible, although the face retained a death-like whiteness, and showed the windings of veins beneath the skin. The remains were those of a muscular person, and the colour of the hair a full auburn brown. The bones of the right hand were found apart from the rest and wrapped in a separate cloth. This confirms the account of the patriot's death given by his son-in-law, sir Robert Pye, who says that Hampden's "pistol burst and shattered his hand in a terrible manner;" contrary to the account of Clarendon, Ludlow, and sir Philip Warwick, that he was wounded in the shoulder.

28. Parliament prorogued by commission.

31. French government sent out M. Champollion and other men of letters to investigate the antiquities of Egypt.

Aug. 8. Trial at Bury St. Edmund's of Wm. Corder for the murder, May 18, 1827, of Maria Marten, a young woman with whom he had cohabited and decoyed from her home to a barn near Polstead and there murdered. The prisoner was found guilty, and the night before execution confessed his crime. In the interval between the perpetration and the discovery of the murder, Corder had advertised for a wife. A lady of respectability, who kept a boarding-school near Ealing, answered the advertisement, and they were married.

Sept. 8. In London the Jewish year 5589 ushered in with the preparatory rites observed, on such occasions, by the Israelites. At sunset they assembled at the synagogue, when the usual prayers were read. The congregation remained till between eight and nine o'clock. On their new year's day for the present year (9th inst.) they again assembled at half-past five o'clock in the morning to celebrate the Feast of Trumpets, in commemoration of Abraham offering up his son. At ten o'clock the trumpets were sounded, which announced the commencement of the year, and those who thought proper left the synagogue. They met again at sunset the same day, when the observance of these rites terminated. No food was allowed till the sounding of the trumpets on either of these days.

12. Proclamation of Bolivar to the Colombians. As minister of the sovereign people, he engaged to obey their legitimate desires, to protect religion, to cause justice to be observed, to discharge the obligations of the republic towards foreign states and individuals, to resign the chief command when the people required its restitution, to convoke the national representation within a year, unless otherwise commanded by the people.

26. York musical festival terminated. It lasted four days and produced 14,623*l*. The expenses were estimated at 12,000*l*. Madame Catalani received 600 guineas, Miss Paton 200, Miss Stephens 200, and Mr. Braham 250.

Oct. 1. London University opened.

6. Queen of Portugal arrived in London.

8. Duke of St. Alban's, hereditary grand falconer of England, gave a grand day of falconry at Redbourne. The birds, eight fine falcons, were each chained to a section of a cone of wood about fifteen inches in height and ten inches in diameter at the base. They were unhooded, but belled, and mostly sat at the top of their posts. Six of them were taken for the sports of the day. A dog having pointed, a hawk was unhooded and loosed; it rose, wheeling over the heads of the party, sweeping to the right and left; now rising into the mid-air in the distance, and now attentive to the hawk's call. The partridge was flushed and flew with the wind towards the company, when the hawk suddenly crossed its line of flight, and, seizing it at a height of thirty or forty yards, bore it in its beak, screaming and bleeding, over the heads of the company, conveying it down to the belt of an adjoining plantation. The hawk was recovered. The other flights were not so successful, and some of the hawks flew off and could not be recovered to the hawk's call.

24. Great meeting of yeomanry and freeholders on Pennenden-heath. A petition agreed to, praying the house of commons to preserve the protestant constitution inviolate. Lords Darnley, Radnor, and Teynham moved, unsuccessfully, an amendment to the effect that the legislature ought to be left unfettered.

25. St. Katherine's docks opened. They occupy a space of 24 acres, of which 11½ acres are devoted to wet docks. In clearing the ground for the undertaking, 1250 houses were pulled down, and 11,300 inhabitants had to seek accommodations elsewhere. The first stone was laid May 3, 1827, and upwards of 2500 men were employed from that time to the opening.

28. Joseph Hunton, draper, aged fifty-eight, and a respectable quaker, tried and convicted at the Old Bailey of forgery on the bank of Curtis and Co. Strong efforts were made to save him, but the law was allowed to take its course.

Nov. 16. Opening of the diet of Sweden. The king's speech noticed the flourishing state of the kingdom, and that a surplus of two millions of dollars remained after defraying the public expenses.

20. Wheat attains a price at which the ports were open to foreign grain at a merely nominal duty.

Dec. 9. The repairs and improvements of the domestic apartments of Windsor Castle having been completed, the king took possession of them. Parliament had granted 450,000*l*. for preserving and restoring this ancient seat of the British monarchy. The whole edifice has been raised one story throughout. Several new towers and a new gateway, called king George the Fourth's, have been erected. The alterations were conducted with great ability, so as to retain the principal features of the original fabric with the conveniences of modern civilization. Mr. Jeffrey Wyatville, the architect, received the honour of knighthood.

24. BURKE MURDERS.—William Burke and Helen M'Dougal, a woman with whom he cohabited, were tried before the high court of judicary for a series of murders, perpetrated in a lodging-house kept by William Hare, in Tanner's-close, Portsburgh, Edinburgh. It appeared, from the trial and subsequent confession of Burke, that he and Hare had been in the habit of decoying persons into the lodging-house, where they first made them intoxicated, and then suffocated them, by one stopping the nose and mouth, the other throwing himself on the lower part of the person to prevent resistance. The bodies were then sold to Dr. Knox for anatomical purposes; and, no marks of violence appearing upon them, no questions were asked nor suspicion felt (though some were delivered at the doctor's museum before the heat had quite left the bodies) respecting the horrid mode in which they had been procured. Upwards of a dozen persons were so smothered and sold. The sale of the body of a lodger who had died a natural death, to liquidate a debt owing to Hare, seems to have first suggested this dreadful traffic. Burke was found guilty and executed January 28th, amidst a vast concourse of exulting spectators. He was an Irishman and a Roman catholic.

CATHOLIC ASSOCIATION.—Ireland was

this year the scene of a novel and extraordinary excitement. During the short ministries of Mr. Canning and lord Goderich, the Irish catholics remained tranquil, relying that these statesmen only waited a favourable opportunity to press forward their claims. But the ministry of the duke of Wellington and Mr. Peel, two known anti-catholics, left them without hope; and immediately it was formed they evinced towards it a decided aversion. The act of 1825, which suppressed both the Orange societies and the Catholic Association, was never executed; and the latter continued up to July last, when the act expired, its operations with little abatement of activity. Under the direction of this body, a spirit of general and unmitigated hostility to the administration was fostered. The general election had taught them to what extent they could control the votes of the freeholders in the county elections. A more signal instance of their power was given in the return, this summer, of Mr. O'Connell for Clare, in defiance of almost all the landed gentry of the county. At the next general election they calculated that, by the aid of the forty-shilling freeholders, they should be able to return seventy members to parliament. Their aim was not only to obtain control over the forties, as they termed them, but the entire population. The priests seconded the efforts of the politicians, and itinerant orators roused the people to the assertion of their rights. Every altar, in the language of Mr. Shiel, became a tribune at which the wrongs of Ireland were proclaimed. County and parochial clubs were established in connexion with the Association to enlighten and direct the popular sentiment. The faction-fights at fairs and on saints' days, which had been a main source of crimes and murders, were suspended at the command of this "omnipotent" body. All the energies of the community were directed to the attainment of one great national object. While, however, organization was in progress among the catholics of the south, it was not likely the protestants of the north would remain idle. Orange societies were revived, and Brunswick clubs established. Mr. Lawless, who had arrived in the northern counties on a missionary tour from the Association, was opposed, and riots ensued. Meanwhile the imperial government continued apparently an unconcerned spectator of these proceedings. Not a proclamation was issued against the public meetings of the catholics, nor against their organization, nor their assembling in military array, nor against the eloquent denunciations unceasingly poured forth by O'Connell and Shiel against protestant oppression. Ministers appear to have supinely watched, with folded arms, the growth of this new power till it became too formidable to be resisted. Mr. Dawson, brother-in-law of Mr. secretary Peel, and himself a minister of the crown, was the first to declare himself a convert to the policy of catholic emancipation. This was followed, in December, by a letter from the duke of Wellington to Dr. Curtis, the titular catholic primate of Ireland, in which his grace expressed his anxiety to witness the settlement of the catholic question. A copy of this letter was furnished to Mr. O'Connell, who forthwith carried it to the Association, where it was received with loud plaudits, and ordered to be recorded in their minutes. A few days after, appeared a letter from the marquis of Anglesea to Dr. Curtis, to the effect that the settlement of the catholic question was unavoidable, and recommending the catholics to continue "to agitate," but refrain from violence, and trust to the legislature. The tenour of this letter was so extraordinary that the marquis was forthwith retailed from the government of Ireland.

FRANCE.—The ministry of M. Villèle fell last year in consequence of having lent themselves to the designs of the court and the church instead of consulting the spirit and intelligence of the nation. Their successors were men of moderate principles and of moderate abilities. They did not enjoy the confidence of the king, neither were they the representatives of any great political party. It was the temporary junction of the liberals with the extreme ultras that raised them to office and kept them there. The measures of the new ministry were of a popular character. A horror of jesuitism prevailed in France as great as had prevailed in England against popery, and the jesuit establishments were suppressed. Greater liberty was given to the press by allowing the publication of periodicals without the previous consent of government. Stricter economy was introduced into the management of the revenue, and the salaries of state functionaries reduced. In the course of the year the last division of the army of occupation returned from Spain, and thus terminated an aggressive expedition, which had gained for France no conceivable object, but had been to her a source of enormous expense.

USURPATION OF DON MIGUEL.—This faithless prince, while in England, carefully concealed his ulterior designs, and, after his arrival at Lisbon, February 22, he took the oath to the constitution as regent in behalf of his niece and betrothed wife, Donna Maria, the rightful queen of Portugal in virtue of the charter of her father, Don Pedro, the reigning emperor of Brazil. Don Miguel's plans speedily began to unfold themselves. The queen-mother, whose fanaticism and hatred of liberty were notorious, and whose intrigues had long been the plague of the kingdom, recovered her baneful influence. Though Miguel swore to be faithful to the constitution, he selected a ministry that was notoriously hostile to it. The constitutional governors of the provinces, and officers of the army, were dismissed to make room for absolutists. Chaves and his rebellious legions were recalled from Madrid: addresses were procured from the municipalities praying Miguel to assume the crown, and the rabble were encouraged in their cries for an absolute king. Sir Frederick Lamb, seeing this turn of affairs, countermanded, on his own responsibility, the departure of the British troops from the Tagus; and ordered a loan that had arrived from England for Miguel to be sent back. Orders, however, subsequently arrived from home that the British troops were not to be detained, which threw the constitutionalists into despair. At Oporto, there was a show of resistance, but it was speedily overcome by the followers of the usurper. Miguel dissolved the chamber of deputies, and convoked the cortes of Lamego, the ancient three estates of the kingdom, who had not met since 1697. Without a moment's hesitation or debate, this assembly, June 26th, decided by acclamation that Miguel was the only legal sovereign: which the prince confirmed two days after by an ordinance, and formally assumed the title of "Don Miguel, by the grace of God, king of Portugal and the Algarves." Immediately followed a most vindictive persecution of the constitutionalists by beheading and imprisoning them, and confiscating their property. In the beginning of October 1600 persons were confined in the prison of Linocero alone for political offences. About 15,000 were imprisoned on similar charges throughout Portugal, or were compelled to fly to avoid the scaffold or the dungeon. The ambassadors of all foreign states quitted Lisbon, except those of Spain and the pope, immediately Miguel took the title of king.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY.—The war between these powers had originated in what had been the constant object of Russian policy since the days of Catherine, the extension of the Russian frontier at the expense of Turkey. The destruction of the Turkish fleet at Navarino left admiral Greig undisputed master of the Black Sea. On land 115,000 Russians were assembled in May to open the campaign on the Danube. Their plan was to cross that river at Brailow after making themselves masters of that fortress, and then advance against the strong positions of Varna and Shumla. These mastered, the passages across the lofty ridge of Mount Hemus, now called the Balkan, would be opened, and they might pour down into the plains of Adrianople, or repose during the winter in the cities they had conquered. Such was the scheme, but was only in part executed. The Turks fought bravely and with unusual science. Brailow was taken, but Varna with a garrison of 40,000 men was resolutely defended for eleven weeks by Hussein Pacha, and was only at length mastered by treachery. The losses of the Russians were so great that the enterprise against Shumla was abandoned, and they retreated across the Danube with the loss of their baggage. The emperor Nicholas was with the army during part of the campaign, and did not return to Petersburg till October.

LIBERATION OF GREECE.—The war between the oppressor and pretended patron of Greece was favourable to her independence. Ibrahim found himself condemned to inactivity, and in danger of starvation, if he remained in the Morea. The exhausted country could not supply his army; the sultan could spare him no assistance, and his communication with Egypt was prevented by the allied fleets. To escape from his difficulties, he concluded, in concert with his father, the pacha of Egypt, a convention with admiral Codrington for the evacuation of the Peloponnesus. Five fortresses only were excepted from the convention. These were chiefly garrisoned by Turks and Albanians, over whom the Pacha of Egypt could not pretend to have authority. But France, England, and Russia soon determined on measures for their reduction. An expedition was fitted out at Toulon under general Maison, and before the end of November they were all reduced. Greece, after a struggle of eight years, was then emancipated from foreign control, and left to select her own course among independent nations.

A.D. 1829. Jan. 16. An attempt of about 600 Portuguese emigrant military to land at Terceira defeated, by the interference of captain Walpole, of the Ranger. The Miguelites having got possession of Madeira, Terceira was the only port of the dominions of Portugal that still held out for the constitutional sovereign, donna Maria. The expedition had been secretly fitted out at Plymouth, under the pretext that it was destined for Brazil, but earl Aberdeen, suspecting that the real destination was Terceira, captain Walpole was instructed not to suffer the emigrants to land. As the English ministers had determined to take no part in the internal affairs of Portugal, they contended that their system of neutrality would have been departed from, had they suffered a hostile armament to be fitted out, and proceed from a British port. The question, as one of international law and of public policy, was sharply discussed, and the course adopted by the foreign secretary was considered by some to evince a leaning towards the absolutists rather than the constitutional party.

27. French chamber of deputies opened by the king. The pacification of Greece, external peace, general prosperity amongst the people, and the liberty conceded to the press, formed the congratulatory topics of the royal speech.

Feb. 2. York minster set on fire by Jonathan Martin, who had concealed himself in the building for the purpose. He was found to be a lunatic, who had acted under the delusion that the venerable fabric was inimical to real religion. The roof of the choir, and its internal fittings, were destroyed. The damage was repaired by a public subscription, to the amount of 65,000*l.*, of the nobility and gentry of Yorkshire.

4. Mr. secretary Peel, in a letter to the vice-chancellor, resigned his seat for Oxford university, in consequence of the new policy he had, "in concert with all his colleagues in the government," determined on pursuing towards Ireland. He was again proposed a candidate, but sir Robert Inglis, after a contest of three days, during which 1364 voters were polled, was elected, by a majority of 146. As one of the most numerous convocations ever assembled in Oxford had last year voted, by a majority of three to one, against catholic com-sion, the result could not have been otherwise, without a sudden and extensive change of opinion.

5. Parliament opened by commission. The chief topics of the royal speech were—regret that diplomatic relations with Portugal were still suspended; continuance of the war between Turkey and Russia, and blockade by the latter of the Dardanelles; improvement of the revenue, especially that branch of it derived from articles of internal consumption; state of Ireland; existence of the catholic association inimical to the public peace; its suppression recommended, as preliminary to the removal of the disabilities of the catholics. The latter part of the speech excited great interest. In both houses addresses were unanimously carried.

10. Bill introduced by Mr. Peel, empowering the lord-lieutenant of Ireland to suppress any meeting that he may deem dangerous, and to delegate such authority to two selected magistrates. It was directed against the catholic association, and was one of three measures intended by ministers for the pacification of Ireland; the other two being the catholic relief bill, and the bill for the disfranchisement of the forty-shilling freeholders. The suppression-bill passed without opposition, and received the royal assent March 5th.

10. Died at Rome, aged 68, Pope Leo XII. He had occupied St. Peter's chair since 1823, and was succeeded by cardinal Castiglioni, who assumed the name of Pius VIII.

12. Catholic association dissolve themselves.

In consequence of a quarrel between the suite of the Russian ambassador at the court of Persia and the populace of Teheran, the whole of the embassy were murdered, with the exception of the secretary and three others.

16. Andrew Jackson declared duly elected president of the United States by congress.

20. Petitions from 60,000 proprietors of vineyards in France to the chambers, complaining of extreme distress, occasioned by the pressure of taxes, and restrictions on the exportation of wines, which, by checking consumption, rendered the prices ruinously low.

24. Cadiz made a free port.

25. The failures of Glasgow, since the last autumn, chiefly in the cotton trade, estimated to amount to 1,000,000*l*.

Mar. 4. Inaugural address of president Jackson, declaring his deference to the laws, and his determination to reduce the public debt, conceiving it to be injurious to public morals.

Petitions to the number of 150, subscribed by great bodies of people, presented to the second chamber of the states-general of the Netherlands, praying for the institution of juries, independence of judges, responsibility of ministers, freedom of public instruction; and a motion to refer these petitions to the government was carried against the ministry by a majority of 56 to 43.

5. CATHOLIC RELIEF BILL.—Mr. Peel introduced this important measure in a speech of four hours' duration. Its general objects were to render catholics eligible to seats in both houses of parliament, to vote at the election of members, and generally to enjoy all civil franchises and offices, without religious test, further than an oath repudiating foreign allegiance, the right of deposing princes excommunicated by the pope, and engaging not to use their privileges to "weaken or disturb the Protestant establishment." To the offices of lord-chancellor, or lord-lieutenant of Ireland, or lord high commissioner of Scotland, they were to continue ineligible; nor were they to advise concerning, or take any part in the disposal of ecclesiastical patronage, nor to enjoy any new immunities in the universities or public schools. On the 18th, the second reading of the bill was carried, by a majority of 353 to 180; and on the 30th, the third reading, by 320 to 142. Ministers and their converted adherents were the chief speakers. The course of government being that which the whigs had long advocated, they were satisfied with approving its policy, and did not take a leading share in the discussion. The chief anti-catholic speakers were Mr. Banks, sir R. Inglis, Mr. Sadler, and sir Charles Wetherell. On the 31st, the bill was read a first time in the lords, and the grand debate on the second reading ensued two days after. It lasted three days, one day longer than in the commons. The archbishop of Canterbury moved to throw out the bill, and was supported by the archbishops of York and Armagh, the bishops of London, Durham, and Salisbury, lords Winchelsea, Tenterden, Bexley, and Eldon. Wellington, Grey, Lansdowne, Plunkett, Goderich, and lord-chancellor Lyndhurst, were the chief defenders of the bill. On a division, the second reading was carried, by 217 against 112. On the 10th of April, the bill was read a third time, and on the 13th it received the royal assent. The unexpected consummation of this long-agitated question may be ascribed in great part to the energy and able conduct of the duke of Wellington. His grace had not only his own repugnance to catholic emancipation to surmount, but that of his chief colleagues, a great majority of the house of lords, and of the king himself. Without the previous assent of the latter, the undertaking was entirely hopeless. During the summer and autumn, the efforts of the duke to overcome the royal scruples had been incessant, and it was only a few days before parliament met that the consent of the king had been obtained. (Ann. Reg., lxxi. 97.) This accounts for the secrecy with which the relief bill was brought forward, and which was really favourable to its success; for the suddenness with which it was introduced and carried left little time for anti-catholic agitation.

FORTY-SHILLING FREEHOLDERS.—The bill for disfranchising this description of Irish freeholders, and raising the qualification to 10*l.*, went on pari passu with the relief bill, but encountered far less opposition. Mr. Brougham said, he consented to it as “the price—almost the extravagant price of the other;” and sir James Mackintosh remarked, that it was one of those “tough morsels” which he had scarcely been able to swallow. It was opposed by Mr. Huskisson, and lords Palmerston and Duncannon, as not requisite, or if so, not calculated to accomplish its purpose. Only seventeen members, however, voted against it. Mr. O’Connell, who had publicly bound himself to reject even emancipation if coupled with disfranchisement, became silent, and acquiescent in the destruction of the “fortes.”

CATHOLIC STATISTICS.—The number of catholics in Britain, at the time of passing the relief bill, was estimated, by themselves, at nearly one million, scattered in various proportions through England, Scotland, and Wales. The catholic population of London was estimated at 200,000. The chief catholic counties in England are Lancashire, Staffordshire, Warwickshire, Wiltshire, Cheshire, Northumberland, Durham, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Kent. In Ireland, the catholic population was estimated at five millions and a half, and the protestant population, including all sectarians, at one million and three quarters. By the removal of the disabilities, eight English catholic peers will be enabled to take their seats, by right, in the house of lords. The catholic baronets in England are sixteen in number. In Ireland there are eight catholic peers; in Scotland two, and one baronet, sir James Gordon. The restrictive code of laws against catholics had subsisted 271 years, from the passing of the acts of supremacy and uniformity, by 1 Eliz. c. 1 and c. 2, in 1558. But the oath of supremacy was not tendered to members of the upper house, and several peers continued catholics. It was not till the year 1677, that by 30 Car. II. stat. 2, both catholic peers and commoners were disabled from sitting in the English parliament.

Mar. 8. A decree passed the senate of Mexico for the expulsion of the Spaniards.

21. Duel between the duke of Wellington and the earl of Winchelsea in Battersea-fields. The earl having received the duke’s fire, discharged his own pistol into the air; his second then delivered a written acknowledgment, expressive of the earl’s regret for having imputed disgraceful motives to the conduct of the duke, in his pro-catholic exertions.

22. SETTLEMENT OF GREECE.—The ministers of England, France, and Russia, agreed to the settlement of the Greek state. Its continental boundary line to be drawn from the gulf of Volo to the gulf of Arta. All countries south of this line to be included in the Greek state to which the islands of Eubœa and the Cyclades were to belong. The government to approach as nearly as possible to a monarchical form, and to be hereditary in the family of a christian prince, to be chosen for the first time by the three powers, in concert with the Porte. He is not to be a member of any of the reigning families of the three powers. There were also stipulations for the maintenance of the sovereignty of Turkey, and the payment of a tribute, but these were subsequently abandoned, and the nationality of Greece secured. The settlement was made by the allies, without concert with the Porte, or the president and congress at Argos.

April 1. Accident at Hyde, near Manchester. A meeting of trade unionists being assembled in a room at a public-house, the flooring suddenly gave way, and 250 fell with such force as to go through the travellers’ room beneath into the cellar: thirty were killed, and many others greatly wounded.

13. SILK TRADE.—A debate began in the house of commons, that lasted two days, on the state of the silk-trade. In 1824 there were 17,000 looms employed in Spitalfields, while at present there were only 9000. Wages averaged at the former period 17*s.*, at present only 9*s.* a-week. By the manufacturers this depression was ascribed to the relaxation of the prohibitory system, and the admission into the home-market of foreign silks. On the other hand, ministers and the advocates of free-trade ascribed the depression to the increase of production, and the rivalry of the provincial towns of Congleton, Macclesfield, and Manchester. That the general trade had increased, was shown by the vast increase in the quantity of raw silk imported, and in the number of spindles employed in the silk-manufacture. Ministers were firm in their hostility to the prohibitory system, and would not listen to any suggestion for relief other than a reduction in the duties on the importation of raw-silk, by which the demand for the manufactured article might be augmented. During the discussion of a bill founded on this suggestion, Spitalfields was the scene of incessant riot, and property to a large amount was destroyed.

28. Duke of Norfolk and lords Dormer and Clifford took the oath and their seats in the house of lords, being the first catholic peers under the relief act. Three days after three other catholic peers, lords Stafford, Petre, and Stourton, took their seats.

29. Disturbance among the weavers of Rochdale and Macclesfield, occasioned by the reduction of wages and consequent distress: they formed processions, visited the factories, and much machinery was destroyed.

May 3. Riots at Manchester; a factory burnt; the bakers and other provision-shops attacked, and a great many of them plundered.

4. Earl of Surrey elected M. P. for Horsham, being the first catholic member returned to the house of commons under the relief act.

8. Chancellor of the exchequer, in bringing forward the budget, congratulated the house on the increasing prosperity of the country, as evinced in the improvement of the excise and customs: he anticipated, however, a falling off in the following year, owing to the deficient harvest, and other causes.

8. Died, in his 72d year, CHARLES ABBOT, first lord Colchester, and speaker of the house of commons from 1802 to 1817. Mr. Abbot originated a great many improvements in parliamentary proceedings; such as laying regularly before the house a list of expiring laws; the communication to magistrates of copies of all new statutes; the establishment of the private bill office; the improvement of the daily return of the votes and proceedings of the commons; and his financial reports in 1799, became the model of all succeeding reports of committees. He was the author of the first act for taking a census of the population of England and Wales, and of the commission for inquiring into the national records. The same spirit of amendment he carried into the house of lords. To him they owe the daily publication of their proceedings, and the establishment of a library, upon the plan of that of the house of commons.

9. Deputations from Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, Bristol, and Birmingham, wait on ministers to represent the advantages of a free trade to India and China.

15. Mr. O'Connell, who had been elected member for Clare before the passing of the relief act, claimed to take his seat under it. The legality of his election was admitted, but his right to the benefit of a posterior law was not allowed. A debate next arose whether he should be heard, in defence of his claim, at the table or at the bar. There were precedents for both modes. It was at length agreed that he should be heard at the bar; and on the 18th he delivered an elaborate argument, but the house divided against him, 190 to 116, and a writ for a new election issued.

16. At a meeting of the subscribers to the erection of king's college, lord Bexley stated that government had given the ground originally intended for the east wing of Somerset-house, for the site of the institution, free of expense, for 1000 years, on condition that the new erection corresponded with the rest of the edifice.

23. Captain Ross departed from Woolwich, in a steam-vessel, to make one more attempt for the discovery of the north-west passage.

27. Oxford-street bazaar burnt; damage estimated at 50,000*l*.

June 3. Marquis of Blandford moved resolutions in the house of commons, declaratory of the necessity of parliamentary reform. It was supported by some of the old reformers, though on very different grounds, from that dislike of free-trade and apprehension of catholic influence which influenced the mover. Resolutions rejected by 401 to 118.

10. The following official changes had now been completed:—Chief-justice Best elevated to the peerage by the title of lord Wynford; he was succeeded in the common pleas by sir Nicholas Tindal, the solicitor-general. Mr. Sugden became the new solicitor-general. Sir James Scarlett, who held the same office under Mr. Canning, became attorney-general, in place of sir Charles Wetherell, dismissed for his anti-catholic opposition to the ministry. The earl of Rosslyn sworn in keeper of the privy seal.

METROPOLIS POLICE.—Mr. secretary Peel's bill on this subject was read on the 10th a third time, and became law. It effected a great improvement in the police of the metropolis by appointing two magistrates or commissioners, exempt from sessions' business, and whose duties were limited to the preservation of the peace, and the detection and committal of offenders. They are exempt from any qualification by estate, and have the entire control of the nightly watch and police within the limits of the metropolitan police district, which district may be extended to any parish (city of London excepted) within twelve miles of Charing-cross. The expense of the new force to be defrayed by a rate, levied on householders. In consequence, the old inefficient parochial watch, with their lanterns, watch-boxes, and horn-calls, speedily began to disappear from the London streets.

20. The English and French ambassadors arrived at Constantinople, and diplomatic relations, which had been interrupted since the battle of Navarino, resumed.

24. Parliament prorogued by commission.

July 10. Resolutions of the society of the inner temple. It was deemed expedient to exclude persons from admission to the bar whose previous education or habits were not such as to afford testimony of the integrity and learning essential to the dignity of a liberal profession; and for these purposes previous examination by a barrister, in classical attainments, and the general subjects of a liberal education, was to be requisite to admission.

14. A man named Stewart and his wife convicted at Glasgow of the murder of Robert Lamont, by administering laudanum in his drink, on board a steam-packet, and afterwards robbing him: they were subsequently executed, and it was ascertained that they had been repeatedly guilty of similar crimes.

26. Russian army, commanded by marshal Diebitsch, completed the passage of the Balkan mountains.
